*MEETZE v. CHARLOTTE, COLUMBIA &
AUGUSTA R. R. CO.

(November Term, 1884.)

[1. Reference ⇨100.]

Where the report of the referee, including the testimony taken with his conclusions of law and fact, and the exceptions taken to the report, are all submitted to the Circuit Judge, it is not in terms the "Case and Exceptions," required by the Code (§ 294), but it is substantially a compliance with the requirements of the law.

Where there is a consent order of reference in a law case of all the issues to be heard and determined by the referee, the Circuit Judge has the power to review the referee's findings of fact as well as his conclusions of law, and upon such review to affirm, modify, or reverse them. Simpson, C. J., dissenting.

[3. Reference ⇨100.]

Where a party is entitled to a trial by jury the cause cannot be referred without his consent; but his consent to a reference involves his consent to all the incidents of a reference, one of which is that the report of the referee, on exceptions taken, may be reviewed and affirmed, modified, or reversed. Simpson, C. J., dissenting.

[4. Licenses ⇨43.]

Licenses, revocable and irrevocable, considered and defined.

Where the license is a power coupled with an interest of a permanent character, it is irrevocable; and if the interest be an interest in land, and the contract be by parol only, the Court of Equity will hold the contract binding, where the licensee has incurred trouble and expense in carrying out such contract.

[6. Frauds, Statute of ⇨137.]

Thus, where a railroad company, for certain privileges, was permitted by parol to construct upon the plaintiff's land a dam, a canal, and a water-wheel, for the purpose of keeping its tank supplied with water, the license was irrevocable and might be enforced in equity notwithstanding the statute of frauds.

And this special contract being valid and therefore of force, the plaintiff, upon the withdrawal by the railroad company of such privileges, could not bring action for the value of the use and occupation of the land, but only for damages for breach of the special contract.

Before Aldrich, J., Lexington, September, 1883.

This was an action by Henry A. Meetze against the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company, commenced in August, 1881. On February 22, 1883, Judge Hudson passed the following consent order: "Ordered, That all the issues arising in this cause be and they are hereby referred to William J. Assmann, Esquire, to hear and determine the same." The reference was held in August, and the report filed in September, of the same year. Upon exceptions to this report, taken by the defendant, the cause was heard before his honor, Judge Aldrich, who subsequently filed the following decree:

The report and exceptions were called for a hearing at the fall term of Lexington court, when, by the joint request of the attorneys for the plaintiff and defendant, I made the following entry in the calendar: "To be heard in Columbia by agreement of counsel made in open court." Subsequently, at the fall term of the court for Richland, the case was called for a hearing.

In limine, objection was made that there had been no "case settled," and I could not hear the cause. I ruled that the defendant, having furnished the court with all the papers in the cause copied by the referee, who is also the clerk, this was sufficient; that in all cases where a "case" is necessary the party may waive a "case" and present all the papers, provided, as in this cause, the testimony and other proceedings are in writing.

The pleadings were read by the plaintiff's attorney at the request of the attorney for the defendant, including the testimony and all the papers in the cause. After the reading the plaintiff objected to my jurisdiction, on the ground that the remedy of the defendant was to appeal directly to the Supreme Court, and that the findings of the referee had the force and effect of a special verdict which could not be reviewed by the Circuit Judge. I ruled that the appeal from the referee to the Supreme Court was in accordance with the New York practice, which clothed the referee with the power of a court; that this could not be recognized under our constitution, which vested all judicial power in the courts therein named; that I had never heard of a judgment being entered in our State upon a referred report in invitum, nor of the Supreme Court hearing an appeal directly from a referee; that whether this court would or would not have the power to pass upon a "special verdict," the finding here was certainly not a special verdict, for it not only reported the testimony but also the referee's deductions therefrom and his findings of law; that what the referee called findings of fact were for the most part mixed findings of law and fact, hence his report could not be regarded as a "special verdict" without violating the definition given in the code, to wit: "A special verdict is that by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the judgment to the court." I further held that those sections of the code copied from the New York code, and which gave power to enter up judgment upon the report, or appeal directly therefrom, had been, in whole or in part, stricken out before the order of reference in this case was made (§§ 296, 302, code of 1870). The attorneys in the cause were directed to proceed with the argument.

During the argument the point was made how far this court could go in consideration of the report and exceptions, it being an action at law referred to a referee with power to pass upon all the issues. In my opinion, there being only two modes of trial in this court, by the court with a jury, and by the court without a jury, the consent order of a reference of all the issues to a referee was a waiver of a trial by a jury, and a submission *of all the issues of law and fact decided by the court, the same having been first passed upon by the referee, who should, as in this cause he states he does, make his report "to the honorable the Court of Common Pleas." It then becomes the province of the court to take the testimony as reported, and to give due consideration to the referee's findings, without being bound by any. When the referee has found a matter of fact, purely and simply, not a deduction from facts proved, or a conclusion from applying the law to a fact proved, or what is called a mixed finding, such as a finding of "due diligence," "reasonable notice," or "negligence," as I have frequently said, I will, without some very good reason exists to overrule him, sanction his findings.

I now proceed to consider the case on its merits, as presented by the referee's report and all the papers in the cause. In 1874 the defendant railroad, at its Lexington station, with the consent of the plaintiff, built a dam to increase the head of water in a stream at that place, near its track, to run a water-wheel to force water into a tank, and also dug a ditch, some 150 yards long, to carry off the water. A portion of this dam, the whole length of the ditch, and the water-wheel are on the plaintiff's land. The defendants expended money in that construction. The dam was constructed, the ditch dug, the water-wheel built, and the tank placed with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, he then being the agent and local attorney of the defendant. The defendant has been using this water-power up to and since action brought.

Without doubt this tank has been of great benefit to the railroad company. It has furnished a never-failing supply of water to its engines, and saved the expense of employing a pump hand at this point. The plaintiff, in his testimony, says he was induced to grant this privilege on his land because as depot agent and local attorney he was permitted to ride on the defendant's trains free of charge and receive family supplies at half rates, a privilege he had been enjoying before the works were constructed and which all of the depot agents enjoyed. I see nowhere in the evidence that the plaintiff claimed these privileges in consideration of the water-power, or that he has ever even alluded to it until his letter to Mr. President

Palmer. This employment as *local attorney was a separate engagement, for which he says he was liberally compensated, and doubtless produced good will toward the defendant. This employment of depot agent the plaintiff terminated himself, and his only complaint now is that the free pass has been withheld.

The evidence discloses that this free pass has been extended, except for a short time, to Mr. Meetze as a member of the legislature; but he says that he did not willingly receive them in that capacity. Great light is thrown upon this transaction, I think, in a letter written by plaintiff, which I give in full:

"Columbia, June 13, 1877.

"Col. J. B. Palmer.

"My Dear Sir: Your favor in relation to the ticket sent me on 3d May, and not received, and the request to make out a statement of railroad fare I was compelled to pay during the last session of the legislature, duly received, and in reply beg leave to decline to make out any bill as you request. I think the whole system wrong, and my only regret is that I have ever contributed to it in any way. For your kind proposition to refund, I tender you my thanks. There is one subject to which I beg to call your attention, and one which I think should not properly be classed under dead-head. The company has, for some two years or more, been using my water-power to drive their pump at this station. It is true the works stand on the right of way which I gave the road, but they never could have been successfully worked but for the privilege I gave the company to run a ditch through my land in order to obtain the necessary fall. Now, I feel that justice requires some consideration for this privilege.

"Very truly and sincerely,

"Henry A. Meetze."

This letter, clear in its terms, shows that, whatever motive influenced the plaintiff, the privilege granted was a gift. What means the acquiescence from the date of this letter to the commencement of this action? At the time of the gift the feeling moving the donor was public spirit, the convenience to the State *and his immediate locality, and the enhanced value of property along the line. Besides, he accepted the free pass, did not make a claim for compensation, and allowed the defendant railroad to continue the use of the works and the water until the suit was instituted. I cannot resist the conclusion that the idea of compensation did not arise in the mind of the plaintiff until after he had become offended with Mr. President Haskell, and it is a well-received principle that what is intended as a gift cannot be converted into a charge.

It was contended by the plaintiff that this is a mere license that can be revoked at the will of the plaintiff; by the defendant that it is an easement not revocable. In my view of the case it makes no difference whether it is an easement or a license. As a principle of right, reason, justice, and equity, I hold that where a proprietor stands by and not only permits but consents to the erection of valuable structures on his land, he cannot come in after several years of permissive use and claim compensation. In this State, and especially under our present practice, this court has the power to consider an equitable defence. The expenditure of work, material, and money, as in this case, takes the case out of the statute of frauds. Trammell v. Trammell, 11 Rich., 472, 474; 2 Am. Lead. Cas., 546 to 587.

Again, the nature of this privilege, shown by the plaintiff to be necessary for the use of the defendant at this point, and having been used by the defendant railroad from 1874 to time of action, and originating in the consent and gift of the plaintiff, he is precluded from this action by Gen. Stat. § 1554; [Teas v. Albright] 13 Fed. Rep., 412.

It has been repeatedly held that a letter, or any other writing, identifying the privilege, when taken in connection with the structures, the proceedings, and the proof, will take the case out of the statute of frauds. That it is signed by only one party, and has been written subsequently, makes no difference if the other has acted upon it. Rob. Frauds, 105, 107; 1 Chit. Cont., 90, note on p. 95, note p. 96.

It is well understood that, while I am in favor, as a matter of right and policy, of holding railroads and all other corporations to the strictest accountability, and restrain-ing them from all *encroachments on the rights of the citizens by awarding full compensation when these rights are invaded, yet so great is the prejudice against them, and so prevalent the idea that a railroad must be made to pay for any privilege or injury, no matter how the former is acquired or the latter occasioned, without regard to the great benefits it has conferred to the section of country through which it runs, that I feel the necessity of protecting them from some of the extravagant demands set up, and with which the public too often sympathize. A railroad corporation stands in court like any other suitor, and while it is held to the severest tests and the most strict compliance with the law, it must be protected in its rights like any other citizen. I adjudge that the plaintiff is not entitled to damages.

Before dismissing the complaint, however, it may be proper to say that if I was of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to damages, they could not be measured by the benefit arising to the defendant railroad, but by the injury done to the plaintiff, which he seems to compute is the value of the free pass withheld.

The defendant has tendered a free pass to the plaintiff as an offering for favors received, and while I do not so adjudge, I think it not out of place to suggest that as the defendant railroad is enjoying this water privilege by the consent of the plaintiff, that a free pass be again offered him from year to year during his life, or so long as the defendant continues to use the water-power.

Let the complaint be dismissed and the plaintiff pay the costs of this action.

The plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. That his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in ruling that in reviewing the report of the referee it was not necessary to have a case settled.

2. That his honor erred in ruling that the defendant, having furnished the court with all the papers in the cause copied by the referee, who is also the clerk, it was sufficient.

3. That his honor erred in ruling that the consent order of reference of all the issues was a waiver of a trial by a jury, and a submission of all the issues of law and fact decided by the court, the same having been first passed upon by the referee.

*4. That his honor erred in holding that the privilege granted was a gift.

5. That his honor erred in holding that the idea of compensation did not arise in the mind of plaintiff until after he had become offended with President Haskell.

6. That his honor erred in holding that where a proprietor stands by and not only permits, but consents to the erection of valuable structures on his land, he cannot come in after several years of permissive use and claim compensation.

7. That his honor erred in holding that the expenditure of work, material, and money, as in this case, takes the case out of the statute of frauds.

8. That his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff was precluded from obtaining the relief sought under § 1559 of the General Statutes.

9. That his honor erred in holding that a letter, or any other writing identifying the privilege, when taken in connection with the structures, the proceedings, and the proof, will take the case out of the statute of frauds; and that it was signed by only one party, and has been written subsequently, makes no difference if the other has acted upon it.

10. That his honor erred in adjudging that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages.

11. That his honor erred in dismissing the complaint.

Messrs. Clark & Muller, for appellant.

April 22, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The complaint filed in this action alleges that in 1874 the appellant, in consideration of the privilege of at all times travelling upon the cars of the defendant free of charge and for certain other valuable considerations thereunto him moving, permitted the defendant to enter upon his lands located along the line of defendant's road, and there to erect and build a certain dam and water-wheel, and to excavate a certain canal for the purposes of running said water-wheel and supplying the water-tank of defendant with water; that the defendant continued to use these works for the purpose aforesaid until about March 1, 1880, having during this time extended the privileges aforesaid to the plaintiff; that about March 1, 1880, these privileges were discontinued, and the defendant has since refused to perform its part of the contract or in any manner to remunerate the plaintiff, although it has continued to use the water-wheel, canal, &c. Wherefore he demands the sum of $225 for the use and occupation of the said land and the use and occupation of the water-wheel, canal, &c., from March 1, 1880, to August 1, 1881, the time of the commencement of the action, and for costs.

The answer of the defendant denied the allegations in the complaint except so far that it admitted the construction of the water-works on the plaintiff's land, and also the privileges extended to the plaintiff as claimed in the complaint; but it averred as to these privileges that they were not extended in consideration of the use of said water-works, but were extended to the plaintiff as one of the agents of the company during the years 1874 and 1875, and during the years 1877, 1878, and 1879 as State senator, and so expressed in the free pass given, but that during the year 1876, when the plaintiff was neither agent nor State senator, no free pass was given; and it further averred that the permission given to the defendant to erect the works mentioned was given because of the public spirit and kindly disposition of the plaintiff to the road, gratuitously, like the right of way had been given by various persons, and was intended for defendant to enjoy the privilege to the same extent and for the same period as such right of way. The answer also admitted that the defendant had continued the use of the works since 1874, and, while not admitting the plaintiff's right thereto, the defendant tendered a free pass for the year 1880, to be continued from year to year so long as the defendant used said works, which was refused by the plaintiff.

The answer also set up a counter-claim of $162.12 balance in plaintiff's hands as agent. The plaintiff replied to the counterclaim, asserting that he had paid all in his hands, and denying *that he was indebted to the defendant in any amount whatsoever.¹

Upon order of Judge Hudson, on motion of plaintiff's counsel and by the consent of defendant's counsel, the cause with all issues arising in it was referred to William J. Assmann, Esq., to be by him heard and determined.

The referee found as conclusions of fact: That from the spring of 1874 to March 31, 1880, the defendant used the water-works for supplying its tank, with the consent of the plaintiff; that the consideration which moved the plaintiff to this consent was certain privileges extended to him by the company, principally that of travelling free upon the road, which privileges were allowed during this time except during the winter of 1877, when he was required to pay the regular fare in travelling, and were entirely discontinued after March, 1880; that thereupon the plaintiff lodged complaint, and demanded his right to travel free of charge; that this demand was ignored until December, when an annual pass was tendered, which the plaintiff declined to accept; that since March 31, 1880, the defendant has used the water privilege without the consent of the plaintiff and without paying compensation therefor; and that the value of the use and occupation of the lands of the plaintiff is reasonably worth $150 per annum.

As conclusions of law, he found (1) that the privilege granted the defendant was a "license" and not an "easement"; that this license was revocable at the will of the licensor; that said license was revoked on and after April 1, 1880. (2) That after said revocation, the use and occupation was upon the implied promise to pay what it was reasonably worth. He therefore adjudged that the plaintiff recover the sum of $200 and costs.

These conclusions, with the testimony upon which they were based, were reported to the court, with numerous exceptions from the defendant. This report, including the testimony and exceptions, came up before his honor, Judge Aldrich, who—holding that the consent order of reference of all the issues in the case was a waiver of a jury trial, to which the parties were entitled in the first instance, it being a case at law, and that this was also a submission of all the issues passed upon by the referee, and by him reported to the court, when it was the province of the court, after giving due consideration to the findings of the referee without being bound by any, to decide said issues, both of fact and law, for himself—proceeded to consider the case on its merits as presented by the report and all the papers in the cause, and finding that the use of the water privilege by the defendant was granted as a gift, whatever may have been plaintiff's motive in allowing it, and that whether it should be regarded as a license or an easement, yet having been granted, and the defendant in consequence of such grant having gone to considerable expense to make it useful, he held that the plaintiff could not come in after several years of permissive use and claim compensation. He further held that, by virtue of a certain letter of plaintiff, the statute of frauds did not apply; and further, that even if the plaintiff was entitled to damages, they could not be measured by the benefit arising to the defendant from the use of the water, but by the injury done to the plaintiff in refusing him the free pass and other privileges which he had enjoyed. He therefore dismissed the complaint with costs.

The appeal raises the following questions: 1st. Whether the Circuit Judge could review the report of the referee without a case and exceptions, although all the papers which were before the referee were submitted to him. 2nd. Whether in a case like this, it being a case at law, the Circuit Judge could hear it on its merits, disregarding the findings of the referee as to the facts; and whether he was not bound by the facts as found, having jurisdiction only as to the question of law involved, with power to grant a new trial upon the facts, for the reasons for which under the law a new trial may be granted in jury cases. 3rd. Whether his honor erred in holding the privilege granted to the defendant was a gift; and also in holding that plaintiff, having stood by and permitted the erection of valuable structures by the defendant, could not come in after several years of permissive use and claim compensation. 4th. Whether his honor erred in holding that the facts of this case took it out of the statute of frauds; and also in holding that plaintiff was precluded from relief by section 1554 of General Statutes.

5th. Whether his honor *erred in holding that plaintiff was not entitled to damages and in dismissing the complaint.

The two first questions involve questions of practice, and their solution depends upon the interpretation which is to be given to the sections of the code bearing upon these points. These sections are mainly sections 290 and 294. Section 294, after providing how trials by a referee shall be conducted, provides the manner of reporting conclusions, directing that the facts found and the conclusions of law must be stated separately, and the decision given, and then it provides that this decision may be excepted to and reviewed in "like manner" and with "like effect" in all respects as in cases of appeal under section 290, and the referee may in like manner settle a case or exceptions.

Section 290, which section 294 refers to and incorporates, has two subdivisions. In the first of these it provides that for the purpose of appeal either party may except to a decision on a matter of law arising upon a trial within ten days after written notice of the filing of the decision, order, or decree, as provided in sections 344 and 345. So that where a party intends to except to the report of a referee who has tried the case on a matter of law, he must do so within ten days as above. Subdivision 2 provides that if either party desires a review upon the evidence appearing on the trial, either of a question of fact or of law, he may at any time within ten days after notice of the judgment, or within such time as may be prescribed by the rules of the court, make a case or exceptions in "like manner" as upon a jury trial, except that the judge, in settling the case, must briefly specify the facts found by him and his conclusions of law. Now, in conforming to this subdivision, so that the report of the referee may be reviewed by the Circuit Judge, it seems that a case or exceptions must be made within ten days, &c., in like manner as upon a jury trial, in which the referee, in settling the case, must briefly specify the facts found by him, and also his conclusions of law. These requirements were not observed formally in this case, but all the papers, including the report of the referee, the testimony taken, the facts found, the conclusions of law, and the exceptions, were submitted to the Circuit Judge. This we think was a substantial compliance with the demands of *this section. Nothing seems to have been left out that could have been brought up in a more exact and formal observance of the rule. So that while it would be better to conform in terms, yet for the reasons given the failure in this instance should not be held fatal.

The second question is surrounded with greater difficulties, which are the more perplexing for the reason that we have no case in our reports to which we can look, and upon which we can stand as authority, as to the full import of the question raised, though there are several, to be cited hereafter, which seem to lead in the direction of the conclusion which we have reached. We must again look up the sections of the code supra, which are also applicable to this question, but before doing so it may be best to consider briefly the nature of trials in civil causes, and the circumstances and authority under which trials by referees may be had. A trial is defined to be a "judicial examination of the issues between the parties, whether they be issues of fact or of law." Code, § 273.

Issues of law must be tried by the court, as also cases in chancery, unless they be referred as provided in chapter 5 of title 8, part II., Code, § 274. Issues of fact in actions for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, must be tried by a jury, unless such trial be waived, as provided in section 288, or a reference be ordered as in section 274. Every other issue is triable by the court, which, however, may order the whole issue, or any specific question of fact involved therein, to be tried by a jury, or may refer it as provided in sections 292 and 293.

It will be seen from these sections of the code, which constitute our chart, that there are two general modes of trial of causes provided by the law, without reference to the consent or otherwise of the parties litigant, i. e., trials by the court and trials by a jury. To the court belong all issues of law and all cases in chancery, with the power on his part to order a reference for his own enlightenment, not, however, to be controlling on him. To the jury belong all questions of fact in cases at law, for the recovery of money only, or of any specific real or personal property. But either of these modes of trial may be changed by the action of the parties if they choose to do so. For instance, a *jury trial may be waived in favor of a trial by the court, as provided in chapter 6, section 288. Or all issues, whether of fact or law, in any action may be taken from the jury or the court and referred to a referee upon the written consent of the parties (§ 292), and the court may, even without the consent of the parties in certain cases, direct a reference (§ 293). It appears, then, that a party has the right to demand a trial by the court, or the jury, as the case may require, and that he cannot be deprived of his right, unless by his own consent, except in the few cases referred to in section 293, where the judge has the power to refer even without the consent of the parties. Yet he may consent that a case at law may be tried by the court, or that all issues in any case may be tried by a referee.

Now, the case at bar was originally a case at law. It was an action for the recovery of money only, demanded for an alleged breach of contract. It was, therefore, a jury case, pure and simple. The parties, however, consented that all the issues involved might be tried by a referee, and it was so ordered. The question now arises, what was the effect of this consent? Did it involve the further consent that, after the referee had heard and tried the case, his findings of fact might be disregarded by the Circuit Court, and the case be reheard and tried by the Circuit Judge upon its merits, and upon the evidence reported by the referee? There can be no doubt that parties may waive a jury trial, either in favor of a trial by the court, or by a referee (Code, §§ 288 and 292); but the question is, where a jury trial has been waived and a referee trial elected, can such a waiver, under any circumstances, carry the trial upon the merits back to the court without the consent of the parties? This must depend upon the construction which should be given to section 294, in connection with section 290, supra, as applicable to this precise point.

Section 294, as we have already seen, provides for a review of the decisions of referees in all cases where that mode of trial is adopted under section 292, until the recent amendment in the general statutes. Judgment might be entered upon the decision of the referee when he had been substituted by the parties at the trial court, with the right of appeal upon exceptions—to what court in this State it was never decided, but to the general *term in New York. This last provision has been, however, stricken out of our code (Gen. Stat.), and as it now stands, the decision of the referee is subject to review by the Circuit Court upon a case or exceptions. But what is the extent of the power of the Circuit Court in this review? Section 294 declares that it shall be had in like manner and with like effect in all respects as in cases of appeal under section 290. Section 290 provides the manner of appeal to this court in jury cases tried by the court upon a waiver of a jury trial. It does not say in terms what the effect shall be, but we know that in appeals to this court in cases at law when tried by the court, questions of law can only be brought up by such appeal. The facts cannot be reviewed.

It is true, subdivision 2 of section 290 does say that either party desiring a review upon the evidence appearing on the trial, either of the questions of fact or of law, may make a case or exceptions in like manner as upon a jury trial. What this means exactly we are at a loss to conceive, but it certainly could not have meant that this court should have the power to review the facts as well as the law in a case at law, when the case had been tried by the court. Because the constitution has invested this court in cases at law with the power only to correct errors of law, which, by implication at least, inhibits the power to correct errors of fact in such cases. This being so, the legislature could not enlarge this power. We do not know what could have been the intent of this expression then, except, perhaps, it was to give power to have the facts reviewed in such cases where the facts, according to the law and practice, were reviewable on appeal, i. e., cases in chancery.

This construction would confine the Circuit Court, in the review of the decisions of referees where the parties had elected that mode of trial, to questions of law in cases at law, but with power in chancery cases to correct errors, both of fact and law. It would make the practice uniform and symmetrical, and would conform to the intent of parties in selecting their own mode of trial. And we think this is the proper construction of section 294, where it provides that the decisions of the referee shall be subject to review in like manner and with like effect as appeal cases. We are of opinion, therefore, that his honor erred in *considering any other questions below, except the legal ones presented in the exceptions, except that he might have granted a new trial if in his judgment the facts warranted such an order.

The prominent cases in our own reports, where this question has been somewhat discussed as to chancery cases, are, Flinn & Hart v. Brown, 6 S. C., 209; Thorpe v. Thorpe, 12 Id., 154; Gadsden v. Whaley, 9 Id., 147. In the first case, which was an equity case, all of the issues were referred under section 270 to a jury, and the court held that the verdict was not necessarily to be accepted as the conclusion which was to govern and control the case, but that the judgment in such a case must be the result of the conclusions of the judge, both on the law and the facts—the court saying: “That it was entirely within the power of the judge to have disregarded the verdict and decreed in the face of it.” This case seems directly in point as to chancery cases, because this case was referred by virtue of the provisions of the code under discussion. The cases at law are, Ross v. Linder, 18 S. C., 605; Griffin v. Griffin, 20 Id., 486; and Caulfield v. Charleston, 19 Id., 600. In the last case it was said that the report of a referee as to the facts in a case at law has the force and effect of a special verdict.

We think, therefore, that his honor, the Circuit Judge, transcended his powers when he found as a fact that the privilege extended to the defendant was a gift, in face of the fact as found by the referee that it was based upon a consideration and was the result of contract; and it being error in the judge thus to reverse this finding, the principle of law which he applied to the fact when reversed was not of force, however correct it may be as a general principle.

Coming next to the other questions presented, let us inquire first, what is the precise cause of action upon which the plaintiff has come into court. In looking at the complaint, we find that the greater part of it is taken up in detailing a special contract between himself and the defendant: and near the close thereof a breach is alleged in these words: “That on or about the first day of March, 1880, the defendant discontinued the accommodations previously extended, and has ever since refused to perform its part of the contract.” But no damages are demanded for *this breach: on the contrary, just at this point it is alleged that, after such discontinuance and failure to perform its part of the contract, the defendant continued the use of the works, without compensation, which use the plaintiff then claims is worth the sum of $350 per annum, and judgment is demanded for the value of such continued use and occupation. We conclude from this that the action is upon an implied contract, and not upon the special contract alleged to have been made between the parties. The referee certainly so understood it, and such we suppose was the understanding of the plaintiff. Now the question arises, can an action be maintained upon a quantum meruit, or implied contract, when the proof shows the presence of a specific contract?

It is said, however, that the specific contract was a mere license, revocable in its nature; that it was revoked; and that since said revocation the implied contract has sprung into existence, and in that view the action is maintainable. We have looked into many cases on the subject of "licenses" and "easements" without reaching a very definite and satisfactory conclusion as to the precise distinction between them. They seem often to shade into each other, and the line of demarcation between them is so indistinct that neither the cases in which they have been discussed nor the text-books afford any well-defined rule as a test. Without attempting here to establish such a test for general application, the following general principles, we think, may be extracted from reliable authorities. Prince v. Case [10 Conn. 375, 27 Am. Dec. 675], and Rerick v. Kern, discussed in 2 Am. Lead. Cas. (Hare & Wall), 736, and the cases there cited; 2 Story Eq. 60, § 761.

A general definition of a "license" merely is that it is an authority, a power, to do some act, derived from one who can give such power, and its effect is to make the act lawful which, but for the power granted, would be unlawful. Such a license (in its implied form) is essentially revocable, both before the act is performed or afterwards. An illustration of a power of this kind would be where one was authorized to hunt in another's park, or to cut down another's timber. If the authority went no further than to do acts of this kind, it is a mere license and is revocable at the will of the licensor. But the license may be coupled with an interest in the licensee beyond the mere execu*tion of the power; as, for instance, in the example above of hunting in another's park, the license may extend to a vested right in the game killed by the licensee, and then the license would not be revocable so as to deprive the licensee of his property. It might be revocable so as to prevent a continuance of the license, if the interest beyond the license was of a temporary character, as in the case referred to, though the license could not be revoked, after the game was killed, so as to deprive the licensee from taking possession, yet it could be revoked so as to prevent a repetition or continuation of the hunting. But if the interest over and above the license is of a permanent character, and such as could not be enjoyed except by a continuance of the license, and that interest has become legally vested in the licensee, then the license is irrevocable, because the interest to which it is a necessary incident is irrevocable. A license then may consist of two parts—first, a mere power; and second, a transfer of an interest to the licensee, permanent or otherwise, to which the power is a necessary incident. A license of the first kind is always revocable, but whether the second kind is so or not depends upon the fact whether the interest is legally vested and whether it is permanent and continuing.

In the case at bar, the license is of the latter kind. It is a power coupled with an interest. The power consisted in the defendant being allowed by the plaintiff to enter upon his land to dig the canal, to build the dam, and to erect the water-wheel, all of which acts would have been unlawful without the license. And if the license had halted at this point, while the license would have been a protection against an action of trespass, yet it could have been revoked either before the works had been erected or afterwards. But the license did not stop at that point. The complaint states that in consideration of certain privileges, &c., extended to him, he permitted (licensed) the defendant to enter upon his lands and erect these works, for the purpose of supplying defendant's tank with water. Here was an interest, an easement, beyond the mere authority to erect the works, to wit, the purpose of the erection. They were to be used by the defendant, and they were so used.

Now, according to the principles stated above, where the license *covers not only a power but an interest, whether it can be revoked or not depends upon the character of the interest and whether according to law the interest has become vested. The difficulty in these cases is where the interest is an interest in lands. Because, in addition to the license, before an interest in lands can become vested in law, certain technical rules, so to speak, must be complied with, as, for instance, lands cannot be conveyed at law without an instrument executed under seal, &c., and the statute of frauds interposes too and declares that the sale of no interest in lands, &c., shall extend beyond a mere estate at will, unless in writing; and it further provides that no action shall be brought upon such sale, unless in writing, &c. When a question arises, then, in a law court as to an interest in land, unless these rules have been complied with, the objection is fatal. In the equity courts, however, it has been held that where the license as to an interest in land, though verbal, has been so far executed that its revocation would work a great wrong in the licensee, the chancery courts will hold it binding and irrevocable, and especially where the licensee, relying on the contract, has incurred considerable expense and trouble in carrying it out. Where the licensor stands by, permits and encourages the transaction as a sale, and allows the licensee to go to expense upon the faith of a sale or vested interest, he will be estopped in equity from denying it, and it may be specifically enforced.

Now, applying these principles to the case at bar, it is clear that the original contract between these parties, as alleged in the complaint and as found by the referee, was more than a mere license revocable at the will of the plaintiff. Because it embraced not only a power to do certain acts, but the exercise of this power was intended to create, and did create, an interest to be enjoyed and used by the defendant. This interest was attached to the railroad of the defendant, which was a permanent structure. It was intended to supply this permanent structure with water, a continuous want, and therefore we must conclude that the interest was understood to be of a permanent character.

It was, however, an interest in land, and not in writing, simply verbal, and the plaintiff contends that therefore it was nothing more than an estate at will under the statute of frauds, and on *that account was still revocable. This position of the plaintiff would be entirely correct, under the statute of frauds, in an ordinary case of verbal contract, for the sale of an interest, certain or uncertain, in lands in a law court; but we think in this case, before a court combining both law and equity jurisdiction, under the equitable principles referred to above, that the canal, the dam, and the water-wheel, erected at considerable expense by the defendant, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, constitute a complete bar to the interposition of the statute, which places the contract beyond the reach of revocation.

If this be the correct view of the case, then the special contract between the parties is still of force, and the plaintiff's suit should have been based on that as his cause of action, founding his claim for damages on its breach, and not for the value of the use and occupation of the premises.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McIVER. In this case I concur in the result, but I cannot assent to the doctrine that a Circuit Judge has no power to review and reverse a referee's findings of fact in a law case. On the contrary, in my judgment, it is his duty to do so when a case proper for that result is made. Even under the old code it always seemed to me a misuse of terms to speak of a trial by referees. A trial is defined as "the judicial examination of the issues between the parties, whether they be issues of law or fact." Old Code, § 275; New Code, § 273. The word "judicial" implies the action of a court, or some agency thereof under its direction. Hence there is no impropriety in speaking of a trial by jury, for that is conducted in the presence and under the direction of the court, and the judgment is entered on the verdict by the direction of the court, either express or implied. A referee, however, is not a court. He is not mentioned among the several courts provided for in the constitution, nor among those established by the legislature under the authority of the constitution. See Code, § 9, where the several courts are mentioned. The Circuit Court has no authority to delegate its powers to a referee. It can only use him as an agency, or as a *part of its machinery to facilitate the disposition by the court of such business as may be brought before it. But it cannot invest him with power to determine any issues, either of law or fact, except subject to its supervision and review.

Hence I always believed that, notwithstanding the somewhat equivocal language of section 296 of the old code, no judgment could be entered upon the report of a referee until it was confirmed by the Circuit Court, and such I understand to have been the practice even under the old code. In the case of Kirkland v. Cureton (4 S. C., 122), which is sometimes cited in opposition to this view, it will be found by reference to the last paragraph on page 124, that the judgment was entered on the report of the referee "by order of the court," and the appeal was from the judgment so entered. So that this case confirms my view as to the prevailing practice. But the question now presented arises under the new code in which the language which was supposed to give authority for the entry of a judgment on the report of a referee, without any confirmation by the court, has been omitted, evidently with the intention of abrogating such provision, and must be determined by the provisions of the present code.

Section 294, in speaking of referees and masters to whom the issues in an action have been referred, declares: "They must state the facts found, and the conclusions of law separately; and their decision must be given, and may be excepted to and reviewed in like manner and with like effect in all respects as in cases of appeal under section 290; and they may in like manner settle a case or exceptions. When the reference is to report the facts, the report shall have the effect of a special verdict. When the case shall have been heard and decided upon the report of the referee and exceptions, the decision may be reviewed on appeal to the Supreme Court." It is clear from this language that the referee is required to report, not merely the general conclusion at which he has arrived, as in case of a jury, but he must report separately the facts and his conclusions of law therefrom; and his decision, which must necessarily be the combined result of his findings of fact and law, "may be excepted to and reviewed." By what court is not expressly stated, but it is manifest from the other portions of the section that the Circuit Court *is intended, and not the Supreme Court: for the provision at the end of the section that the case, after being heard and decided upon the report and exceptions, may be reviewed on appeal to the Supreme Court, furnishes conclusive evidence that the intention was that the report and exceptions should be heard by the Circuit Court: and this, as I understand, is not controverted.

Now, if the section had stopped at the words last quoted, would it not necessarily follow that the permission to except to and review the decision of the referee, compounded of findings of fact as well as of law, involved the right to review questions of fact as well as law? But the section does not stop there, but goes on to provide the manner in which such decision may be excepted to and reviewed, "in like manner, and with like effect in all respects, as in cases of appeal under section 290." This is precisely the same as if the language of section 290 had been incorporated in the section. Turning to that section we find the following language: Subdivision I. "For the purpose of an appeal, either party may except to a decision on a matter of law arising upon such trial within ten days after written notice of the filing of the decision," &c. Subdivision II. "And either party desiring a review upon the evidence appearing on the trial, either of the questions of fact or of law, may, at any time within ten days after notice of the judgment, or within such time as may be prescribed by the rules of court, make a case or exceptions in like manner as upon a trial by jury, except that the judge, in settling the case, must briefly specify the facts found by him and his conclusions of law."

Now, if this language be incorporated into section 294, that section would then read: "Their decision (that is, referees') must be given, and may be excepted to and reviewed in like manner, and with like effect, in all respects, as in cases of appeal under section 290, that is to say: 1. Either party may except to a decision on a matter of law arising upon such trial within ten days after written notice of the filing of the decision. * * * 2. And either party desiring a review upon the evidence appearing on the trial, either of questions of fact or of law, may, at any time within ten days after notice of the judgment," &c. Clearly if the section read in this way, as it practically does, *there could be no doubt that the report of a referee could be excepted to and reviewed for error in his findings of fact as well as of law, for it is distinctly, and in terms, provided for. It seems to me clear, therefore, that the Circuit Court has jurisdiction to review the findings of fact as well as of law by a referee.

But it is contended that this power of review, so far as findings of fact are concerned, is limited to the ordering of a new trial, and does not warrant the reversal of such findings. It being conceded, as I understand, that the power to review embraces the power to reverse findings of law, I am unable to perceive any reason why the power to review does not likewise embrace the power to reverse findings of fact. The power to review both of these classes of findings is given in the same section, and practically in the same language: and not finding in the section any distinction between them in respect to the extent of the power conferred, I am unable to discover any warrant for such distinction. But in addition to this, so far as I have been able to discover, the Circuit Court has not been invested with power to grant new trials, except in cases tried by a jury (Gen. Stat., §§ 2113, 2652), and in the absence of any such grant of power in a case tried otherwise than by a jury, the power to review must necessarily include the power to reverse, affirm, or modify.

Indeed, it seems to me that the power to order a new trial in a case which had been referred to a referee would lead to singular, if not unfortunate, results. Before whom would the new trial be had, the same referee or another? If before the same referee, is he to surrender his deliberate judgment at the dictation of the Circuit Court? If he is not, then no practical good would result from the new trial, but simply delay and additional expense. If he adheres to his original opinion, can a new trial be ordered toties quoties? If before another referee (which, however, could not be without the consent of the parties), and he should reach the same conclusion as the first, how often would the process be repeated? These, and other considerations which might be mentioned, may afford the reason why the power to grant new trials has only been given in cases tried by a jury, the constituent members of which are changed at every court. But *be that as it may, as I am unable to find any authority for a Circuit Court to order a new trial, except in a case which has been tried by a jury, I am forced to the conclusion that the power undoubtedly vested in a Circuit Judge to review the findings as well of fact as of law, necessarily includes the power to reverse, affirm, or modify such findings.

The argument drawn from the fact that the Supreme Court has no power to reverse findings of fact in a law case does not strike me with much force. That limitation upon the power of this court is found, not in the sections of the code above cited, which deal with the question under consideration, but in the constitution, in which no reference is made to such question. Indeed, the argument would prove too much, for inasmuch as this court has no power to review in a law case the facts even for the purpose of granting a new trial, it would follow that the Circuit Court would have no power to review the findings of fact by a referee even for the purpose of granting a new trial. If the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in appeals was defined only in the sections of the code which we have cited, unaffected by the provisions of the constitution, as is the case with reference to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court to review the report of a referee, then such jurisdiction would not be limited to the correction of errors of law only, but would extend to the correction of errors of fact also by the express terms of those sections: but as the constitution, which is of superior authority, does place such a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the comprehensive language of those sections, when applied to the Supreme Court, must necessarily be narrowed down to the limits fixed by such superior authority. But when we are called upon to construe the language of those sections, with a view to ascertain the extent of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court in reviewing the report of a referee, as to which there is no constitutional limitation, we are bound to give that language its ordinary and plain meaning, and so construing it there can be no doubt that the power of review extends to findings of fact as well as of law.

Nor will it do to say that the language of subdivision 2 of section 290, which in terms gives the power to review findings of fact, must be regarded as referring only to cases in chancery. *and not to law cases. There is no warrant in the language of the section, or anywhere in the chapter in which it is found, for such a construction. On the contrary, it is found in a chapter entitled "Trial by the Court," and the first section of it (288) prescribes how a trial by jury may be waived in actions on contract, plainly referring to law cases, and not cases in chancery. The next section (289) treats of the trial of a question of fact by the court, and then follows the section which is referred to in section 294 as prescribing the manner in which the decision of a referee may be excepted to and reviewed in any case—whether at law or in chancery, is not specified; and hence I conclude that the same mode of proceeding applies to both classes of cases, and it being conceded, as I understand, that a Circuit Judge, in a case in chancery, may reverse, affirm, or modify the referee's findings of fact as well as of law, I see no reason why he has not the same power in a law case.

This conclusion does not abridge a party's right to a trial by jury in a case in which he is entitled to such a mode of trial, for it is only by his consent that such a case can be referred to a referee, and when he gives such consent, he must be regarded as consenting to the necessary incidents to a reference, one of which is, that the report of the referee can be excepted to and reviewed by the Circuit Court, and upon such review that the findings of the referee, both of law and fact, may be reversed, affirmed, or modified.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur in the result of the case, and in this opinion of Mr. Justice MEYER as to the question of practice involved.

Judgment affirmed.

An administrator has no property in the cadaver of his intestate, and therefore cannot maintain an action for its wilful and negligent mutilation, but he may sue for injury to the wearing apparel of the deceased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dead Bodies, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. ⇨9.]

Before Aldrich, J., Lexington, September, 1883.

This was an action by David J. Griffith, as administrator of W. Scott Hook, deceased, against the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company, commenced October 6, 1881. The decision of the Circuit Judge was as follows:

This cause was argued before me in Columbia, on exceptions to the report of the referee, Mr. Assmann, the clerk of the court of Lexington. The case was called for a hearing at the fall term of the Lexington court, when, by consent of the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant, I made the following entry on the calendar: "To be heard in Columbia, by agreement of counsel made in open court."

When the case was called for a hearing in Columbia, several objections were made, as in the case of Meetze v. same defendant [23

S. C. 1]. First. That no case had been settled and I could not hear it. I ruled, as in Meetze's Case, that all the papers and proceedings being in writing, the party may waive a "case." Second. After the reading of the papers, the plaintiff objected to my hearing the case for want of jurisdiction. Since filing my opinion in the Meetze Case, I have had the opportunity of consulting with eminent members of the bench and bar, and find that the practice is as stated in argument, that unless the appeal comes up from the Circuit Court the Supreme Court will not hear it. This being so, it will be unnecessary to repeat the reasons which governed me in deciding to hear the case on the papers. I refer to that case if it be necessary.

I now proceed to consider the case on the report of the referee, who has awarded $10,000 damages against the defendant for mutilating the corpse of the plaintiff's intestate. When I first heard of the action, I naturally inquired what property has the administrator in the corpse of his intestate. It cannot be appraised. "It cannot be assets in his hands for the payment of debts. It cannot be an estate for distribution among the heirs at law, for the corpse would be buried and in a state of decomposition before letters of administration could be granted." But after hearing the very able and exhaustive argument of Mr. Youmans for the plaintiff, and the equally competent and learned argument of Mr. Rion for the defendant, I confess I have been exercised in coming to a conclusion in a case of this novel impression.

The fact is the intestate was murdered and his corpse put on the railroad track to conceal the crime. The assassin has been twice tried, twice convicted, and is now serving his term of life imprisonment in the penitentiary, the governor having commuted his sentence. So that the first question is, who is responsible for the mutilation of the dead body? The murderer who put it on the railroad track or the railroad company whose engines ran over it? The doctrine of contributory negligence is explicit and very well settled. If an individual, by his own act, contribute to his own injury, he cannot recover damages. Suppose, instead of killing the intestate, the assassin had tied him on the track and the trains run over him, who would have been the murderer? Now, does it follow if A kills B and places his body on the railroad track to conceal his crime, that the railroad company, and not the murderer, is liable? I think not. The man who committed the murder and then to conceal his crime placed the body on the track, thereby trespassing on the right of way of the railroad company, is the responsible person. It would be an unusual state of the law to indict one man for the killing of another and recover damages from a railroad company for the mutilation of the corpse which he has slain and placed in the track of the engine and train to conceal his crime.

Who has been hurt? The man was dead when he was put there; he has suffered no pain, no mental anxiety, no doctor's bill, no loss of time; there is nothing on which to assess damages. It is true, the dead man did not contribute to the mutilation, but after he was murdered, the assassin placed his lifeless body on the track, caused the mutilation, and was the active agent in the injury complained of in this action. But what interest has the administrator in a dead body? It is not assets to pay debts, not an estate to be distributed, it can never come into his possession for any purpose whatsoever, because before he can take out his letters of administration it will be rotting in the grave, food for worms. What can he do with a dead, buried, and decomposing body? Literally nothing, the worms are rioting in the corpse before the administrator has the right to possess the estate; and in this case, as I gather from the report, the intestate had no estate but his corpse.

So I conclude, if there is any damage, it is not to the administrator, but to the family of the intestate, and the only damage they can suffer is the injury to their feelings and sentiments. If, therefore, any right of action exists in any one, it is not in the administrator, who has neither possession nor property in the corpse, but in the family of the deceased, who may be able to say, we have been injured in our feelings and sentiments. It is like an action for the recovery of real estate: the heirs at law must sue, the administrator has no title. The action cannot be maintained. But as this is a novel question and has been pressed with singular ability on both sides, it may not be improper to consider it more at large.

On the night of October 8, 1879, the dead body of Scott Hook was placed on the track of the defendant railroad company. It will appear from the testimony that Hook was killed on October 8, 1879, by one Squire Clark, who was twice convicted of the murder, and that the dead body was placed in the centre of a curve, between Gilbert Hollow and Summit, near half or three-quarters of a mile from the latter place. Early next morning the body was discovered, horribly mangled, three trains having passed over it in the following order: First, freight train north, at 11 p. m.; second, freight train south, at 3.20 a. m.; third, passenger train south, at 6.30 to 7 a. m. Certainly if these trains, managed by three sets of employees, had intentionally mutilated the corpse of the dead man, against whom they had no cause of enmity, who they did not know was on the track, and who could have been discovered by ordinary care and diligence, it would have shown such wanton negligence, hearts so destitute of social duty, as to demand some punishment. But *by what proceeding and in what court, it is not necessary for me to inquire.

Do the facts proved make out a case of negligence? I think not. This question turns on the facts, how far off the engineer could have discovered the dead body on the track; in what distance the trains could have been stopped. Let us examine these questions, giving full force to the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses. It is naturally to be supposed that the body of the murdered man was placed on the track so as not to be easily discovered. Hence it was placed in a curve, where the head-light of the engine would not be thrown upon it until near that point where the body had been placed. I think this is clear from the fact that the engineer of the first freight train going north at 11 p. m. did not know he passed over the body until he was telegraphed to at Wilmington, when, on examination, he discovered blood on the under works of his engine. It had rained the evening before and was hazy when Clarkson's train passed the next morning with his head-light burning. Trains 1 and 2 passed in the dark of the night. These trains were heavy freight trains, and the managers of them not likely to observe any jar occasioned by running over a soft and yielding body.

The plaintiff does not say how far the body could have been observed. He gives it as his opinion one hundred and sixty yards, but with great candor adds: "I will not say how far a body on the track can be seen by head-light;" but says, "I have no experience in running engines." The Rev. Mr. Crouse, of Georgia, thinks a heavy freight train could have been stopped in fifty yards, but properly qualifies his opinion by saying, "I am no railroad man." This is the proof of negligence by these nonexpert witnesses on the part of the plaintiff, and it would be hard to say that a prima facie case of negligence has been made out. But assume that it has, what does the undisputed proof of the defendant railroad establish? As to all the trains, the track was slippery from the rain, and they could not be so easily stopped. The first passed at 11 p. m. Alexander, an engineer of eleven years' experience, says it was a heavy train; could not see a body further than forty or fifty yards by head-light, and could not stop train within three hundred yards. As to the sec*ond train, he also testifies, going north as it was, the body could have been seen at same distance; but being up grade, the train could have been stopped in about one hundred yards. As to this train, the defendant's counsel had made a mistake as to who were the employees, and offered to produce them, but it was understood no advantage would be taken of their non-production. As to the third train, Mr. Clarkson, a conductor for thirty years, and Mr. Fell, an engineer for twenty-two years, say that the body could not have been discovered more than thirty yards, and the train stopped within one hundred yards. The difficulty in seeing was of course increased by the body having been run over by two heavy freight trains. The trains were proved to have been in good order, head-lights lit, all usual precautions taken, and the body not discovered until after it was run over the third time.

Now, if we apply the rule in Danner's Case [4 Rich. 329, 55 Am. Dec. 678] to this, and the defendant, the railroad company, has not met the requirements of that rule, then we are forced to the conclusion that practically the Danner rule means that the fact of killing stock means that the company is liable unless it can disprove negligence, which it cannot do. This question of negligence is a mixed question of law and fact, and may properly be considered by the court. It is hardly to be conceived that three trains on the same railroad, at the same point, on the same night, were manned by fiends in human shape, if the act was intentional, or if by gross negligence, who were so neglectful of their own lives and limbs, as well as the safety of passengers, merchandise, and trains, as to wantonly run the risk of derailing the train and producing a general wreck.

I do not see how the conclusion of negligence was reached. The body was clothed in blue cloth, placed in the middle of a curve, two heavy freight trains passed over it without knowing there was an obstruction. The third, a passenger train, and not so heavy, discovered the jar and stopped. The only evidence of carelessness is that of the plaintiff and the Rev. Mr. Crouse, who both acknowledged to their want of experience. Against this is the positive declaration of Mr. Clarkson, Mr. Alexander, and Mr. Fell (the former has thirty years' and the latter twenty-two *years' experience), who all say that the body could not have been seen over forty yards, or the train stopped under one hundred.

Ordinarily the finding of a referee, like the verdict of a jury, will not be disturbed, unless the same be manifestly against the weight of evidence, for the reason so frequently assigned that the witnesses are known to them, examined in their presence, and they have the best opportunity of judging of the credibility of the testimony of each. In this case, however, there is not the slightest allegation, or most remote suspicion, that these witnesses on either side have testified with prejudice. It so happened here that I have known Mr. Clarkson and his father's family for many years; he is a gentleman of birth, character, and education, as reliable a gentleman, I would say, as any man in the State. It is impossible to suppose that such a man would testify falsely to save his life, much less his position as a railroad conductor. Much stress was laid in the argument that after the train was stopped, and Mr. Clarkson had gone to the rear end, he saw the body lying on the track. He does not say that. "From rear end of train to body 125 or 150 yards; run it very quickly. I saw it from rear end of train, but was so indistinct, could not tell what it was." I am at a loss to conceive how the conclusion of negligence was attained. It would be a libel on human nature, under these circumstances, to come to such a conclusion. My conclusion of law, therefore, is that the defendant railroad is not liable for any injury caused by its trains running over the corpse.

But suppose the facts proved showed culpability on the part of the defendant railroad, would it be liable for more than the value of the clothing? A corpse has no value, and, what is more, this corpse has no value proved. I would stop here, but for the learned and classic argument of Mr. Youmans to disprove the time-honored maxim that a corpse is no one's property. I am not prepared to dispute the confident assertion of the learned counsel that my Lord Coke made a mistake in his etymology of the word cadaver, for I am not sufficiently versed in the classics to do that, but the argument inclines me to the opinion that he did; nor that he meant to say, "the right of burial," and not "a dead body." And here, I think, is the view of the argument: *the learned counsel has treated the right of burial the same as the right of property. Undoubtedly, if we threw a corpse in the street or dug it from the grave for dissection, an action would lie, not for the injury to the property in the corpse, but for the trespass; and the jury, in assessing damages, might well take into consideration the outrage against decency and humanity and the violence done to the feelings and sentiments of the family and friends of the deceased.

Coke was understood to say that "a dead body was the property of no one." No matter what he did say; this understanding, or misunderstanding, has come down to us as law. As to the meaning of "cadaver" there can be no doubt. It is now an English as well as Latin word. Webster and other lexicographers say it is a dead human body, a corpse. The maxim of Lord Coke, cadaver nullius in bonis, has been translated to our day in verbis, or in equivalent terms. Blackstone says: "But though the heir has a property in the monument and escheatons of his ancestors, yet he has none in their bodies or ashes." In Jacob Fisher's Digest it is said: "A dead body belongs to no one by law, and is, therefore, under the protection of the law." Wharton says: "Corpus humanum non recipit estimationem." Bishop has it: "There can be no property in a person deceased, consequently larceny cannot be committed of his body." And even the novelist says: "The heir has a property in the monuments of his ancestors, but none in their ashes."

This judgment is already longer than is my habit, but as the case has been very earnestly and elaborately argued, I am anxious to show to the learned counsel that I have given it a careful consideration. One more reflection. Formerly if a person was injured on a railroad by the negligence of the agents and servants of the company, the person so injured could maintain an action and recover damages against the company; but if the person was killed, the administrator could not maintain the action, it does not survive. An act of the legislature was required to enable the personal representatives to institute the suit. See A. A. 1859; Gen. Stat. 1872, 507; Gen. Stat. 1882, § 2183. Why? Because there was no property in the corpse. Certainly *that is the legislative construction in this view of the judicial construction above quoted.

If the administrator, before this special legislation, could not sue for the killing of his intestate, when the act might have been the grossest negligence, how can it be maintained that when the intestate was killed by an assassin, who placed the cadaver on the railroad track to secrete suspicion or discovery, the administrator may maintain an action for injury to the corpse in which there is no right of property, which never came into his possession, but had been buried out of sight two weeks before he could obtain his letters of administration? It seems to me this is conclusive. The right of action was granted because the railroad was the immediate cause of the death, and the killing deprived the family of the intestate of his protection and support. But here the murder was already done, the family had already been deprived of the protection and support of the murdered man. He was cold in death before the first train passed, suffered no pain, no terror, nor agony of a violent death; the spirit had taken its flight, and he lay a lifeless mass in the track of the fury-snorting iron monster that pursued its accustomed way night and day in the service of the public, under the sanction of the legislature. It does seem to me to establish such a precedent will open a wide door for fraudulent and painful litigation.

It is urged that cases decide there is a right of burial for the corpse. There is or ought to be. But the plaintiff only claims damages for running over, disfiguring, and mutilating the dead body—not a word about the right of burial, nor is there any evidence on the subject. In fact, there was no hindrance to the burial or the right of burial. Conductor Clarkson, I suppose acting under the popular idea that a murdered man, or one killed accidentally, could not be moved until the coroner was notified, left the body where he found it and gave the first notice of a corpse needing burial. In fact, it could not have been legally buried before an inquest was holden.

Let the complaint be dismissed.

Boni judicis est ampliari justitiam. 1 Burr., 304; 9 M. & W., 818.

Mr. J. H. Rion, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought by the plaintiff, appellant, as administrator of W. Scott Hook, deceased, to recover damages for the mutilation of the dead body of the intestate, and the destruction of the apparel in which it was clad, and of a silver watch at the time on the person of the deceased, all of which is alleged to have occurred by the gross negligence of the defendant company in running a train of cars over said dead body three several times. The defence denied negligence, and claimed that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The whole issue was by consent referred to a special referee to hear and determine the same. The referee found as matter of law that the action by the administrator could be sustained. As matter of fact, that the mutilation of the dead body, and the destruction of the wearing apparel resulted from the careless and negligent action of the defendant, and that the amount of the recovery was not limited to the value of the clothing, $30, and he found for the plaintiff $10,000 damages. The decision of the referee was reviewed by his honor, Judge Alrich, upon exceptions, who, finding that the alleged negligence by defendant had not been proved, and that the plaintiff could not maintain the action, as administrator, because he had no property in the dead body of his intestate, dismissed the complaint.

The plaintiff has appealed upon numerous exceptions, all of which, however, have been condensed by appellant's counsel in his argument into certain propositions found below, which we have considered, and upon which we will now announce our conclusions, without reference to the exceptions seriatim. The two first involve questions of procedure, as follows: 1. "This being an action at law, referred by consent to the referee to hear and deter*mine the whole issue, which being found in favor of the plaintiff both as to the law and fact, the plaintiff was at liberty to enter judgment on the referee's report; and the jurisdiction of the Circuit Judge, if any he had, was only to confirm the report and order judgment thereon." 2. "That if the Circuit Judge had other and further jurisdiction, in the most adverse view which he could legally take of plaintiff's rights, he could only have ordered a new trial, and have done this only in the event of the necessary preliminary steps being taken to warrant the exercise of such jurisdiction, which was not done."

If the reference in this case had been ordered and had before the adoption of the general statutes of 1882, the point raised in the first proposition above would not be so difficult, because then there was a section in the code which provided in terms that the report of a referee upon the whole issue should stand as a decision of the court, and judgment might be entered thereon in the same manner as if the action had been tried by the court. Old Code, § 296. And the practice under this section had been somewhat determined by the decisions of this court, especially in the case of Kirkland v. Cureton (4 S. C., 124), where the Circuit Court ordered judgment upon the report of the referee, subject to appeal to this court, and upon appeal this court held that in a case at law, as that was, the decision below upon questions of law only, material to the case, could be reviewed here, the facts found by the referee being regarded as finally adjudicated, and beyond review; citing the case of Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C., 531. This section, however, has been since stricken out (Gen. Stat. of 1882), and it is now no longer a part of the code, nor was it a part in 1883, when the order of reference was made in this case. It therefore has no application to the question now under discussion; nor has the case of Kirkland v. Cureton, supra, nor Chalk v. Patterson, 5 S. C., 290, relied on by appellant. On the contrary, sections 294 and 290 are the sections which now control in cases of this kind.

These sections, instead of authorizing judgment to be entered upon the report of the referee in the first instance, as formerly, and thereby becoming the judgment of the court, provide that the referee shall make his decision, stating the facts found and *conclusions of law separately, when it may be subject to review upon a case or exceptions in like manner and with like effect as in cases of appeal; and although the court authorized to make the review is not mentioned expressly, yet from the subsequent provisions in the same section, where it is provided that when the case shall have been heard and decided upon the report of the referee and exceptions, the decision may be reviewed by the Supreme Court, the implication is manifest and necessary that the Circuit Court is the court authorized to review in the first instance. So that there can be no doubt as to the jurisdiction of said court in such cases.

Now, what is the extent of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court in a case at law tried by a referee, when the decision of the referee is brought before it for review, as in the case at bar, is the next question. Section 294, supra, is the authority for the review, and it declares the extent of the power conferred. It provides that said review may be had in the same manner and to the same extent as appeal cases under section 290. In other words, it confers the same power upon the Circuit Courts as belongs to this court in appeals here. What is that power? This court, in cases at law, has jurisdiction only for the correction of errors of law. It has nothing to do with the facts, except to apply the law to the facts as found; the facts, as was said in Kirkland v. Cureton, supra, must "be regarded as finally adjudicated," whether found by a jury, or a referee substituted for the jury, and cannot be modified or reversed on appeal. Nor has the Circuit Court on the review of the referee's decision any such power. This court, as we have said, has power to correct and review the rulings of law below, and this may sometimes lead to a new trial, and sometimes to a dismissal of the complaint, and so may the action of the Circuit Court upon the review of the referee's decision, as that review is expressly authorized in like manner and with like effect as in cases of appeal. But neither this court nor the Circuit Court is empowered in a case at law to disregard the findings of fact by the referee or the jury, and to re-try the case on its merits. It is conceded, too, that the Circuit Court has power to set aside the decision of the referee *and to order a new trial for the reasons for which new trials are usually granted when the necessary steps are taken to that end.

Such being our judgment as to the power of the Circuit Court in such cases, it follows that we must hold that his honor, the Circuit Judge, was in error when he undertook to review the findings of fact of the referee, and to apply the law to the new state of facts as found by himself. We think he should have taken the facts as reported—should have regarded them as finally adjudicated, and have applied the law as they might demand, reversing or affirming the conclusions of law of the referee as, in his judgment, they were erroneous or correct.

Apart from the question of procedure, the appellant contends, next, that there is such property or interest in the dead body of a human being as to sustain an action for its wilful or negligent mutilation, and that the right of action in such cases belongs to the administrator of the deceased. This proposition raises three questions as applicable to the case at bar: 1. What is meant by the term property? 2. Can this property attach to the dead body of a human being? And, 3. If so, does it belong to the administrator?

The term property may be defined to be the interest which can be acquired in external objects or things. The things themselves are not, in a true sense, property, but they constitute its foundation and material, and the idea of property springs out of the connection, or control, or interest which, according to law, may be acquired in them, or over them. This interest may be absolute, or it may be limited and qualified. It is absolute when a thing is objectively and lawfully appropriated by one to his own use in exclusion of all others. It is limited or qualified when the control acquired falls short of the absolute, which may be the case sometimes for several reasons not necessary to be adverted to here. Now, to entitle one to bring action for an injury to any specific object or thing, he must have a property therein of the one kind or the other mentioned. If he has no such property, he can have no cause of action, however flagrant or reprehensible the act complained of may be. Can property, either absolute or qualified, be acquired in a corpse, and especially as in-

involved in the case under investigation, *can such property be acquired by the administrator of the deceased? As to absolute property, Mr. Blackstone says: "Though the heir has a property in the monuments and escutcheons of his ancestors, yet he has none in their bodies or ashes." 2 Bl. Com., 429. In Jac. Fish, Dig. it is said: "A dead body by law belongs to no one, and is therefore under the protection of the public." Mr. Bishop says: "There can be no property in a person deceased, consequently larceny cannot be committed of his body, but it can be of the clothes found upon the body, or of the shroud." Bish. Crim. L., § 792. Citing East P. C., 652; Hawkins' and Hale's Pleas of the Crown. Mr. Wharton says: "Corpus humanum non recipit estimationem." Whart. L. Max., 228. Lord Coke said: The "burial of the cadaver, nullius in bonis, caro data vermibus"; flesh given to the worms. Mr. Blackstone said again: "This is the case of stealing a shroud out of the grave, which is the property of those, whoever they may be, that buried the deceased, but stealing the corpse itself, which has no owner, (though a great indecency) is no felony, unless some grave's clothes be stolen with it." 4 Bl. Com., 235.

These are strong expressions from leading and distinguished authors, all tersely conveying the same doctrine and concurring to the full. We have been referred to no case by appellant in conflict with this doctrine, nor have we been able ourselves to find a case, or a single expression in any text-book, which affects it in the slightest degree. And that this should be so is not surprising. Because, while it is natural that we should all feel that the remains of ancestors and loved ones should be tenderly watched, and their decent interment carefully guarded, and the mutilation of their dead bodies and the disturbance of their sepulchres severely punished, and while all laws necessary to that end should be passed and strictly and sternly enforced, yet even for this purpose, to make such venerated remains the absolute property of any one, in the sense of objective appropriation, would be abhorrent to every impulse and feeling of our natures.

It is true, it is said that in some portions of Europe during the middle ages the law allowed a creditor to seize the dead body of his debtor, and in ancient Egypt the corpse of the father might be hypothecated by the son in order to borrow money. But *these were in semi-barbarous and heathenish times, and such ideas have no existence now in any portion of the globe. On the contrary, wherever civilization at least has dawned, or has commenced to throw even a flickering light upon the people, reverence for the dead has become a universal and a most sacred sentiment, one which would revolt at the idea of their remains becoming property, much less property in the sense of being appraised and placed upon the inventory of the administrator, subject to the payment of debts, and to distribution among the next of kin, which would be required by the law of this State if such remains could be regarded as property, and on that account passing to the administrator.

But can there not be a qualified property in the dead? one which gives control to some one with the view to protection, to decent interment, and to undisturbed repose, while they are dissolving and returning to the dust from which they were created? Can it be that there is no legal guardianship of the dead? And that when the life escapes the body is left, so far as the law is concerned, without protection, even from wanton and malicious depredation, and that those to whom it was bound in life by the tenderest of ties can invoke the aid of no court in preventing its mutilation? And must they resort to violence and force for this purpose? If such be the fact, it is a reproach to our judicial system, and one which calls earnestly for legislative interposition. And yet such seems to be the fact, at least the matter is left in great doubt, so far as our limited examination of the cases, both in this country and in England, amid the press of our duties, has enabled us to ascertain.

Certainly the administrator has no legal control or authority over the dead body of the person upon whose estate he has administered. His entire authority is derived from the act, by virtue of which his letters have been granted to him, and that gives him charge only of the "goods and chattels, rights and credits," which were of the deceased. The body of the intestate belongs to neither of these classes, and there is, therefore, no law for him to take it in charge. True, he is required to pay, as the first of debts, the funeral expenses, but it would be a violent assumption to conclude on that account that he becomes the legal custodian *of the remains, or even if he should, it could only be so as to the funeral and burial, because the expenses extend no further—they stop at the grave. The question would then arise, who could legally protect beyond that point, and in whose behalf could the law be invoked to redress an invasion of the tomb?

We have looked diligently through the common law reports of England, and have found no case in which the civil courts have been appealed to in matters connected with the bodies of the dead. On the contrary, their burial, the grave-yards and cemeteries in which they are interred, and the religious ceremonies observed, have been left exclusively to ecclesiastical cognizance, the civil courts universally holding, in the language of Lord Coke, that the burial of the cadaver is nullius in bonis. In some of the States upon this continent, especially in Rhode Island, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and New York, the courts, endeavoring to escape from this reproach, have held in general terms that the corpse belongs, not to the administrator, but to the next of kin, and that is as far as the cases referred to by appellant's counsel seem to go.

In the case of Pierce v. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery (10 R. L., 227 [14 Am. Rep. 667]), it was held that while a dead body is not property in the strict sense of the common law, it is quasi property, over which the relatives of the deceased have rights which the courts will protect. In the case of In re Widening Beekman Street (4 Bradf. Sur. [N. Y.] 503), it was held that the right to bury the corpse and to preserve its remains is a legal right which the courts will protect; that such right, in the absence of any testamentary disposition, belongs exclusively to the next of kin. In Bogert v. City of Indianapolis (13 Ind., 135), it was held that the bodies of the dead belong to the surviving relatives in the order of inheritance, as property. In Wynkoop v. Wynkoop (42 Pa. St., 293 [82 Am. Dec. 506]), it was held: "That a wife has no right or control over the body of her husband deceased, after burial. The disposition of the remains of the deceased belongs thereafter exclusively to his next of kin; that though it was her duty to bury the body, that as widow after interment her right ended."

Upon what authority or established principle of the common law these decisions were founded, even to the extent of legalizing the right of the nearest of kin, does not fully appear, but they *afford no support to the position that the administrator has any control whatever, which is the question here.

We have no case in our own reports upon the subject, certainly no case bearing upon the precise point before us, i. e., the rights of the administrator. In the absence of all authority, and looking at the act which authorizes administration, and defines the duties and powers of administrators, and describes the property which by operation of law becomes his, we are constrained to the conclusion that so far as this action is founded upon the mutilation of the deceased by the defendant company, whether accidental, wilful, or negligent, it cannot be sustained by the plaintiff, and that his honor, the Circuit Judge, was correct in so holding.

This, however, does not apply to the clothes in which the body was clad, and the silver watch upon the person. As to these, the administrator was the legal owner, and his appointment, though made after the occurrence, reached to the death, his title commencing at that time. As to these, then, the action was maintainable, and we think that his honor was in error in not so holding. Vauters v. Elders, 2 Mill Con. R., 184; Dealy v. Lance, 2 Speers, 487.

But the majority of this court having, in the case of Meetze v. C. C. & A. R. R. Co. (ante 1), determined that the Circuit Judge had the power to review and reverse the findings of fact of the referee, and he having exercised that power in this case—

The judgment of this court, therefore, is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Marion, April, 1884.

The opinion of this court fully states the case.

Messrs. Evans & Evans, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to recover a tract of land in Marion County, containing three hundred acres. The land was originally granted to Samuel Smith, Sr., who died intestate in 1843, leaving three children, viz., Samuel Smith, Jr., Elizabeth Moody, and Frances Page, wife of William Page, and among these heirs the lands of the intestate were divided by consent, the tract in question here falling to Frances Page.

It seems that William Page, by request of his wife, Frances, put his daughter, Isabella Platt, and her husband, David W. Platt, in possession of the land, at what time does not appear; but within a year after the division of her father's estate, Frances Page died, leaving as her heirs and distributees her husband, William, and children, viz., Samuel J. Page, John S. Page, Pinckney C. Page, Isabella (Mrs. Platt), Rena (Mrs. Bethen), Frances (Mrs. Watson), Polly (Mrs. Deer), Betsy (Mrs. Hayes), and William J. Page. On January 6, 1854, William Page executed a deed of the premises to Isabella Platt, "to have and to hold during her life, and after her death to be equally divided *between the lawful heirs of her body." On December 5, 1856, the sheriff of Marion County, under executions against D. W. Platt, sold all his interest in the premises, which was purchased by William J. Page and conveyed to him by the sheriff. On December 25, 1856, Samuel J., John S., Pinckney C., Rena (Mrs. Bethen), and Frances (Mrs. Watson), conveyed all their respective interests in the premises to W. J. Page, "in trust for the sole and separate use of Isabella Platt." The conveyance of Watson and wife did not, however, contain a relinquishment of Mrs. Watson's inheritance.

Isabella Platt, the life tenant, died in 1882, and the plaintiffs, her children, instituted this action for the recovery of the land against W. J. Watson and Catharine S., his wife, who, in some way or other not clearly explained, had "gone on the lands in 1873," and were still in possession. They insisted in their answer that they were in possession under Samuel Watson (brother of W. J.), who purchased the land for a valuable consideration, which, however, was not made to appear.

Upon hearing the pleadings and evidence, Judge Cothran granted a non-suit, and the plaintiffs appeal upon the grounds:

1. "The objections made by the defendants that the rule in Shelley's Case applied to the deed of William Page to Isabel Platt of date January 1, 1854, is erroneous. 1. That it is contrary to the decisions of our courts. 2. That the act of 1853, in force at the time of the execution of the deed of William Page to Isabel Platt, abrogates the rule in Shelley's Case, and this act is made of force by the general statutes of 1882.

II. "That the interest of David W. Platt, the husband of Isabel, was sold at sheriff's sale in August, 1855, and that interest vested in defendants, and there being no alienation by Isabel, the estate of Isabel at her death vested in the plaintiffs, at least to the extent of two-thirds, even under the rule in Shelley's Case, as, according to that rule, Isabel was entitled to the whole estate in fee, and the husband was entitled to one-third as distributee of his wife, and the sale in 1855 did not vest even that interest in defendants.

III. "Because his honor erred in holding that the defendants could not be sued at law, for the reason that W. J. Watson was a *co-tenant with plaintiffs, notwithstanding the proof that possession of the premises was demanded before suit, to which he replied, admitting that he was in possession, but denying title of the plaintiffs, and set up the statute of limitations as a bar to plaintiffs' claim, which was a complete ouster of the plaintiffs, and entitled them to sue at law even a co-tenant.

IV. "It was urged in argument that there might be an estate by the curtesy in David W. Platt, the surviving husband. To this it is submitted: 1. That the estate by the curtesy in this State only obtains when there is a fee conditional, and the deed here does not create a fee conditional. 2. That to constitute an estate by the curtesy there must be a seizin in fact at the time of the death of the wife, and Isabel was divested of possession by the sheriff's sale in 1855. 3. That even if there was an estate by the curtesy in David W. Platt, it could not avail the defendants, who claim by assignment under sheriff's sale in 1855, before the estate originated.

V. "Because his honor, having intimated the opinion that this was a proper case for equity jurisdiction, should, according to the liberal provisions of the code, have allowed plaintiffs to amend their pleadings and make it a case in equity." &c.

The Circuit Judge did not assign his reasons for granting the non-suit, and therefore we will have to consider the whole case to ascertain whether there is in the order error of law. As we understand it, the land in question, by the division of the estate of Samuel Smith, Sr., became the property of Frances Page, the wife of William Page, in 1843. She lived only about a year after she became the owner in severalty, and during that time she did not alienate it. True, her husband, William Page, with her consent as it is said, put it into the possession of his daughter, Isabel Platt, but there is no pretence that she joined her husband in a regular deed and relinquished her inheritance as was then required by law; and therefore at her death the land was her property and descended to her heirs—one-third to her husband, William Page, and the remaining two-thirds to her children, Samuel J., John S., and Pinckney C. Page, and Isabella (Mrs. Platt), Rena (Mrs. Bethen), Frances (Mrs. Watson), Polly (Mrs. Deer), Betsy (Mrs. Hayes), and William

J. Page. After the death of his wife, viz., January 6, 1854, William Page did undertake to convey the land to his daughter Isabel, "to have and to hold unto the said Isabel Platt during her natural life, and after her death to be equally divided between the lawful heirs of her body," but that deed conveyed no more than the third which belonged to William Page as heir of his wife.

At this point the estate divides, and we must consider the branches separately. First. As to the third inherited by William Page. Did the deed executed by him to Isabel Platt give her as expressed only a life estate with remainder over to the heirs of her body, or was her estate, under the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case, enlarged into a fee conditional giving her husband, Platt, who is still alive, a life estate therein by the curtesy? We incline to think that, according to terms of the deed itself, without regard to the provisions of the act of 1855, the rule in Shelley's Case is not applicable. The words are "to have and to hold unto the said Isabel Platt during her natural life, and after death to be equally divided between the lawful heirs of her body."

It is always open to inquiry whether the words "heirs" or "heirs of the body" are used in their proper technical sense or in a more inaccurate sense to denote children, issue, or next of kin, &c. It seems to us that the words here used indicate an intention to give in remainder to those described as heirs of the body of Isabel, not in indefinite succession as heirs, but at a particular time, absolutely as individuals creating "a new stock of inheritance." Myers v. Anderson, 1 Strobb. Eq., 314 [47 Am. Dec. 537]; McLure v. Young, 3 Rich. Eq., 576; Evans v. Godbold, 6 Rich. Eq., 26; McIntyre v. McIntyre, 16 S. C., 290. In the case of McLure v. Young, in delivering the judgment of the court, Chancellor Dunkin said: "The authorities all agree that if the estate limited to the heirs of the body or issue be of a quality to be given to be enjoyed in a way incompatible with the idea that they are to hold it in indefinite succession (as that it be given to them as tenants in common or to be equally divided between them), this takes it out of the rule in Shelley's Case, and the immediate heirs or issue take as purchasers."

But if we should be in error as to the general doctrine (and *we confess that the cases upon the subject are not all in accord), we suppose that the act of 1853 (Gen. Stat., § 1862) must have some bearing upon the question. The deed was executed after and therefore subject to the act, which declares that "whenever in any deed * * * an estate either in real or personal property shall be limited to take effect on the death of any person without heirs of the body, or issue, or issue of the body, or other equivalent words, such words shall not be construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, but a failure at the time of the death of such person."

There can be no doubt that this provision has special reference to the question of remoteness, with a view to sustaining remainders; but it would be strange if this statutory interpretation of certain words and phrases should not have some bearing also upon the construction of these identical words when used to designate those who are to take in remainder. The question of remoteness, if not entirely, is almost always identical with that as to indefinite succession, one being in most cases the cause of the other. If the terms of the deed to Isabel had been to her and the heirs of her body, and in default of such heirs then over, it is clear that the words "heirs of her body," under the statute, could not have been construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, but a failure at the time of the death of Isabel. As was said by Mr. Justice McIver, in Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C., 365: "In construing a will [and deed] which took effect after the passage of that act [1853], we are required to read a devise to one and the heirs of his body or to one and his issue, and in case of his death without heirs of his body or without issue then over to some one else, as if the gift were to one and the heirs of his body, and in case of his death without leaving issue living at the time of his death then over, in which case the limitation would undoubtedly be good," &c.

Now, as we understand it, the rule in Shelley's Case does no more than to turn an estate expressly for life into one precisely such as we have described above. When an estate for life is given to the ancestor, and a remainder be thereon limited to his heirs, or heirs of his body, the rule comes in and executes immediately the remainder in possession of the ancestor, who takes an estate in fee or in tail according to the terms of the limitation (Williams v. Foster, 3 Hill, 193): that is to say, it takes the words "heirs of the body" from the remainder and incorporates them in the gift to the first taker, thereby changing an estate expressly for life to one of inheritance, to him and "the heirs of his body." This being the case, and the statute forbidding that a particular interpretation shall be placed on the words "heirs of the body" when found in express terms, it can hardly be that the forbidden interpretation of the very words must be allowed where they are merely supplied by operation of the rule in Shelley's Case. So far as we are informed, this is a new question under the act of 1853. The argument was not full upon the subject, but from the lights before us, we do not see why the interpretation required by statute to be given to the words "heirs of the body," when found in a deed or will, should not also be applied to the same terms when raised and inserted merely by implication.

Assuming, then, that Mrs. Isabel Platt took only a life estate under the deed, it follows that the sale of the premises by the sheriff in 1856, under executions against David W. Platt, the husband of the life tenant, could give an interest only during the life of the said Isabel, and she being now dead, that such interest has terminated. It seems that the interest of David W. Platt thus sold by the sheriff was conveyed to William J. Page, trustee of Mrs. Isabel Platt. It was, however, assumed in the argument that that interest had been, in some way or other, transferred to the defendant, Watson. We have not been able to find any such statement in the "Case"; but if it were as claimed, we do not see how that could now benefit the defendant. The whole one-third interest, which was well conveyed by the deed of William Page, vested, at the death of Isabel Platt, in the persons who at that time answered the description of "heirs of the body" of the said Isabel: not, however, as such heirs, but as individuals by purchase.

Second. Then as to the two-thirds interest not covered by the aforesaid deed, but which, upon the death of Frances Page, descended to her heirs. In the first place, the plaintiffs, children of Isabel Platt, are entitled in their own right to the share *proper of their mother, Isabel. Besides, the other distributees, Samuel J. Page, John S. Page, Pinckney C. Page, Frances Watson and her husband, and Rena Bethea and her husband (seemingly for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the deed from their father, William Page, to Isabel), conveyed, or attempted to convey, their respective shares to William J. Page, in trust "for the sole and separate use of Isabel Platt." None of the other distributees are claiming any interest in the land except W. J. Watson, who, being a son of Frances Watson and a grandson of Frances Page, claims through his mother (supposed to be dead) an interest in the lands as heir of his grandmother. It appears that his father, Samuel Watson, and wife, Frances, in January, 1857, conveyed, as before stated, their interest in the lands to W. J. Page, trustee for Isabel. But it seems that the wife, Frances, did not renounce her inheritance, and W. T. Watson now insists that her share was not well conveyed, and, as one of her children, he has an interest as tenant in common with the plaintiffs; and therefore their action at law for the land cannot be maintained. On the other hand, the plaintiffs insist that the defendant, being in possession, refused on demand to yield possession, in whole or in part, and thereby ousted them and subjected himself to an action at law for the land.

We do not think it necessary to go into the matter of ouster, or to consider the question whether, under the facts as developed, an action at law for the land was the proper proceeding. The decision of that question either way would not tend to adjust the complicated interests of the parties. We agree with the Circuit Judge that this is a proper case for equitable jurisdiction. The parties are numerous, and in several ways and in different amounts are interested as tenants in common. The rights of the parties are somewhat involved, and can be more certainly reached under the flexible rules of equity. Both law and equity are now administered by the same court, and as the spirit of the code favors amendments in the interest of justice, we do not see any insuperable difficulty in the way of allowing plaintiffs to amend their complaint so as to ask partition according to the rights of the parties. Small v. Small, 16 S. C., 72; Graveley v. Graveley, 20 S. C., 110.

*In the case of Small v. Small, Mrs. Mary Small claimed a tract of land which she had purchased at sheriff's sale, but it turned out that the execution under which she purchased was good only against two of the parties who owned the land. It was held that the sheriff's deed only conveyed the interest of two to Mrs. Small, which made her a tenant in common with the other owners, who had a right to partition, and for that purpose the cause was remanded.

In the case of Graveley v. Graveley, it is said: "The spirit of the code is in favor of amendments, and of having all cases which have a status in court tried and decided upon their merits. In most cases where it can be done without surprise or injustice to the defendant, leave will be given to amend. We think the law upon the subject properly stated by Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Remedies, § 580: 'The prayer for relief is generally regarded as forming no part of the cause of action, and as having no effect, and as furnishing no test or criterion by which its nature may be determined. * * * The fact that, after the allegation of facts relied upon, the plaintiff has demanded judgment for a sum of money by way of damages, does not preclude the recovery of the same amount upon the same state of facts by way of equitable relief,' and authorities."

As it has turned out that the defendant is a tenant in common with the plaintiffs, I think that the cause should be remanded, with leave to make the question of partition. But as my brethren think that this court has not the power to remand with a view to amendment, and that the non-suit should be affirmed, the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON (concurring in the result). The land in question originally belonged to Mrs. Frances Page, assigned to her in the partition of the real estate of her deceased father in 1843. Immediately after this assignment Mrs. Platt was put into possession by Mr. and Mrs. Page. Mrs. Page died in 1844, leaving a husband, William Page, and nine children as her heirs at law, Mrs. Platt being one of the children. At the death of Mrs. Page the land descended to her heirs in the proportion of one-third to William Page, and one-ninth of two-thirds to each of the children. In 1854 William Page conveyed this land "to Mrs. Platt for life, and at her death to be equally divided between the lawful heirs of her body." Of course, this conveyance only covered his interest therein, i. e., one-third. I do not think that the rule in Shelley's Case applied to this conveyance. The fact that the grantor directed the estate to be "equally divided between the heirs of the body" of Mrs. Platt at the termination of her life estate shows, I think, that those words were used as words of purchase, and not of limitation. And this view is sustained by the authorities cited in the opinion of Mr. Justice McGowan.

I do not concur, however, in that part of the opinion in which it is held that the act of 1853 has abolished the rule in Shelley's Case. That act, as I understand it, was intended to remedy a certain evil which had grown up in the construction of deeds and instruments where limitations had been made upon the contingency of the first taker dying without heirs of the body. These words, "without heirs of the body," and similar words, had been interpreted to mean an indefinite failure of such heirs, or issue, and being thus interpreted, it was universally held that limitations made upon such a contingency were too remote, being in violation of the well established principle that no limitation could be made upon a contingency which might not happen within a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years thereafter. This construction, it was seen, had the effect of defeating many limitations against the evident intent of the parties. Hence the act of 1853, which provides that in such limitations, the parties in the use of such words, shall not be held to mean an indefinite failure of issue, but a failure at the death of the first taker, thus bringing the contingency within the legal time, removing this remoteness and saving the limitations. This, it seems to me, was the only purpose of the act of 1853, and it should not be extended so as to abolish the rule in Shelley's Case.

According to my conception of the rights of the parties in this case, the children of Mrs. Platt, the plaintiffs here, at her death took one-third interest in the land under the deed of William Page, as purchasers, that they took two-thirds of the one-ninth *which Mrs. Platt inherited from her mother, and two-thirds of the shares of those who conveyed to William J. Page in trust for her, supposing that these shares were validly conveyed, and in fee, the father, if he is alive, being entitled to one-third of these two latter interests. This construction makes the plaintiffs joint tenants with such of the children of Mrs. Page as did not convey their interests to William J. Page, as trustee, and the defendants belong to this last class. The action below was the ordinary action of trespass to try titles, which cannot be sustained by one joint tenant against another, unless there has been ouster. There was no sufficient proof of ouster at the trial. Hence, as it appears to me, there was no alternative but for his honor below to order a non-suit, which having been ordered, there is no room left for an amendment of the character allowed in the opinion.

It is true that the prayer for relief constitutes no part of the complaint, and consequently a mistake in the prayer is not fatal under the reformed procedure; inasmuch as all forms of actions have been reduced to one, the courts look to the cause of action as stated in the complaint, and will grant such remedy as the cause stated may demand, but that relief, whatever it is, must be appropriate to allegations in the complaint constituting the cause of action. I do not understand that a party can sue upon one cause of action and obtain relief upon another not stated in the complaint. Nor can a plaintiff who has lost his case, as stated in the complaint, after such loss abandon that cause, and then incorporate a new and entirely different cause in the same proceeding and go on. This, it seems to me, is what the opinion of Mr. Justice McGowan permits to be done.

The plaintiffs began a law case, an action to try titles; there was no equitable feature therein, no facts claiming partition, or any facts upon which the court could grant any other relief than that prayed for in the complaint. In appeals to us in a case at law, our power extends to the correction of errors of law only. I do not understand that the Circuit Judge made any ruling upon the question of amending the complaint, and therefore I do not see how we can take any action upon that question, as there is no error of law alleged. For these reasons I concur in the result.

*Mr. Justice McIVER (also concurring in the result). It seems to me that, in any view which may be taken of this case, there was no error in the judgment appealed from. If the deed from William Page to Isabella Platt created in her an estate in fee conditional, then upon her death her husband, David W. Platt, became entitled to the premises as tenant by the curtesy, and until his death, of which there is no evidence, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover. Whether the defendants hold the interest thus vested in David W. Platt is wholly immaterial, as long as it does not appear that the plaintiffs have acquired such interest, for nothing is better settled than that in an action of this kind the plaintiffs must recover upon the strength of their own title, and not upon the weakness of their adversaries. It is quite sufficient for a defendant to show an outstanding paramount title in some third person, whether he connects himself with such title or not, in order to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff.

But if, on the other hand, the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply, and Isabella Platt took under the deed above mentioned an estate for her life only with a valid remainder to the heirs of her body, then it is clear that plaintiffs, being tenants in common with defendants, could not recover in this action without proof of ouster: and in my judgment there was no such proof in this case. Two things are relied upon by the appellants as evidence of ouster: 1st. The refusal of defendants to comply with the demand of the plaintiffs for the possession of the premises. 2nd. The plea of the statute of limitations. It will be observed, however, that the demand was not to be let in possession as tenants in common, which, if refused, might possibly have been regarded as sufficient evidence of ouster, but the demand was that defendants should surrender the possession of the premises to the plaintiffs, and this a tenant in common might well refuse, inasmuch as he would be just as much entitled to the possession as the plaintiffs. So, too, as to the effect of the plea of the statute of limitations that was pleaded to a complaint demanding, not an undivided share or shares of the premises, but for the whole of the land, and the plea of the statute to such a demand certainly should not be regarded as any evidence of ouster. I think, therefore, that the Circuit Judge was clearly right in granting the non-suit.

The only remaining inquiry is whether this court, after finding no error in the judgment appealed from, can grant an amendment for the purpose, not of repairing any defect or omission in the action which the plaintiffs elected to bring, but for the purpose of enabling the plaintiffs, who had failed to establish the cause of action upon which they relied, to substitute an entirely new and different cause of action to which the evidence in the case shows they may be entitled. It must be remembered that this was an action at law, in which our jurisdiction is confined solely to the correction of any errors of law which may be discovered in the judgment appealed from. If, therefore, no such errors have been discovered, it seems to me plain that we have no other alternative but to affirm the judgment. I am aware that under the liberal provisions of the code this court has gone very far, perhaps too far, in allowing amendments; but it seems to me that we are asked in this case to go further than we ever yet have done. There was no application in the Circuit Court for leave to amend, which, if made and refused, might possibly have afforded us the opportunity of reviewing such refusal, although such applications, being addressed to the discretion of the court, are ordinarily not appealable. But there being no ruling upon the subject below, we do not see what there is for us to review.

Nor is this like the case of Finley v. Robertson (17 S. C., 435), where this court, having discovered such errors in the judgment appealed from as rendered it necessary to remand the case to the Circuit Court, allowed the plaintiffs to amend their complaint so as to fit the new aspect which was put upon the case by the judgment of this court; for in the present case we have not discovered any error in the judgment appealed from which renders it necessary, or even proper, to remand the case to the Circuit Court, and I do not see by what authority this court can reverse a judgment in which no error has been discovered simply to enable the plaintiffs to make not only a substantial, but a radical change in the nature of the action which the plaintiffs themselves elected to bring. Indeed, even under the liberal provisions of the code, the privilege of amendment is not unlimited, for in section 194 this privilege is limited to such amendments as do not "change substantially the claim or defence."

The case of Small v. Small (16 S. C., 64) was a case originally for partition, in which the devisees of Mary Small set up title in themselves, and their claim was sustained by the Circuit Judge, but this court on appeal reversed or modified the Circuit decree upon this point, and held that these devisees were only entitled to two shares in the land, and not to the whole land. The case was therefore remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of enabling the parties to have partition as originally asked, in the proportions fixed by the judgment of the Supreme Court. I am unable to see, therefore, how that case affects the question now under consideration. Nor do I see the application of the case of Graveley v. Graveley (20 S. C., 93), for in that case also this court found it necessary to remand the case, not simply for the purpose of amendment, and then allowed the plaintiff to insert additional allegations in the complaint, which, however, did not change substantially the claim originally made.

It seems to me, therefore, that this court has no power to remand this case to the Circuit, simply for the purpose of enabling the plaintiffs to make the proposed amendment, but that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

I desire to add, however, that I do not assent to the view presented by Mr. Justice McGowan as to the effect of the act of 1853 upon the rule in Shelley's Case. Nor am I prepared to agree to the view of the Chief Justice that the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply to the present case. It does not appear to me that the decisions in Myers v. Anderson (1 Strobb. Eq., 344 [47 Am. Dec. 537]); McLure v. Young (3 Rich. Eq., 571); and McIntyre v. McIntyre (16 S. C., 290), sustain that view. In Myers v. Anderson, after the bequest for life, the limitation was to the issue to be their "absolute property for ever," and these words were held to mean the same thing as if the limitation had been to the issue and their heirs, which would create a fee in the issue and rebut the idea that the testator intended that the property should go to the issue in indefinite succession. In McLure v. Young the limitation was to the lineal descendants of the life tenant, "absolutely and for ever," creating in them a fee which, upon the authority of Myers v. Anderson, was held to negative the idea that the intention was that the property should go to the lineal descendants in indefinite succession. So in McIntyre v. McIntyre the limitation was to the issue "and their heirs for ever," the appropriate words to create a fee; and there, too, it was held that the idea of indefinite succession was negated.

It seems to me, therefore, that these cases only hold that where the limitation to issue or heirs of the body is expressed in terms which import an intention to create in them an estate in fee simple—a different estate from that which they would take if the rule in Shelley's Case should be applied—then that rule would not apply. In the present case, the limitation is not to the issue and their heirs, nor to the issue "absolutely and forever," nor to the issue to be their "absolute property forever," but the limitation is, "after her death to be equally divided between the lawful heirs of her body." These cases cannot, therefore, be regarded as authority for the proposition that the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply in the present case. It is true that in McLure v. Young, Chancellor Dunkin, quoting the language of Johnstone, Ch., in Myers v. Anderson, does say: "The authorities also agree that if the estate limited to the heirs of the body or issue be of a quality, or be given to be enjoyed in a way, incompatible with the idea that they are to hold it in indefinite succession (as if it be given to them as tenants in common, or to be equally divided between them), this takes it out of the rule in Shelley's Case, and the immediate heirs or issue take as purchasers."

This, however, was a mere dictum so far as it relates to the effect of superadded words expressive of an intention that the issue should take as tenants in common or that the property should be equally divided between them, for there were no such words either in Myers v. Anderson or McLure v. Young, and the decisions in those cases rested solely upon the ground that the superadded words were expressive of an intention that the issue should take estates in fee simple, and not upon the ground that they were to take as tenants in common, or that the property should be equally divided between them. Now, while even the dicta of such eminent chancellors are entitled to be regarded ed with "the greatest respect (and I do not wish to be regarded as disposed to question them), yet they are not authority. All that I desire to say is that I do not regard the cases above cited as authority for the proposition that the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply in the present case; but as, according to my view, it is not necessary now to decide that question, I prefer to reserve my opinion until I can have an opportunity to examine the question more carefully than I have been able now to do, owing to the pressure of other official duties.

Judgment affirmed.

23 S. C. 57

FELDMAN & CO. v. CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON.

STANLEY v. SAME.

[1. Municipal Corporations ⇨910.]

A large portion of the city of Charleston having been laid waste by fire, the legislature authorized the City Council to issue its bonds and lend them to persons who desired to rebuild in the burnt district. Bonds of said city, called "Fire Loan Bonds," were accordingly issued and lent after the year 1868, and put upon the market. Held, that these bonds were not valid obligations of the city.

[2. Taxation ⇨38.]

The legislature has no power to levy taxes for the purpose of assisting private individuals in carrying out private enterprises, even though incidental advantages may result to the public.

Under art. I, § 41, of the constitution of 1868, the taxing power of the legislature, even in the absence of any express restrictions upon them, can be exercised only for some public purpose.

Authority given to a municipal corporation to issue bonds, necessarily involves the power to levy taxes for their payment.

Where bonds were issued by a city to be lent "to such applicants as will build up and rebuild the waste places and burnt districts of said city, or erect improvements upon their lots." Held, that the bonds so issued and lent were for private purposes, notwithstanding advantages might incidentally accrue to the city.

6. This case distinguished from cases sustaining local taxation in aid of railroads; and also from the case of Herndon v. Moore, 18 S. C. 339.

[7. Constitutional Law ⇨48.]

In doubtful cases the constitutionality of an act of the legislature will be affirmed, but it is for the courts, not the legislature, to determine whether a statute is beyond the powers granted to the legislature; and *when that body has clearly overstepped its constitutional powers, it is the right and the duty of the courts to so declare.

[8. Municipal Corporations ⇨934.]

As the City Council had no power to create the obligation, their payment of interest on these Fire Loan Bonds, their suits upon the securities received in exchange therefor, and the purchase by them in market of such their bonds, do not estop the city from now disputing the validity of these bonds.

Before Witherspoon, J., Charleston, November, 1883.

The opinion of this court fully states these two cases. The Circuit decree in the cause first stated, B. Feldman & Co. v. The City Council of Charleston, was as follows:

This cause came on for trial by the court. The complaint is filed in this case to establish the liability of the defendants for coupons due on certain obligations known as "Fire Loan Bonds." The defence set up in answering is that the "defendants are advised that the issue of said bonds was unconstitutional, and that the City Council are not liable for the same." It appears that the bonds in question were issued subsequent to the adoption of the constitution of 1868.

The history of the bonds now in issue is briefly stated. On August 28, 1866, the City Council of Charleston, "for the purpose of aiding in the rebuilding of the city of Charleston, a great part of which is now (then) lying in ruins," passed an ordinance authorizing the mayor of the city, in the name of the City Council, to issue certain bonds, not to exceed in amount $2,000,000. In the ordinance special provision is made to secure the city, as far as it could be done, against loss, because of the assistance so afforded in rebuilding the city. On December 19, 1866, the ratification of this ordinance was made by the legislature of the State in its act "giving authority to the City Council of Charleston to proceed in the matter of a fire loan, with a view to aid in building up the city anew." On February 28, 1870, the legislature declared that "authority is hereby given to the City Council of Charleston to amend an ordinance entitled 'An ordinance to aid in rebuilding the burnt district and waste places, ratified the 28th August, 1866,' which said ordinance was confirmed and ratified by an act of the general assembly passed September 19, 1866.

*The issue of the bonds in question depends on the power of the legislature to give validity, by its ratification of it, to this ordinance of the City Council. It is otherwise stated simply, equivalent to the question of the power of the legislature to issue these bonds. This question must be regarded as having been too distinctly decided by the highest tribunal in this State to be now disturbed. In Copes v. City of Charleston (10 Rich., 491), the Court of Errors said, in de-judging the question whether the terms of the charter were "sufficient to cover the power exercised by the City Council in subscribing to railroads," that there were "no restrictions in legislative power which in this State is vested by the constitution in the general assembly except those which deny certain powers, or which by implication arise because certain powers are conferred by Congress. So far as legislative power is concerned, subject to the restrictions suggested, the general assembly have all the powers of the parliament of Great Britain." The validity of the subscription was sustained. In 1872, the principle of this decision was brought under review in the case of Gage v. Charleston (3 S. C., 491), and the court reaffirmed the decision in Copes v. Charleston. In Brown v. C. & L. R. R. Co. (13 S. C., 290, November term, 1879), the court said: "There is no constitutional restriction depriving the legislature of the power of authorizing counties to incur obligations."

In this case, the general assembly of the State was fully advised of the purpose contemplated by the City Council for which this and the like bonds were to be issued. The ratification of the ordinance manifested by the act giving authority to the City Council was so clearly the expression that it was for a public and not a private purpose, that without the judicial exposition of the legislative power, and the subsequent ratification in 1870, it cannot be supposed that the power given to the City Council was outside of the power it had under the constitution.

If the question before the court was involved in doubt, the language of the State Supreme Court, in Ex parte Lynch (16 S. C., 32), would direct me in the judgment I must render. "The constitutionality of the law (said the court) must be presumed until the violation of the constitution is proved beyond all *reasonable doubt, and a reasonable doubt must be solved in favor of the legislative action and the act be sustained." This act is not of recent date. These bonds have been issued; have passed through various hands without question as to their validity, and it would be necessary that the alleged violation of the constitution should be plainly demonstrated before the court would declare the bonds invalid. I must conclude that the legislature did not exceed its power in authorizing the issue of these bonds, and the judgment of the court is that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief asked for.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the above named plaintiff do recover judgment against the City Council of Charleston for, &c.

In the case of Robert B. Stanley v. the same defendant, the same decree was rendered.

From these two decrees, the defendants appealed upon the following exceptions: "I. That his honor erred in not dismissing the complaints in the said cases when he found that the bonds and coupons set forth in the complaints were issued by the defendants after the adoption of the constitution of 1868. II. That his honor erred in not dismissing the complaints on the ground that the issue of the bonds and coupons set forth in the complaints were in violation of section 23 of article I., and section 8 of article IX., of the State constitution of 1868. III. That his honor erred in holding that the bonds and coupons sued on in the complaint stand on the same footing as bonds issued in aid of railroads and are governed by the same principles. IV. That his honor erred in not dismissing the complaints on the ground that the issue of said bonds and coupons was in violation of article 5 of the amendments of the constitution of the United States."

Messrs. G. D. Bryan and B. H. Rutledge, for appellants.

Messrs. A. G. Magrath, S. Lord, and Simmons & Seigling, contra.

April 23, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, involving the same *principles, were argued and will be considered together. They grow out of the following state of facts: All the buildings on a very large portion of the city of Charleston having been destroyed by fire, the City Council passed an ordinance on August 28, 1866, providing for the issue of bonds of the said city to an amount not exceeding $2,000,000, to be loaned to individuals for the purpose of enabling them to "build up and rebuild the waste places and burnt districts of the city of Charleston, or erect improvements upon their lots," under such terms and regulations as were prescribed in the ordinance. Doubts being entertained as to the power of the City Council to accomplish the proposed object "without the permission and license of the general assembly," an act was passed by that body September 19, 1866, which, after setting out in full the ordinance which had been passed by the City Council, declared: "That all and singular the provisions of the aforesaid ordinance of the City Council of Charleston be, and the same are hereby, authorized and confirmed; and authority is hereby given to the said City Council of Charleston to proceed in the premises and to carry into effect the foregoing provisions."

In pursuance of the provisions of this ordinance, the City Council of Charleston, from time to time, issued its bonds, commonly called "Fire Loan Bonds," and loaned the same to various individuals, under the terms and regulations prescribed. The plaintiffs in the cases above stated, being the owners and holders of some of these bonds, all of which were issued after the adoption of the constitution of 1868, brought these actions on certain past due coupons of said bonds, and the defence set up was that the act authorizing the issue of these bonds is unconstitutional, and that therefore the City Council is not liable for the same. The Circuit Judge held that the question was concluded by the cases of Copes v. City of Charleston (10 Rich., 491), Gage v. Charleston (3 S. C., 491), and State ex rel. Brown v. C. & L. R. Co. (13 Id., 290), and rendered judgment for the plaintiffs in both of these cases. From these judgments defendants appeal and present for our adjudication the single question as to the constitutionality of the law authorizing the issue of the bonds in question.

*It is not denied that if the legislature could itself lawfully authorize the issue of the bonds, it could lawfully delegate such authority to the City Council, and therefore the real question for us to determine is whether the legislature had the power to issue the bonds for the purposes stated. It will not be denied that the power to issue the bonds necessarily implied the power to levy taxes to provide for the payment thereof; and therefore the inquiry is narrowed down to the question whether the legislature has the power to levy taxes for the purpose of assisting private individuals in carrying out private enterprises, even though such private enterprise may result in incidental advantages to the public.

The power to levy taxes is essential to the existence of any government, but it is not, and from the very nature of the subject cannot be, an unlimited power. Even in the absence of any express constitutional restriction it cannot be said that the power of the legislature to impose taxes is unlimited, for that would necessarily imply that the legislature, under the guise of imposing taxes might exercise the power of confiscation. Hence it seems to be universally conceded, even by those who are disposed to enlarge the taxing power of the legislature to its greatest extent, that a law authorizing taxation for any other than a public purpose is void. As is said by Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 487): "Everything that may be done under the name of taxation is not necessarily a tax; and it may happen that an oppressive burden imposed by the government, when it comes to be carefully scrutinized, will prove, instead of a tax, to be an unlawful confiscation of property, unwarranted by any principle of constitutional government."

In Allen v. Jay (60 Me., 124, 11 Am. Rep., 185) it is said: "A tax is a sum of money assessed under the authority of the State on the person or property of an individual for the use of the State. Taxation, by the very meaning of the term, implies the raising of money, for public uses, and excludes the raising if for private objects and purposes." In Lowell v. City of Boston (111 Mass., 454, 15 Am. Rep., 45) we find this strong language: "The power to levy taxes is founded on the right, duty, and responsibility to maintain and administer all the governmental functions *of the State, and to provide for the public welfare. To justify any exercise of the power requires that the expenditure which it is intended to meet shall be for some public service, or some object which concerns the public welfare. The promotion of the interests of individuals, either in respect of property or business, although it may result incidentally in the advancement of the public welfare is, in its essential character, a private and not a public object. However certain and great the resulting good to the general public, it does not, by reason of its comparative importance, cease to be incidental. The incidental advantage to the public, or to the State, which results from the promotion of private interests, and the prosperity of private enterprises or business, does not justify their aid by the use of public money raised by taxation, or for which taxation may become necessary. It is the essential character of the direct object of the expenditure which must determine its validity as justifying a tax, and not the magnitude of the interests to be affected, nor the degree to which the general advantage of the community, and thus the public welfare, may be ultimately benefited by their promotion." To the same effect see Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall., 655 [22 L. Ed. 455]), and Parkersburg v. Brown (106 U. S., 487 [1 Sup. Ct. 442, 27 L. Ed. 238]).

When in addition to this we find that the constitution of 1868, in art. I., sec. 41, expressly declares that "the enumeration of rights in this constitution shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people," we think there can be no doubt that even in the absence of any express restriction upon the taxing power of the legislature such power can only be exercised for some public purpose, and that whenever it is attempted to be exercised for a private purpose, it is the duty of the courts to declare such legislation void.

Our next inquiry is, whether the purpose for which the bonds in question were issued, and which necessarily involved the power to levy taxes for their payment, was a public purpose. The purpose, as declared by the ordinance, which has been ratified by the act of the legislature, was "to make loans of said bonds to such applicants as will build up and rebuild the waste places and burnt districts of the city of Charleston, or erect improvements *upon their lots." That this was a private, and not a public purpose, seems to us clear. The real object was to loan the credit of the city to private individuals to afford them aid in repairing their losses occasioned by a disastrous fire. It was practically nothing more nor less than lending the credit and funds of the city to private individuals to aid them in building on their own lots dwellings, stores, warehouses, or such other structures as their interest or convenience might prompt, for their own individual use, and to promote their own individual comfort or gain. There was nothing whatever in it of a public nature. The public were not to have any interest in, or control over, the structures which were thus to be erected by the aid of the public funds, but they were for the sole use, and under the exclusive control, of the individual owners, precisely like any other private property owned by any other private individuals residing or owning property in the city.

We cannot conceive how it is possible to invest the manifest purpose of this loan on the part of the city with a public character. It is true that there would be incidental advantages accruing to the city by the increase of its taxable values, and in various other ways that might be suggested, but these are mere incidental advantages which attend any improvements made in a city, even where they are exclusively the work of private individuals, made with their own private funds, and cannot, therefore, have the effect of converting the purpose from a private into a public purpose. These views are fully sustained by the cases of Allen v. Jay, Loan Association v. Topeka, Parkersburg v. Brown, and Lowell v. City of Boston, cited above.

It is argued, however, and the Circuit Judge rested his decision upon such argument, that the question is concluded by the decisions which maintain the constitutionality of acts affording aid in the construction of railroads. It is true that the constitutionality of such legislation seems to be settled by the weight of authority, though grave doubts have been entertained by some whose authority is entitled to the highest consideration as to the correctness of such decisions. Conceding, however, for the purposes of this case, that such legislation is constitutional, we think that it does not by any means follow that such decisions are conclusive of the question now under consideration. Most of these cases recognize fully the doctrine which we have laid down in this opinion, that the power of taxation is not unlimited, and that it cannot be exercised except for some public purpose. In one of the leading cases on the subject (Sharpless v. Mayor of Philadelphia, 21 Penn. St., 160 [59 Am. Dec. 759]), in which Black, C. J., in an elaborate opinion, sustains the constitutionality of legislation in aid of railroad companies, that distinguished jurist expressly admits "that a law authorizing taxation for any other than public purposes is void," and he rests his decision upon the ground that the construction of a railroad is a public purpose, and hence that it is one of the objects for which taxation may be used.

So in Olcott v. The Supervisors (16 Wall., 678 [21 L. Ed. 382]), while considering a similar question, Mr. Justice Strong says: "No one contends that the power of a State to tax, or to authorize taxation, is not limited by the uses to which the proceeds may be devoted. Undoubtedly taxes may not be laid for a private use." But he goes on to argue that railroads, although owned and constructed by private corporations, are public highways; that the right of eminent domain, which can only be exercised for public purposes, may be exerted to facilitate their construction; and that they are open to the use of the public under such regulations as may be prescribed, and therefore he concludes that the construction of a railroad is such a public purpose as to warrant the imposition of taxes in aid of its construction.

In Dillon on Mun. Corp., § 105b, after speaking of the various decisions which seem to have established the constitutionality of legislation in aid of the construction of railways, that distinguished author says: "But it is obvious, from this statement of the grounds upon which the validity of such legislation rests, that it furnishes no support for the validity of taxation in favor of enterprises and objects which are essentially private. We consider the principle equally sound and salutary, that the mere incidental benefits to the public or the State, or any of its municipalities or divisions, which result from the pursuit by individuals of ordinary branches of business or industry, do not constitute a public use in the legal sense which justifies the exercise either of the power of eminent domain or of taxation."

"We are satisfied that the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge cannot be sustained by the decisions sustaining the constitutionality of legislation in aid of the construction of railways.

It may be, and has been, said that while the power of taxation is limited, so that it can only be applied to a public purpose, yet it is for the legislature, and not for the courts, to determine what are public as contradistinguished from private purposes; and that when the legislature has passed an act granting aid to any enterprise, it must be assumed that they had first determined that the purpose or object which they had in view was a public purpose, as it cannot be properly assumed that the legislature would wilfully transcend its constitutional powers. If, as we have seen, the power of taxation is limited by the use to which it is to be applied, and if the legislature is restricted in the exercise of the taxing power by the use to which the taxes are to be applied, it would be strange indeed if it was to be the final judge as to the limits within which its own power is restricted. This, as we have said, in discussing a similar question in the recent case of Whaley v. Gaillard, Treasurer (21 S. C., 560), would amount to no restriction at all.

If the same body whose power is intended to be restricted is to finally determine when it has reached the limits beyond which it is forbidden to go, there would be, practically, no limitations upon its powers. As we understand it, one of the very objects for which this court was constituted, was to determine finally, not only the construction, but also the constitutionality of the laws passed by the law-making power. True, as has been well said, in Ex parte Lynch (16 S. C., 32): "It is a delicate thing to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional. * * * Implied limitations of legislative power are only admissible where the implication is necessary. * * * The constitutionality of a law must be presumed until the violation of the constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt, and a reasonable doubt must be solved in favor of legislative action, and the act be sustained." But when the legislature has clearly overstepped its constitutional powers, it is not only the right, but the duty, of this court so to declare.

all dispute that the legislature has no power to impose taxes, except for some public purpose, and we think it equally clear, not only from reason, but from authority entitled to the highest consideration, that the purpose of the act under consideration was to aid private individuals in carrying out private enterprises, and therefore that the purpose of the act was private, and not public, although such enterprises might prove of incidental advantage to the public. In Allen v. Jay, supra, an act authorizing a town to loan its credit to certain private individuals to aid them in establishing a mill and factory in such town was declared unconstitutional, although the establishment of such an enterprise in the town would prove to be of incidental advantage to the public. In Loan Association v. Topeka, supra, an act authorizing the city of Topeka to issue bonds to be used in aid of the establishment by a private corporation in said city of shops for the manufacture of iron bridges and works of that kind was declared unconstitutional, because of the fact that the purpose to be accomplished was a private and not a public purpose, although it was conceded that the establishment of such works would be of collateral advantage to the public. In Parkersburg v. Brown, supra, an act authorizing the city of Parkersburg to issue its bonds for the purpose of lending the same to persons engaged in manufacturing in or near said city was declared to be unconstitutional on similar grounds. Finally, in Lowell v. Boston, supra, an act, which in no essential particular differs from the one now under consideration, authorizing the city of

Boston to issue its bonds and loan the same "to the owners of land, the buildings upon which were burned by the fire in said Boston," for the purpose of aiding such persons in rebuilding, was declared to be unconstitutional upon the same grounds, notwithstanding the magnitude of the calamity from the effects of which it was desired to relieve the sufferers.

Now, there can be no doubt that, in each and all of these cases, as well as in the case now under consideration, the principal motive which prompted the legislature to adopt the legislation in question was the belief that thereby the public welfare would be promoted by securing the completion of enterprises which would add to the taxable values of the several towns or cities, and in various other ways promoting the interests of the public. But this was not held to be sufficient, and could not properly be so held; for the same reasoning would authorize the extension of aid to any enterprising private individual who desired to enlarge his business, and did not have the means of doing so without aid from the public treasury: for if his business was enlarged, the taxable values of the community would be increased, and many other incidental advantages would accrue to the public. Yet no one would contend that a grant of legislative aid in such a case would be valid, notwithstanding the incidental benefits which the public might thereby receive, because the purpose to which the public money was to be applied would be essentially private and not public, and therefore wholly unauthorized. So in the case now under consideration the purpose to which it is proposed to apply the public money is essentially private and not public. The buildings to be erected by the aid of the public money would still remain the private property of the owners, under their exclusive control and for their sole use, just as much so as any other private property in the city.

We are entirely satisfied, therefore, that the act in question is without constitutional authority and void. From this it follows that the bonds in question constitute no valid obligation of the city of Charleston and hence no action can be maintained to enforce their payment.

It is argued, however, that the usage and practice of the various departments of the State government have so fully recognized these bonds that it is too late now to question their validity; and the case of Herndon v. Moore (18 S. C., 339) is relied upon. That case, however, differs in many essentials from this. There, the power of the Court of Probate to make partition of real estate had been repeatedly recognized both by the legislative and judicial departments of the government, and rights had been acquired, titles vested, and money paid upon the faith of such recognitions of these two departments of the government, and to relieve parties who had thus acted upon the confidence which they might naturally repose in the combined action of these two departments of the government, the doctrine of communis error facit jus, admitted to be an exceptional doctrine, was applied. But in the case now under consideration, we do not find any such combined action of these two departments of the government. On the contrary, on every occasion where these bonds have been brought before the courts, the constitutionality of the legislation authorizing their issue has been assailed; and we are not informed of any instance in which any court has assumed or acted upon the assumption that such bonds constituted valid obligations of the city of Charleston.

It is true that there are instances in which the old fire loan sterling bonds, issued by the State, under the act of 1838, have been recognized as valid obligations, though no instance has been brought to our attention in which the constitutionality of the act authorizing their issue has been raised. But we are not dealing with that class of bonds. They were issued under the former constitution of the State, and rest upon a different foundation from the fire loan bonds issued by the city of Charleston since the adoption of the constitution of 1868, and it is the validity of these alone that we are now called upon to consider.

Again, it is said that the City Council of Charleston are estopped by their own acts from disputing the validity of these bonds; by paying interest on them from time to time, by purchasing them in the market, and by suing the bonds of private individuals to whom these fire loan bonds have been issued. If the City Council was never invested with power to issue the bonds, it is difficult to understand how any act they might do could estop them from disputing their validity. If they could not create the obligation by the formal act of signing the bonds, through their proper officer, under the seal of the corporation, we cannot conceive what other act could give the bonds any greater validity. It may well be that it is not only the right, but the duty of the City Council to collect from those who have borrowed the amounts due by them, and apply the same to the payment of the fire loan bonds; and that by proper proceedings they may be compelled so to do (Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S., 487 [1 Sup. Ct. 442, 27 L. Ed. 238], and City Council of Charleston v. Caulfield, 19 S. C., 201), but that is not the question now before us. All that we are now called upon to determine is whether the bonds, from which the coupons sued upon in these cases were taken, constitute valid obligations of the City

*Council of Charleston, which can be enforced by judgment; and we hold that they are not. That the payment of interest on these bonds does not constitute an estoppel. See Loan Association v. Topeka, supra.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court in each of the cases named at the head of this opinion be reversed, and that the complaint in each of said cases be dismissed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Anderson, July, 1883.

This was an action commenced January 30, 1883, by Lawrence C. Chamblee in behalf of himself and other taxpayers of certain townships of Anderson County against Milton P. Tribble, treasurer, and Thos. J. Webb, auditor of said county, to restrain the threatened sale of their property for the non-payment of the taxes or assessments laid upon them to meet the subscriptions made by their townships to the Savannah Valley Railroad Company. By order of court the railroad company was also made a defendant. The complaint alleged that there was no tax; that the assessments were levied under the direction of the railroad company; that the act of March 12, 1878, authorizing the subscription and assessments was in violation of art. II., § 20, of the constitution, being defective in its title; also of art. IX., § 8, the taxes not being for corporate purposes; also of art. I., § 14; and that the assessments had not been properly entered by the auditor upon his duplicate.

The answer denied plaintiffs' right to an injunction, and set forth the regularity of all proceedings under the law leading down to the distress under tax executions; and the illegality of the tax was denied.

Upon these pleadings, and the evidence taken by a referee, the Circuit Judge passed the following decree:

When the case was called for hearing defendants' counsel denied the jurisdiction of the court, contending that under section 269 of the General Statutes, 1882, this court could not entertain this action, seeking to enjoin a levy under execution for the collection of taxes. If the assessment, levy, and advertisement of plaintiffs' property is for the purpose of collecting a tax, it is clear that under section 269 this court is expressly forbidden from granting any order, writ, or process of any kind whatsoever, staying or preventing the collection thereof, whether such tax is legally due or not.

Plaintiffs' counsel have argued with much force that the assessment and levy by defendants was not for public governmental purposes, which is necessary to constitute a tax, but must be regarded as a special assessment for local improvements. The case of Hanson v. Vernon (27 Iowa, 28 [1 Am. Rep. 215]); People v. Township of Salem (4 Am. Rep., 400, 20 Mich., 452), and other authorities, were cited to establish the distinction between special local assessments and taxes. Taxes are defined (Cool. Tax., 1) as being "the enforced proportional contributions of persons and property, levied by the authority of the State for the support of the government, and for all public uses." Taxes are also defined as "burdens, or charges imposed by the legislative powers of the State, upon persons or property for public purposes." Black. Tax Tit., 1.

Whether or not the legislature intended that the payment of the subscriptions in aid of the Savannah Valley Railroad should be regarded and enforced as a tax, can best be determined by reference to the provisions of the acts of the general assembly above referred to. In the act of March 12, 1878, § 10, granting the charter to said railroad company (16 Stat., 438), as well as the amendatory act, December 24, 1878, § 10 (16 Stat., 816), it will be observed that the county auditor of Anderson County is required to assess annually upon the property of the townships so subscribing such per centum as may be necessary to pay the instalments of subscriptions, which shall be "known and styled on the tax books as the Savannah Valley Railroad tax," and shall be collected by the treasurer at the same time and under the same regulations as are fixed and provided by law for the collection of taxes in towns, cities, or counties so subscribing.

By joint resolution of the general assembly, approved February 20, 1880 (17 Stat., 314), the president and the board of directors of the Savannah Valley Railroad Company were authorized and empowered to direct the "collection of the taxes" voted to said railroad in Anderson County. Thus at different times by expressions of the legislative will that body has declared and provided for the collection of subscriptions in Anderson County to the Savannah Valley Railroad as a tax, and has directed the same methods for the collection of said subscriptions as provided by law for the collection of State and county taxes.

I am constrained to conclude and decide that the assessment and levy upon plaintiffs' property was made by defendants to collect taxes, as contemplated in section 269, and that the collection of said taxes by sale of plaintiffs' property cannot be enjoined by this court under said section 269 of the General Statutes, 1882.

This court having no jurisdiction in the premises, neither the constitutionality of the acts of the legislature referred to, nor the liability of the conduct of defendants, can be considered or determined in this action.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the temporary injunction heretofore granted herein by his honor, Judge Wallace, be, and the same is hereby, dissolved, and that plaintiffs' complaint be dismissed with costs.

*From this decree the plaintiffs appealed upon the following grounds:

I. His honor erred in holding that he had no jurisdiction in the premises under section 269, General Statutes, 1882.

II. His honor erred in holding that the constitutionality of the acts of the legislature referred to in the complaint, to wit, the act chartering the Savannah Valley Railroad and the subsequent acts amendatory thereto, could not be considered or determined in this action.

III. His honor erred in holding that the liability of the conduct of the defendants could not be considered or determined in this action.

IV. His honor erred in holding that the township assessments or subscriptions levied or assessed on plaintiffs' property in aid of the Savannah Valley Railroad were taxes.

V. His honor erred in holding that the as-assessment and levy upon plaintiffs' property was made by defendants to collect taxes.

VI. His honor erred in holding that the sale of plaintiffs' property could not be enjoined under section 269, General Statutes, 1882.

VII. His honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs sought in this action to enjoin a levy under execution for the collection of taxes.

The appeal was argued January 14, 1884, after which this court passed the following order:

Inasmuch as, in our judgment, the question of the constitutionality of section 269 of the General Statutes of 1882 is necessarily involved, though not formally made, in this appeal, and inasmuch as such question has heretofore been decided by a divided court, we think it desirable that a question of such importance should be maturely considered before it is reaffirmed. It is therefore ordered that the question whether the above mentioned section is in conflict with the provisions of the constitution, be set down for argument at the next term of this court during the call of cases from the Eighth Circuit.

The re-argument was had November 25, 1884, upon the point directed.

Messrs. W. C. Benet and H. G. Scudday, for appellants.

April 25, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Certain townships in the County of Anderson, under an "act to charter the Savannah Valley Railroad Company," passed March 12, 1878 (16 Stat. 435), and other acts amendatory thereto approved December 24, 1878 (16 Stat., 816), and December 21, 1880 (17 Stat., 418), voted a subscription to said road. The appellant, Chamblee, and twenty-six other land owners and taxpayers in these townships, refused to pay their portion of this subscription. They were published as "delinquent taxpayers" and their lands were advertised to be sold by the auditor and treasurer, with a penalty of fifteen per cent.

The appellants applied to his honor, Judge Wallace, for an injunction, which was granted temporarily until the case could be heard on its merits. The case was afterwards heard by his honor, Judge Witherspoon, who decreed adversely to the appellants, on the ground that, the assessment and levy made upon appellants' property being made to collect taxes, he had no jurisdiction under section 269, General Statutes, 1882, and having no jurisdiction "neither the constitutionality of the acts of the legislature referred to above, nor the liability of the conduct of the defendants, could be considered or determined by him." He, therefore, ordered and adjudged that the temporary injunction be dissolved and the complaint be dismissed. Hence the appeal.

Three questions have been discussed in the appeal. First. The appellants deny the constitutionality of the act of March 12, 1878, and the acts amendatory thereto, chartering the Savannah Valley Railroad Company, under which the subscription was made, alleging that it is in violation of art. II., § 20, of the constitution of this State, "in that its title is defective." Second. They deny that the assessment and levy made by the defendants were for the purpose of collecting a tax in the sense of section 269, General Statutes, 1882; and Third, they deny the constitutionality of said section 269, which forbids the courts and judges of this State from granting any order or process of any kind staying the collection of taxes, whether said tax is legally *due or not, and under which the Circuit Judge determined that it was his duty to dismiss the complaint.

Inasmuch as the Circuit Judge made no ruling upon the first question, i. e., the constitutionality of the act chartering the company, we do not regard that question as before us, as we can only review such questions of law as may be adjudged and determined below. In the absence of any ruling by the Circuit Judge, no question can arise in this court. We have not, therefore, considered this first question, it being put aside as not necessarily arising in the appeal.

Second. Was it error in the Circuit Judge to hold that the assessment and levy upon appellants' property was for the collection of taxes, and on that account subject to the provisions of section 269, General Statutes, 1882, which, as we have seen, inhibits injunction and all other process issuing from the courts, intended to stay such collections? This is a grave question and one not free from doubt, but in our opinion the Circuit Judge was correct in his ruling. It is admitted in the argument of appellants' counsel, that "if the assessment, levy, and advertisement of appellants' property is for the purpose of collecting a tax, it is clear that under section 269 the Circuit Court is expressly forbidden to grant any order, writ, or process of any kind whatsoever, staying or preventing the collection thereof, whether such tax is legally due or not." It is also said in the argument that the provisions of this section are wise, sustained by good authority, and grounded in good sense. Because it is better that the taxpayer, if he conceives the taxes to be unjust or illegal for any cause, should pay them notwithstanding, under protest, and then bring an action against the county treasurer, for the recovery thereof, as the act allows.

But it is urged that this is no tax, and consequently that section 269 does not apply, and many authorities are referred to as defining and determining what constitutes a tax; and the conclusion reached is, that a tax can only be legally raised for a public purpose, for the proper needs of government, and for a public use; and it is urged that this assessment not being for a public use, it is not a tax in the sense of section 269, supra. There can be no question as to the soundness of this principle; and it is con*ceded that should the general assembly at any time attempt to levy a tax for any purpose except a public one, the act would not only be unconstitutional, but would be transcending the powers of the general assembly in a direction the most dangerous and fatal. The mistake, however, in appellants' argument, as it seems to us, is not in the principle itself, but in its application. The argument assumes that if the tax be an illegal tax, that section 269 does not apply, and therefore the case is discussed as if the question before the court was, is this a legal or illegal tax? If that was really the question before us, the authorities cited and the argument based thereon would be pertinent, but this is not the question; on the contrary, the real question is, were the defendants below attempting to collect a tax legal or illegal when the injunction was applied for? If so, section 269 stayed the hands of the court at once and in express terms.

It should be remembered in this connection that the object of this section was not to deprive the taxpayer of all remedy in the event that the tax levied should prove to be illegal, nor to enforce the payment of an illegal tax, without remedy, as well as a legal one, but its purpose was simply to postpone the question of illegality to a subsequent proceeding, thereby relieving the tax gatherer from responsibility and preventing delay. It thus assumed, in the first instance, the legality of all taxes imposed by an act and forbade the courts from inquiring into that question, upon proceeding by injunction to stay their collection. The act may seem harsh and imperious, and in some instances may be oppressive, but is it not vindicated by the necessities of government, and the importance of public interests, which concern all, and which rise higher than mere personal and private affairs? Be this as it may, however, the meaning of the act cannot be misunderstood. It inhibits the courts in no doubtful language from stopping the collection of taxes, whether legal or illegal, and therefore wherever and whenever a tax is being collected, it is present to shield the tax gatherer.

What then is a tax? is the question. Can there be no tax but a legal one? A tax, in general terms, may be defined to be a pecuniary burden assessed upon the citizen, to be levied upon his property and collected under laws enacted for that purpose. It may be legal or illegal, dependent upon the purpose of the collection, i. e. whether for a public or private use, but in either case is it not a tax imposed and collectible until, if illegal, the illegality is adjudged and determined by proper authority? Section 269 assumes primarily that all assessments imposed by the authority of an act are taxes, and it prevents any interference in their collection in the first instance, reserving the right of the taxpayer to have the amount paid refunded in the event that the tax is subsequently held illegal.

The question, then, below and now here is, was the burden from which the appellants seek relief imposed upon them as a tax? The answer to this question is plain and free from doubt. In the act of March 12, 1878, chartering the railroad company, and the amendments thereto, it is styled a tax—a railroad tax. The county auditor is authorized and required to assess it annually on the property of citizens as a tax. It is required to be entered in the tax books as a tax. By the joint resolution of February 20, 1880, the president and directors of the road are empowered to direct its collection as a tax; and, finally, the general State tax machinery is made use of in its collection, with all the incidents and appliances employed in the collection of all other taxes, State and county. Under these circumstances, and in the face of section 269, assuming it to be constitutional, the Circuit Judge was not required to enter into the investigation of the question, whether this imposed tax was for a public or private purpose, and therefore whether legal or illegal.

This brings us to the third question. Is section 269 constitutional? It is urged that it is not, because it is in violation of sections 4 and 15 of article IV. of the State constitution. Now, it is conceded that these sections do give to the Supreme and Circuit Courts of the State respectively full power to issue writs of injunction, and the other writs therein mentioned. It is also conceded that the constitution is higher than any act of the general assembly, and therefore when they conflict the act must give way. But the question here is, does the act under consideration conflict with either of these sections when properly understood? Has the legislature attempted by this act to curtail or limit the constitutional power of the courts in this respect? This must depend upon the purpose which the framers of the constitution had in view when they thus conferred the power upon the courts to issue these writs. Was it their purpose simply to perpetuate these writs, and to fix them as unalterable remedies in certain cases for all times? Were these writs of such importance as to demand this, and was there a fear that the citizen might be deprived of this mode of relief, if the hands of the legislature were not tied? Or was it done simply to confer jurisdiction on the courts in cases where the law, as it stood, when an application might be made for relief, authorized them to be issued? If the former purpose had been in view, how much easier and freer from doubt could such an idea have been expressed by simply declaring that said writs as heretofore existing should be held inviolate, and that the judges and courts should not only have power to issue them, but should never be prevented from the exercise of that power. If, however, the latter was the intent, no other language more appropriate to that end than that used could have been used.

Section 4 says, the Supreme Court * * * shall always have power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, &c. Section 15 provides that the Court of Common Pleas * * * shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, prohibition, &c. Not that these writs shall remain inviolate, as is said of the right of trial by jury—not that they shall never be suspended except in certain contingencies as is provided in reference to habeas corpus—but simply that the courts should have the power to issue them when, of course, it is proper and legal that they should be issued. The framers of the constitution knew full well how to perpetuate and fix a right beyond the reach of all attack, either from the legislature or any other power, when they so desired, as is shown by the provisions above referred to in reference to the right of trial by jury and the writ of habeas corpus, and also by many other provisions found in the bill of rights securing rights to the people.

Besides, what reason could there have been why these special writs should have been placed under the guardianship and protection of the constitution more than any other modes of relief? They were certainly not more important, more effective, nor in any greater danger of being usurped, lost, or destroyed, than other remedies, and there was no special reason why they should have been declared perpetual and irrevocable. On the other hand, there might have been a question whether the conferring of general jurisdiction on the courts in civil and criminal cases, without more, would have embraced these writs, because of their special and limited character, and on this account there was a reason why it was proper to mention them specially, and to confer jurisdiction in terms in reference to them on the courts. When we find, therefore, a sufficient reason for their prominence in the constitution in the fact of jurisdiction conferred, would it not be a strained construction to conclude that underlying this was a purpose to limit the legislative powers of the general assembly as to these writs in the exercise of that discretion which it is admitted that body possesses in general legislation, and which is so necessary not only in such legislation, but especially so in shaping and moulding remedies and proceedings, to be administered by the courts for the proper protection of the citizen in his various rights?

Independent of all this, however, we have two cases decided by our own court, which, while they remain of force, are direct and conclusive on the question. State v. Treasurer, 4 S. C., 520, and State v. Gaillard, 11 Id., 309. It is true, the first case was decided by a divided court, Chief Justice Moses dissenting, and in the second Mr. Justice McIVER concurred only because he felt himself bound by the first as authority, at the same time declaring that if the question was res integra, he could not concur. The dissenting views of two such eminent jurists, when the question has come up again, are well calculated to make us pause to review the ground upon which these cases stand, but in such review we must remember how important is the doctrine of stare decisis in the administration of justice, and how ruinous also is uncertainty and vacillation. And unless in such review the error is apparent, manifest, and dangerous in its tendencies, it is better to yield than to overrule.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur, because the constitutionality of the provisions contained in section 269 of the General Statutes has been determined by authority to which I am bound to yield.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN, dissenting. As I cannot concur in this judgment, its importance makes it proper that I should state briefly the reasons for that dissent.

The lands of a number of the citizens of Anderson County, residing in the townships of Varennes, Hall, Dark Corner, and Centreville, of that county, were levied and advertised for sale under some process in the nature of a tax execution issued by the treasurer of the county, to enforce the collection of certain assessments upon a subscription voted by a majority of the electors of the said townships respectively, to aid in the construction of the Savannah Valley Railroad. The plaintiff in this action, being one of those whose lands were advertised, instituted this action in behalf of himself and a number of others in the same condition against the treasurer and auditor of the county and "The Savannah Valley Railroad Company" to restrain and enjoin the sale of their lands under the process aforesaid, alleging that they never authorized the said subscriptions; that there was no law, or tax levied pursuant to law, to authorize the said levy and sale; that the charter of the company and the whole proceedings were irregular and void, and the acts under which they were instituted unconstitutional. The defendants answered substantially that all the proceedings were regular and authorized, but insisted that the court could not, under any circumstances, grant the relief prayed for, but was prohibited from doing so by the act of December 24, 1878, entitled "an act to facilitate the collection of taxes," reenacted as sections 268 and 269 of the General Statutes.

The case was heard by Judge Witherspoon, who dismissed the complaint, saying: "I am constrained to conclude and decide that the assessment and levy upon plaintiffs' property was made by defendants to collect taxes as contemplated in section 269 of the General Statutes, and that the collection of said taxes by levy and sale of plaintiffs' property cannot be enjoined by this court under said section. This court having no jurisdiction in the premises, neither the constitutionality of the acts of the legislature referred to, nor the liability of the conduct of defendants, can be considered or determined in this action," &c.

From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed on various grounds, but for our present purpose it will not be necessary to set out any but the following:

"Because his honor erred in holding that the township assessments or subscriptions levied or assessed on plaintiffs' property in aid of the Savannah Valley Railroad were taxes.

"Because his honor erred in holding that the assessment and levy upon plaintiffs' property were made by defendants to collect taxes.

"Because his honor erred in holding that the sale of plaintiffs' property could not be enjoined under section 269 of the General Statutes."

It is obvious that the merits of the case were never reached. Whether or not there were good grounds for the relief prayed for by the plaintiffs, we do not know, for that inquiry was cut off upon the view that the property was advertised for sale under an execution for the collection of taxes, and the enforcement of such an execution, no matter whether irregular, illegal, or unauthorized, could not be enjoined by the court under section 269 of the General Statutes, which, among other things, provides as follows: "There shall be no other remedy in any case of the illegal and unlawful collection of taxes or attempt to collect taxes * * * other than that herein provided. * * * And no writ or process of any kind whatever, staying or preventing any officer of the State charged with a duty in the collection of any tax, whether such tax is legal or not, shall in any case be granted by any court or the judge of any court; but in all cases whatever the person against whom any tax shall stand charged upon the books of the county treasurer, shall be required to pay * * * and thereupon shall have his remedy under the provisions of the next preceding section," &c. (which will be adverted to hereafter).

As this provision of the statutes apparently lay in the way of the plaintiffs, before the merits of their case could be considered, and the Circuit Judge had placed entirely upon it his decree dismissing the complaint, after the first argument this court ordered the question of the constitutionality of the aforesaid provision to be reargued, saying in the order: "Inasmuch as, in our judgment, the question of the constitutionality of section 269 of the General Statutes (1882) is necessarily involved, though not formally made in this appeal: and inasmuch as such question has heretofore been decided by a divided court, we think it desirable that a question of such importance should be maturely considered before it is re-affirmed," &c. The question was accordingly reargued at the bar. But it seems that my brethren, notwithstanding its admitted importance and the fact that it was originally decided by a "divided court," have come to the conclusion that it is better to stand on the principle of stare decisis and reaffirm the former decision, holding that the provision of the law prohibiting the judges from granting injunctions in certain cases, is constitutional, and applies to this case. In that I cannot concur. I thoroughly agree that consistency and stability in the administration of the law is becoming and proper, as tending to promote the peace and good order and prosperity of the State; but it seems to me that it is possible to go to the opposite extreme, and by mere acquiescence to permit the erroneous decision of to-day to ripen into the precedent of to-morrow, and thus allow error to assume the form and force of law, and every instance of such acquiescence only adds to the force of that error.

Section 15, article IV., of the constitution declares that "the Courts of Common Pleas shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, prohibition, scire facias, and all other writs (including injunction) which may be necessary for carrying their powers fully into effect." And yet it is maintained that this positive declaration of the constitution may be absolutely nullified by an act of the legislature which provides that "no writ, order, or process of any kind whatever, staying and preventing any officer of the State, charged with a duty in the collection of taxes from taking any step or proceeding in the collection of any tax, whether such tax is legally due or not, shall in any case be granted by any court or the judge of any court," &c. It seems that the view, sustaining this act in prohibiting judges from granting writs of injunction, sometimes called "the great preventative remedy of equity," is, that the legislature has the right to determine in what cases the jurisdictional power conferred by *this section shall be exercised, especially where an adequate alternative remedy is given in the place of that taken away. I had thought that was the very matter which the judges were appointed to determine, there being no good reason why, even as to the collection of taxes, they should not be safely entrusted with the power expressly given to them by the constitution. As was said by this court in Hendon v. Moore, 18 S. C., 351: "The constitution has divided the functions of government into the legislative, executive, and judicial, and it is the fundamental theory of our system that the departments shall be kept separate and each in its own sphere, independent of the others." The question whether a proper case has been made for an injunction, is peculiarly judicial in its character, and all judicial power has been taken away from the legislature and deposited in the courts of the State created or to be created.

It is true that there are two cases in our books which have been cited as sustaining the constitutionality of the law. But although there are nominally two cases, there is in fact but one, that of State v. Treasurer (4 S. C., 529); for the other, State v. Gaillard (11 S. C., 309), was avowedly and entirely placed on the authority of the first. "When cases follow in line for no better reason than because they have a case to follow, the authority is to be found in the first decision and not by counting up the number in the line." I must say that I cannot consider the law settled as announced in the case of State v. Treasurer, supra. It seems to me that the decision is not only unsupported by authority, but is of dangerous tendency. It was made in 1871, a time not favorable for intelligent, dispassionate judicial inquiry. As before stated, it was made by a divided court, Mr. Justice Willard delivering the judgment with the concurrence of Judge Wright, and Chief Justice Moses dissenting. It would now, however, accomplish no good purpose to again open the argument, which is well stated in the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Moses in the case of The Treasurer as also in that of Mr. Justice McIver in the case of State v. Gaillard, supra. I hope the case will be formally overruled.

But assuming that the prohibition upon the action of the courts, in regard to restraining the collection of State and county taxes proper, must be regarded as constitutional for the reason that it has been so decided, does it follow that it is constitutional and applicable to the collection of local township subscriptions to railroads, whether called subscriptions, assessments, or taxes? It is quite certain that neither of the cases referred to as affirming the constitutionality of the law, arose in connection with such a case; and upon that precise question we are in no way embarrassed by the principle of stare decisis. But on the contrary, as to such a case the question is still res integra, and we are not bound to enforce the act beyond the exact point decided, or to stretch it by construction so as to embrace cases of this kind, unless it necessarily follows from the nature of the thing or from the terms of the act itself.

It strikes me that cases of this kind are not within the purview of the sections which restrain the judges in the matter of collecting ordinary taxes, and to so construe them will be in effect to amend the law, and in doing so to extend it and go beyond the reasons upon which it was based and contrary both to its spirit and intent and the express terms of several of its provisions. It is perfectly manifest that the act was not passed with any special reference to the collection of railroad assessments, considered as taxes, for the first act upon the subject, that which was considered in the case of State v. Treasurer, was passed as far back as 1870, when there was not in the State, nor ever had been, and it could not be foreseen that there ever would be, such an anomalous thing as a township subscription for a railroad voted by a majority of the electors. The same may be said of the act of 1878, to facilitate the collection of taxes (16 Stat., 785). It is very well known that the object of that act was to prevent the payment of taxes in depreciated funds or money, such as the bills of the old bank of the State, or any other except those which the treasurer was by law authorized to receive, and without the remotest reference to closing the mouths of the judges in the matter of collecting railroad assessments in the form of taxes. So that it is perfectly plain, that if the law restrained the judges from interfering with the collection of such assessments, it must be from the terms of the act itself being broad enough necessarily to cover such a case.

Are the terms of the sections aforesaid so broad and explicit *as to require us to construe the prohibition upon the courts, as extending to local railroad assessments, under the form and name of taxes? I do not think so. Section 268 of the General Statutes, which undertakes to provide what is called the "alternative remedy" for that of injunction taken away, is as follows: "In all cases in which any county, State, or other taxes are now, or shall be hereafter charged upon the books of any county treasurer of the State against any person, and such treasurer shall claim the payment of the taxes so charged, or shall take any step or proceeding to collect the same, the person against whom such taxes are charged, or against whom such step or proceeding shall be taken, shall, if he conceives the same to be unjust or illegal for any cause, pay the said taxes, notwithstanding under protest, in such funds and moneys as the said county treasurer shall be authorized to receive by the act levying the same: and upon such payment being made, the said county treasurer shall pay the taxes so collected into the State treasury, giving notice at the time to the comptroller general that the payment was made under protest; and the person so paying said taxes may at any time within thirty days after making such payment, but not afterwards, bring an action against the said county treasurer for the recovery thereof in the Court of Common Pleas for the county in which such taxes are payable; and if it be determined in said action that such taxes were wrongfully or illegally collected for any reason going to the merits, then the court before whom the case is tried shall certify of record that the same was wrongfully collected and ought to be refunded, and thereupon the comptroller general shall issue his warrant for the refunding of the taxes so paid, which shall be paid in preference to all other claims against the treasury," &c.

Can any one read this section and affirm with certainty that the remedy therein provided was intended to extend, and by fair construction does extend, to anything other what are strictly State or county taxes, levied for the benefit of the government and payable into the State treasury? These assessments were not made directly by the legislature for the benefit of the State or county government, but by the president and directors of the Savannah Valley Railroad Company, who had by the joint resolution of 1880 authority to "direct the collection of the taxes voted to the said Savannah Valley Railroad." They were not upon the regular "books of the county treasurer," in the sense of the act, but on a special book provided for the purpose, and were not payable "into the State treasury," giving notice at the time to the comptroller general that the payment was made under protest, but it is expressly directed by the amended charter that the said assessments "shall be paid by such treasurer to said railroad company."

It seems to me that this direction of the proceeds of the assessments, at once repealed, quoad these plaintiffs, all the latter part of the section quoted, which is italicized, and that they could not pay under protest and avail themselves of the alternative remedy therein provided, to pay and recover back from the State, if the tax should turn out to be illegal. I do not see that in such case where the money has been paid to the company the comptroller general could "issue his warrant for the refunding of the taxes so paid," &c. If not, then there cannot be said to be an adequate alternative remedy for these plaintiffs, and that being (as stated by Judge Haskell in State v. Gaillard) the only thing which makes the law constitutional, it would seem to follow that no practical adequate remedy being provided of which these plaintiffs may avail themselves, the act excluding the judges from inquiry, cannot extend to them, or, if so, that it is clearly unconstitutional. The act which stands only because it affords an alternative remedy, surely cannot stand in the way of these to whom it gives no such remedy. If the parties cannot in any event recover back the money from the State, then they have no adequate alternative remedy, and if the judges are excluded from even hearing their alleged grievances, they would be left absolutely remediless and at the mercy of a company having the assistance of the officers and the use of all the machinery of the State.

But it is said that these assessments are taxes, and the prohibition is general, forbidding inquiry into the legality of any kind of a tax. It is true, that in the acts and joint resolutions of the legislature these exactions are sometimes called "subscriptions," sometimes "assessments," and sometimes "the Savannah Valley Railroad tax," but it is quite certain that they are not State *taxes in the usual and ordinary sense of the word. To be taxes in the sense of the act, they must have the characteristics of taxes, and if not they cannot be made such by simply calling them by that name. I have always had the idea, expressed by Webster in one of his definitions, that "a tax is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of the citizen for the use of the nation or State," and doubtless that was the sense in which the framers of this law understood it. But I do not think it necessary here to enter into the discussion. Whether these exactions voted by a majority of the electors in the townships named for the benefit of the railroad company, are called "subscriptions," or "assessments," or "railroad taxes," is a matter outside of the question. In either case it seems to me clear that they are not "taxes" in the sense of the sections under consideration, which require the taxes there in contemplation to be paid "into the treasury of the State," and in reference to which the comptroller general, in a certain event, was required "to issue his warrant refunding the same."

Sections 268 and 269 are manifestly but parts of the same scheme: the first undertaking to provide an alternative remedy by the State refunding, if the tax should turn out to be illegal; and the second forbidding all "other remedy." And the point is, that when the circumstances are such that the "other remedy" is not given by the first, it follows that the second, taking away that by injunction, does not apply. And in this case the exactions, whether they are called "taxes" or not, are ordered to be paid over to the railroad company in such way as to take them out of section 268, making the State liable to refund them, and in doing so deprives the parties of any adequate alternative remedy. If I am right in this, and it seems to me that there cannot be two opinions, then this decision certainly makes a great advance beyond what was decided in the cases of The Treasurer and of Gaillard, for in both of them the taxes being public State taxes, there was clearly the right to make the State refund, and for that very reason it was held that the act only "postponed" the question of illegality, leaving that to be determined in the "other remedy." A Tennessee act of 1844 declares a deed made in pursuance of a public "sale for taxes" prima facie evidence of *the prerequisites of the law. A party claimed under a town corporation tax sale, and the Supreme Court of that State held that the corporation tax sale was not within the law. Judge Turley says: "Corporation taxes are not public, but private taxes, and are therefore not embraced within the act, but as to the remedy for collection are left as it existed prior to the passage of the act." Shoalwater v. Armstrong, 9 Humph. [Tenn.] 217; Black Tax Tit., §4.

If it should be the decision of this court that section 269 must apply to this case simply because these exactions for a railroad are called "taxes," without inquiring whether the parties are entitled to the alternative remedy against the State, it will indeed be a speedy realization of the fears of Chief Justice Moses expressed in his dissenting opinion in the case of The Treasurer: "This concedes an unlimited control to the legislature of the whole judicial magistracy of the State, which, in the end, might be so exercised as to suppress its entire authority. If it can declare in what case a particular form of action shall be a remedy for an alleged complaint, and ignore its application to other cases, in which, at the adoption of the constitution, it was employed as a medium through which a wrong was to be redressed, may it not step by step disarm the courts of all their authority, and at last leave it but a tribunal to carry out the behests and mandates of the legislative will? The power to tax is the most extensive and unlimited of all the powers which a legislative body can exert. It is without restraint, except by constitutional limitations. To tie up the hand that can alone resist its unlawful encroachments, would not only render uncertain the tenure by which the citizen holds his property, but make it tributary to the unrestrained demands of the legislature," &c.

I think this court should now declare section 269 of the General Statutes to be unconstitutional; or if it is too late to do so, that it should declare that said section was never intended to apply to a case like this, where the provision for an alternative remedy against the State does not exist; and that the decree should be set aside and the cause remanded to the Circuit, to be heard like other cases, only upon the merits involved.

Judgment affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Darlington, October, 1883.

At the hearing of this appeal, honorable W. H. Wallace, judge of the seventh Circuit, sat in the stead of Mr. Justice Melver, who had been of counsel in the cause.

This was an action by William A. Carrigan against Evander Byrd, Lewis S. Byrd, Peter J. Byrd, and Sarah E. Coker, commenced in January, 1876. The cause was heard by Judge Pressley upon the pleadings and upon testimony taken before him at the hearing. He subsequently filed a decree, which is substantially stated in the opinion of this court, as are also the plaintiff's exceptions thereto.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles, for appellant.

Messrs. E. K. Dargan and G. W. Dargan, contra.

May 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice WALLACE. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage of real estate. The mortgage was executed to plaintiff by Evander Byrd on July 13, 1871, to secure a bond of the same date. The consideration of the bond was money expended by plaintiff, at the request of Byrd, in purchasing certain judgments that had been obtained against Byrd by his creditors, who were pressing for payment. Upon a composition between the holders of the judgments and plaintiff, the judgments were assigned to the latter. As further security, plaintiff took a chattel mortgage from Byrd, and, as still further security, he took from Byrd a bond and mortgage of real estate—that which he seeks to foreclose in this action. The bond provides for a larger rate of interest than that borne by the judgments.

This action was commenced against Evander Byrd, the debtor, and also against certain children of Evander Byrd, to wit: Sarah Coker, Lewis Byrd, and Peter Byrd. The complaint, besides the usual allegations of a complaint for foreclosure, alleged that the defendants, Sarah, Peter, and Lewis, claimed an interest in the land described in the mortgage adversely to the claims of the plaintiff, and tendered an issue to these upon the validity of their respective claims. Evander Byrd did not answer. Sarah, Peter, and Lewis answered, and alleged that Evander Byrd, their father, had conveyed to each of them by deed, bearing date January 4, 1870, and before the execution of the bond and mortgage upon which the action is brought, different parcels of the land described in the mortgage; that these deeds were not recorded in the registry office at Darlington, but that plaintiff had actual notice of them before he took the bond and mortgage; that Evander Byrd had other property, real and personal, besides that embraced in the mortgage; and that by reason of the aforesaid chattel mortgage and of the judgments assigned to him, plaintiff had it in his power to obtain satisfaction of his debt

without resorting to the land conveyed to these defendants. It appears from the case that the debts upon which the judgments against Evander Byrd were obtained, which were assigned to plaintiff, were in existence when the deeds were executed, and the judgments were obtained upon them after the execution of the deeds. There is no controversy about the execution of the bond and mortgage. Nor, on the other hand, any question as to the execution of the deeds.

Plaintiff attacks the sufficiency of the deeds to protect the grantees against his mortgage upon three grounds: First. Because they were never delivered by Evander Byrd. Second. Because, if delivered, he had no notice of the deeds. Third. Because, being voluntary, they are fraudulent and void as to debts existing at the time of their execution. These issues were decided by the Circuit Judge adversely to the plaintiff, and the grounds of appeal make the same questions here.

Plaintiff's first ground of appeal is, in substance, that the preponderating weight of the testimony is against the delivery of the deeds. The delivery, necessary to transfer title to real property under a deed signed and sealed, is composed of two concurrent parts, namely, an intention to deliver and an act evincing a purpose to part with the control of the instrument. Neither of these parts by itself is sufficient to constitute delivery. There may be an intention never consummated, and the instrument may be put in the custody of another, to be held subject to the control of the grantor. This rule is so well settled that it is only necessary to refer to some of our cases which declare it. Broughton v. Telfer, 3 Rich. Eq., 435; Wood v. Ingraham, 3 Strobb. Eq., 111 [51 Am. Dec. 671]; Jackson v. Inabnit, 2 Hill Eq., 412; Arthur v. Anderson, 9 S. C., 249; Fraser v. Davie, 11 Id., 69.

It is not disputed that the deeds challenged here were put in the possession of Mrs. Coker, one of the grantees, by Evander Byrd. In the case of Hagood v. Harley (8 Rich., 328), there is a strong intimation, and authority referred to in support of the intimation, that when a grantor puts a deed into the possession of the grantee, to be his deed upon the performance of a condition, that this is an absolute delivery, and the subsequent words are *void and repugnant. This could only relate to the deed to Mrs. Coker, and according to our view of the case it is not necessary to rest the decision of this question upon it.

The deeds having been put in the possession of Mrs. Coker, the question is, with what purpose was it done? The testimony as to what was said and done at the time of the act is conflicting. Mrs. Coker testifies that when the deeds were executed on July 13, 1870, her father gave the deed to her into her hands; that her two brothers, Peter and Lewis, were minors and absent from home and that her father offered to her the deeds to them, and said: "This is law, you must stand proxy for the boys as they are not here," and that then she took these deeds and gave them to the boys upon their return from school. She also says that the deed to her brother David was at that time delivered to him, and that he requested her to keep it for him, which she did.

It is not our purpose to go, with any degree of detail, into the testimony; but we will mention some of the circumstances testified to in support of the testimony of Mrs. Coker. Among these are the facts that at the time the deeds in controversy here were executed, similar deeds of equivalent parcels of land were made to Mr. Moore, son-in-law, and to David, son of Evander Byrd. Some days subsequently to the execution of the deeds, all of them were carried by Evander Byrd to Darlington and duly probated. Moore went with Evander Byrd that day, and received his deed from him that day. Upon his return home Evander Byrd gave all the deeds, save Moore's, into the possession of his daughter, Mrs. Coker. It does not appear that David was present then, but some time after he took his deed into his possession, with the knowledge of Evander Byrd; Peter and Lewis were still away from home. A short time before the execution of the deeds Evander Byrd had given to his son John one thousand dollars in money, which was considered about the equivalent of the quantity of the land conveyed by each deed. One of the daughters of Evander Byrd was married and living in the West; a parcel of land about equal in value to the separate parcel conveyed was reserved for her, but no deed to her made. In addition to the foregoing facts is the striking fact that Byrd upon the recurrence of the next time, after the execution of the deeds, for listing *property for taxation, returned to the auditor for taxation all the land conveyed to these defendants as their property respectively. If the testimony of Mrs. Coker is true, then certainly the intention of Evander Byrd to deliver the deeds at the time they were put in her possession is clearly proved. Else, why stand proxy for the boys except to receive what was intended to be delivered to them?

On the other hand, Evander Byrd testifies in substance that when he put the deeds in possession of his daughter, Mrs. Coker, he had no intention to deliver the deeds, but meant to retain control of them and keep them in lieu of a will, and that they were delivered to Lewis and Peter, and the one to herself retained by Mrs. Coker, in violation of his intention and her trust. This testimony is corroborated by the statements of Moore, that when the deeds were brought back after they had been probated, Evander Byrd handed them to Mrs. Coker, saying: "Take care of them for me." Isaac Gainey says that Lewis told him since the commencement of this action that "he had heard that his father was not going to give them these deeds, and he got his sister to get them out for him." W. E. Coker testifies that Peter told him since the commencement of this action "that his father had not put him in possession of the land." If the testimony of Evander Byrd is true, then beyond question there was no delivery. No useful purpose will be subserved by extending this opinion with a fuller discussion of the testimony relating to this issue.

The Circuit Judge, a magistrate of great experience in the trial of causes at the bar and on the bench, after hearing and seeing the witnesses and listening to the argument of counsel, declares himself satisfied that the preponderance of the evidence is in favor of the defendants, and adds that the manner and testimony of Mrs. Coker were more satisfactory to him than that of Evander Byrd. These are the two leading witnesses, and in effect their testimony is conflicting. It goes without the saying that a man of intelligence and long experience in the trial of cases acquires a degree of art in forming correct beliefs as to the credibility of witnesses almost unerring. This fact renders this court, which has not the advantage of observing witnesses under examination, slow in reversing a finding of fact by a Circuit *Judge, in cases where the testimony is conflicting, and opinions therefore of the credibility of witnesses must be formed, unless the overbearing weight of the testimony is clearly against the finding. Neither is it a safe rule to set aside such a finding upon a consideration of the probabilities of human conduct. Every one conversant with human affairs knows that not unfrequently it is the improbable that happens, and whether the happening seems probable or improbable depends largely upon the point of view and a knowledge of obscure motives and reasons of conduct which are concealed, and ignorance of which may lead to erroneous conclusions and injustice.

This court agrees with the Circuit Judge, that upon the whole case the weight of the testimony is in favor of the allegations of the defendants Sarah, Peter, and Lewis, and that the deeds in dispute were duly delivered.

The second ground of appeal makes the question that plaintiff had no notice of the delivery of the deeds. The deeds were executed on January 4, 1870, but were not recorded on the day of the execution of the bond and mortgage, to wit, July 13, 1871. Evander Byrd informed the plaintiff at and before the execution of the bond and mortgage that the deeds had been made; but added that only the deeds to Moore and David had been recorded and delivered. Upon an examination of the registry office at Darlington, plaintiff found the deeds to Moore and David recorded and the others not. These facts were calculated to induce him to believe that Evander Byrd had correctly informed him as to the status of the deeds, yet he knew the deeds had been made. Evander Byrd did not produce them or inform him where they were. They might have been delivered and not recorded. He had paid taxes on the land described in the deeds in the names of the grantees respectively at the request of Evander Byrd. He had asked John Byrd why it was that Mrs. Coker's tax was the largest, and had been informed that her father had given her the home place which was most valuable.

These facts show that plaintiff had express and explicit notice of the existence of the deeds. If they had been duly recorded and inspected by plaintiff, he would have had no more information, for the recording would not have established the delivery. He *in point of fact had more information than he could have derived from an inspection of the record, if they had been recorded, for Evander Byrd had admitted to him the existence of the deeds and recognized their efficacy by asking him to pay taxes upon the land listed in the name of the grantees. The plain dictates of common prudence required the plaintiff under these circumstances to ascertain the actual state of the facts, or be bound by them as they were. City Council v. Page, 1 Speers Eq., 212; Wallace v. Craps, 3 Strobb., 268; Farr v. Sims, Rich. Eq. Cas., 122 [24 Am. Dec. 396]; Black v. Childs, 14 S. C., 321.

Plaintiff's counsel proposed to ask Evander Byrd, when he was being examined as a witness: "Did you owe other debts, discovered after, and not known at that time?" This question was objected to, and the objection sustained by the Circuit Judge. The fourth ground of appeal alleges the rejection of this question as error. The time referred to in the question was the time when the deeds were executed. The object of the question was to show that these deeds, being voluntary, were as to existing debts fraudulent and void. Actual fraud was not alleged, nor offer made to prove it. It will be borne in mind that there were outstanding debts against Evander Byrd at the time of the execution of the deeds, and upon these debts judgments were obtained after the deeds were executed. The judgments were, and could only be, assigned to plaintiff after the deeds were made, for they were not in existence before. For the money expended in their purchase, he took from Evander Byrd the bond and mortgage he seeks to enforce in this action. The rate of interest stipulated for in the bond was larger than that borne by the judgments. The money which the bond and mortgage was given to secure was paid by plaintiff after the deeds were made. It is obvious, therefore, that any rights plaintiff acquired under the bond accrued subsequent to the execution of the deeds, and they are not, therefore, though voluntary, a fraud upon the rights he seeks to enforce in this action. The question ruled out by the Circuit Judge was irrelevant in this action.

The fourth ground of appeal is, because his honor erred in holding as follows: "If plaintiff did not have notice of said deeds, or the same as voluntary were fraudulent as to creditors then exist*ing, still I could not give him here the remedy he seeks, because I find that he has in his hands money of the mortgagor not applied to the mortgage, with intent to keep it open and enable mortgagor in this case to set aside his voluntary deeds; and because plaintiff has a chattel mortgage for same debt and judgments at law assigned to him which he has not attempted to enforce, and that purposely and by favor to the mortgagor, to enable him to invalidate said deeds in this action." It has been decided above, that plaintiff had notice of the deeds, and that they were not fraudulent as to any rights which plaintiff seeks to enforce in this action. It is, therefore, manifestly unprofitable to discuss in this opinion what would be his rights upon a supposition that he had no notice of the deeds, and that as to him they were fraudulent.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, November, 1883.

The facts of this case appear in the opinion of the court. The judge's charge was as follows:

By the pleadings the title to the land is put in issue, and this casts upon the plaintiffs the burden of showing a perfect title in themselves. They must recover upon the strength of their own title, and not upon the weakness of that of their adversaries. A perfect title must be traced to a grant from the State. In the absence of a grant, a title may rest upon the presumption of a grant. A grant will be presumed when it is in proof that for twenty years or more, citizens of the State, one or more, have been in the actual occupancy of the land, openly and notoriously claiming the same adversely to all persons. Connection with such a title by possession will dispense with the necessity of proving a grant. In the present case the plaintiffs have shown a grant from the State to their ancestor, Ephraim Bonham, in 1852, and his possession of the land thereunder until his death intestate in 1869, and, besides this, they have shown that for forty years or more their said ancestor actually used and occupied the premises as his own.

This is sufficient proof of title in their ancestor, and through him in themselves, and will entitle them to recover, unless the defendants show a superior title. This they claim to have done by proof of the recovery of this land from Ephraim Bonham by R. E. Cleveland and J. L. & A. Hill, and by connecting themselves by a chain of conveyances with the title of these persons. If it be true that by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction these persons did recover of Bonham the land now in dispute by showing a better title in fee, and the defendants derive title from these successful litigants, then the verdict must be for the defendants. To succeed in this proposition, the defendants must show a final judgment upon the question of title and recovery. The record produced shows a verdict in favor of Cleveland and the Hills against Ephraim Bonham, but the judgment entered up thereon is only for damages and costs.

[The judge at first instructed the jury that such a judgment is not conclusive of the question of title, but upon reflection recalled the instruction and charged that the record of the verdict and judgment is such as is conclusive of the question of title then in issue. He then stated to the jury that if the effect of that recovery was to fix the fee of the land in Cleveland and the Hills, it was a singular proceeding that they should enter up judgment for damages and costs, issue execution thereon, and sell the newly recovered land as the property of Ephraim Bonham. If they recovered the fee, such an anomalous proceeding was nugatory and void, because they could not sell their own land to satisfy an execution against Ephraim Bonham.]

Then was their recovery under a tax title? A witness has said something of a tax title, but no one has testified that they were bought originally at a tax sale. In that suit, however, their writ and declaration speak of the land as having been sold for taxes. Such is the allegation of Cleveland and the Hills in their suit against Bonham. Now, if in 1867 they bought this land at a tax sale, they bought for a term of years not exceeding seven. That period having elapsed, the title reverted to Ephraim Bonham or his heirs at law. If under the judgment against Bonham for $35 and costs it was attempted to sell this reversion, the record must so show, or there must be proof of the fact. It was competent so to sell; but the question is, was it done? If so, the levy should show it. It devolves upon the defendants to show by satisfactory proof the fact of the recovery of this land of Ephraim Bonham by those under whom they claim, and the extent of that recovery, both as to the quantity of the land, its metes and bounds, and the quality of the estate therein. They must be able to identify the land recovered to a reasonable certainty, otherwise the plaintiffs here must prevail. If the statements in the record of that suit, and the relative circumstances, satisfy *the jury that Cleveland and the Hills only became the owners of a tax title, the plaintiffs here must recover; but if, on the other hand, the evidence from the record and witnesses satisfies the jury that they bought the fee in the land now in dispute, taking all the proceedings in review, then the verdicts here must be for the defendants.

During the progress of the charge the judge was requested by the defendant's counsel to instruct the jury that there was no evidence that the land was bought by Cleveland and the Hills at a tax sale. This he declined to do, leaving it to the jury to say whether or not the statements in their writ and declaration, and the circumstance of resale, &c., amounted to proof on this subject. He was then requested to instruct the jury that the reversion after the termination of the tax title may have been sold under the execution for $35 and costs. He held that it was competent to have made such a sale, but whether it was so made was a question for the jury, and stated that the levy should show it.

The jury rendered in each case a verdict for the plaintiffs for the land in dispute, and thereafter the plaintiffs entered up their judgment against the defendants. From this judgment the defendants appeal to this court on the grounds stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Duncan & Sanders, Bobo & Carlisle, for appellants.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

May 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These actions, for the recovery of real property, involving the same facts and principles of law, were heard together on the Circuit, and will be so considered here. Ephraim Bonham, of Spartanburg County, was seized of a tract of land containing, according to his grant, 418 acres, more or less, of which he was in possession until he died in 1869 intestate. The plaintiffs are his heirs at law, and finding that parts of this land of their ancestor were in the possession of strangers, in 1881 brought three separate actions, one against each of them for the portion claimed by them respectively.

The defendants conceded *that Ephraim Bonham once had title to the lands, and that the plaintiffs were his heirs; but they claimed that each of them had title to the parcel in his possession from Robert E. Cleveland and J. L. & A. Hill, as purchasers at a sheriff's sale under some verdict or judgment obtained against the said Ephraim Bonham in his lifetime. The real question was, whether that proceeding and the alleged purchase under it divested Ephraim Bonham and his heirs of the title, and transferred it to the said Cleveland and Hills.

It appeared that in October, 1867, Robert E. Cleveland and J. L. & A. Hill commenced an action of trespass to try titles against Ephraim Bonham for a tract of land "containing 286 acres, more or less, being the same as was sold by the sheriff of the district and State aforesaid, by virtue of tax execution against the said defendant, Ephraim Bonham, for State and district taxes." It seems that there was no appearance or defence made, but the declaration has endorsed on it what would seem to be a verdict, in these words: "We find for the plaintiffs the land in dispute and thirty-five dollars damages." When this verdict was rendered does not clearly appear, but at the spring term of 1869 a judgment, in form upon execution of a writ of inquiry, was entered alone for the damages, $35, without making the least reference to the verdict for the land. On this judgment was issued an execution, which was levied on the identical lands which were embraced in the verdict "as the property of Ephraim Bonham at the suit of R. E. Cleveland and J. L. & A. Hill." Under this levy the land was sold by the sheriff on June 7, 1869 (probably after the death of Bonham), and bid off for $5 by the plaintiffs in execution, R. E. Cleveland and J. L. & A. Hill, who took sheriff's title, and the defendants held under them.

The defendants made several requests to charge, which will appear in the exceptions. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs in each of the cases, and the defendants appeal to this court upon the following exceptions, complaining that the judge erred:

1. "In charging that there was evidence that R. E. Cleveland and the Hills had bought the land in dispute at a tax sale.

2. "In charging that if the suit of R. E.

Cleveland and the *Hills against Ephraim Bonham, in the action of trespass to try title for the land now in dispute, was based on a tax title, then they could only have recovered the land for seven years, and defendants' title in this case cannot stand.

3. "In charging that if the jury find that in the action of trespass to try title, the plaintiffs, Cleveland and the Hills, recovered their verdict on a tax title, they, or those claiming under them, could only hold said land for seven years from the date of the recovery, and if the seven years have already expired, their verdict must be for the plaintiffs.

4. "In charging, if the jury believe that the land in dispute was covered by the verdict in the suit of Cleveland and the Hills against Ephraim Bonham in the action of trespass to try titles, their verdict must be for the plaintiffs, if Cleveland and the Hills based their claim to the land on a tax title.

5. "In charging that if Cleveland and the Hills recovered the land in dispute on a tax title and for seven years, the reversion in the land could not be sold to satisfy the judgment for damages and costs unless the levy specified that such reversion had been levied.

7. "In not charging that there was no evidence going to show that, in the suit of Cleveland and the Hills to recover the land now in dispute, the title of the said Cleveland and Hills rested upon a tax title."

In settling the case, the presiding judge stated that exceptions 6, 8, 9, 10, and 11 were founded on a misapprehension of his charge, and, therefore, it is unnecessary to set them out here.

The defendants claimed title in themselves, and the onus was upon them to show it. They, however, offered no proof of title outside of the record in the trespass case against Ephraim Bonham, and the deed of the sheriff under the levy and sale in that case; so that the single question was whether those proceedings were sufficient to transfer the title. That record was certainly a very remarkable one, and, as the Circuit Judge said, in some respects embarrassing. There was no sworn proof that the defendant was ever made a party by service of process; no evidence that he appeared or defended; no judgment was entered for the lands, but only for the damages assessed, and the execution issued *thereon was levied upon the identical land embraced in the verdict of the plaintiffs, who became the purchasers at the sheriff's sale for $5.

There is a rule that, generally, purchasers at sheriff's sales are not required to look into the regularity of the process under which the sale is made; but that does not apply when the process is absolutely void, or the purchaser is the plaintiff in execution, and fairly chargeable with notice of the terms of his own process. Small v. Small, 16 S. C., 72. The judgment, execution, levy, and sale are all links in the chain of title to property purchased at sheriff's sale. All are necessary, and if either is void, the title of the purchaser fails. Cleveland and the Hills, the plaintiffs in the trespass suit, were also purchasers at the sheriff's sale under their own process, and, being chargeable with notice, could not set up inconsistent rights. They could not claim to have title to the land under the verdict, and at the same time as purchasers at the sheriff's sale, for the obvious reason that the two things were absolutely inconsistent. If the verdict gave them title, then there was no interest left in Bonham, which they could levy and sell. They were not invested with title by the naked verdict, which was never put into a formal judgment or enforced by writ of habere facias possessionem, and the real question was whether they had title under the sheriff's deed. Then as to the judgment and levy and sale by the sheriff. It is not quite clear that the judgment entered for the damages alone, omitting all reference to the land embraced in the same verdict, was regular and valid, for the reason that it was not in conformity with the verdict. It is very important that there should be consistency in records, and if that rule had been observed in this case, all the subsequent confusion would probably have been avoided; but as the point was not made in the Circuit Court, we will make no ruling upon it.

Exceptions 1, 2, 3, 4, and 7, complain that the judge committed error, in charging that there was some evidence that Cleveland and the Hills purchased the land at a tax sale against Bonham; and that if the jury so found, their recovery was only for seven years, which had expired. Upon that subject the judge charged as follows: "Now, it is very clear that it is the final judgment that concludes all matters in issue between parties *and their privies. It is clear also that the judgment in the former suit speaks only of damages and costs. Hence, I at first instructed the jury, that such a judgment was not conclusive as to the title to the land and the right to possession thereof. But on reflection, considering the verdict of the jury on which it was rendered, I recalled my instruction and charged them that the record in that action was conclusive of matters in issue between the parties. The question was then submitted as to what title was in issue. What right, title, and estate did the plaintiffs in that action seek to enforce against Ephraim Bonham? No evidence of their previous title was introduced in the present action, and the record of former suit and proceedings thereunder alone could be examined to ascertain this fact. Nothing is spoken of in the writ and declaration as causing a loss of the land by Bonham, except that it was sold to pay taxes. This statement and the fact that under the execution issued on the judgment, the same land was again sold as the property of Bonham, the jury were allowed to consider, in determining the extent of the recovery of Cleveland and the Hills. I instructed them that if they found that they recovered only a tax title, it terminated in seven years. 7 Stat., 277."

From the foregoing it will be seen that the judge did not charge as alleged, that there was some evidence that Cleveland and the Hills bought at a tax sale. Nothing was said as to who bought at the tax sale, but that "nothing is spoken of in the writ and declaration as causing a loss of the land by Bonham, except that it was sold to pay taxes." That was literally true according to the record itself. Besides, that was the only view consistent with the acts of the parties, and particularly the omission of the plaintiffs to enter judgment for the land, and allowing the defendant, Bonham, to remain in possession during his life.

Nor do we think it was error to charge the jury that if they found that the land was originally sold under a tax title, as stated in the declaration, and the plaintiffs proved no other title, that their recovery was limited to the term of seven years, under the act of 1791, which provided that "Whenever any collector shall levy on any property of any defaulter, for any tax or duties as aforesaid, he shall not put up for sale in any one lot, more than he believes will be sufficient to pay the sum due by such defaulter, *together with the charges of legal process, * * * and if the sale be made of land, he shall not sell the same for any longer term than seven years." 7 Stat., 277.

Exception 5 complains that the judge committed error in charging "that if Cleveland and the Hills recovered the land in dispute on a tax title and for seven years, the remainder of Ephraim Bonham in said land could not be sold to satisfy the judgment for damages unless the levy specified that such remainder had been levied on." Upon that subject the judge charged as follows: "I also charged the jury that the reversion to Bonham could be levied on and sold under execution, but if such were claimed by the defendants to have been done, they must show it either from the record of the levy and sale or otherwise, and that the levy should show it." A majority of the court think this was error. There is no doubt that a vested remainder or a reversionary interest in land, is the subject of levy and sale under execution before it vests in possession. Harrison v. Maxwell, 2 Nott & McC., 347 [10 Am. Dec. 611]. It is also true that ordinarily a levy and sale of the land itself, will carry to the purchaser such interest of the defendant without expressly stating in the levy that the remainder as such is levied. This opinion of a majority of the court makes it necessary to set aside the judgment below, with a view to a new trial.

But I cannot refrain from saying that it seems to me, that this is a peculiar case, and the above rule should not be applied to it. The rule of course should not apply unless the whole proceeding is fair and bona fide. I have a strong impression that the circumstances of this case were well calculated to mislead and did actually mislead the public. Suppose the plaintiffs, who directed the whole land levied under their execution, had announced at the sale that they had already recovered the land from Bonham, and notwithstanding this, still ordered it to be sold under the execution, and purchased it for five dollars—that is to say, as it turned out, the reversion therein, can there be a doubt that the sale would have been void? "If a bidder make representations to deter other bidders and is successful in deterring them, his purchase is fraudulent and void and will be set aside." Rorer Exec. Sales, § 750, and authorities. It seems to me that the *circumstances here substantially make such a case. The plaintiffs in the trespass case had a verdict on file, in its terms unlimited and absolute, for the very land levied. They were the only persons who knew that that verdict actually gave them the land only for seven years, and that after that time there was a reversion in the defendant, Bonham. The levy gave no hint of the existence of such an interest, which was in fact contradicted by the record. The sheriff's deed is not in the "Brief," but it is there stated that it was in the usual form and conveyed "the land covered by the grant," &c. Under these circumstances I cannot say that it was error in the Circuit Judge to tell the jury that those claiming that the reversion was sold and well conveyed under that levy and sale "should show it either from the record of the levy and sale or otherwise."

The additional grounds upon which the respondent seeks to sustain the judgment below, notwithstanding there may have been error in the charge, cannot be considered. While it is true that a judgment below in a case tried by the court may be affirmed upon other grounds than those upon which the Circuit Judge placed it, the same is not true of a case tried by a jury. If erroneous instructions have been given to the jury, we cannot know that the conclusion reached by the jury was not the result of such instructions, and therefore this court is bound to grant a new trial, even though there may be other correct legal propositions applicable to the case, which, if they had been laid before the jury, might have induced them to find the same verdict: because if such additional instructions are not given and not asked for, we cannot conjecture what effect they would have had upon the minds of the jury. A verdict is the compound result of the legal instructions given to the jury by the court and of their findings of fact applied to the legal principles laid down for their guidance, and if there is error in the instructions, then there is necessarily error in the judgment, and it must be reversed. It is true that there may be a case in which, in any view of the facts, the plaintiff could not recover; and if in such a case there should be some erroneous instructions given to the jury, the judgment below might be sustained, notwithstanding such erroneous instructions. But the present is not such a case.

*In accordance with the view of a majority of the court, the judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON and Mr. Justice McIVER concurred in the result.

LECONTE v. IRWIN.

(November Term, 1884.)

1. The decision of this court in LeConte v. Irwin (19 S. C., 554), stated.

2. Under the ruling of this court on the former appeal, the purchaser was entitled to an order confirming the master's report on sales, no additional facts being shown in opposition to the motion.

[3. Mortgages ⇨526.]

On a motion to put the purchaser into possession of premises sold under a decree of foreclosure, the defendant cannot resist the motion upon grounds known to him at the time the report on sales was confirmed; he is concluded by the order of confirmation.

The judgment of foreclosure having provided that the purchaser be let into possession on the production of the master's deed, the Circuit Judge erred in granting an order directing the sheriff to put the purchaser into possession, an appeal having been noticed by the defendant from a previous order, at the same term, confirming the report on sales.

Before Fraser, J., Richland, April, 1884.

The opinion of this court sufficiently states the case.

Mr. R. A. Lynch, for appellant.

May 19, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. In this case two distinct appeals were taken from two distinct orders, made on different days, and it is due, not only to the Circuit Judge whose orders are appealed from, but also to the parties, that this should be constantly kept in mind while considering the questions raised. The first is an *appeal from an order granted on April 14, 1884, confirming the report on the sale heretofore ordered in this case, and the second is an appeal from an order granted on April 24, 1884, requiring the sheriff to put the purchaser at such sale into possession of the premises sold under the order of the court and bought by him.

In considering the first appeal, this court is bound to confine its attention to what was before the Circuit Judge when he granted the order appealed from, uninfluenced by anything that may have been presented to the Circuit Judge when the order was granted ten days afterwards, from which the second appeal was taken. This is manifest from the very nature and functions of this tribunal, which, except in certain cases not applicable here, has no original jurisdiction, but is confined simply to the exercise of a reviewing or appellate power. All that this court can do is to examine into the case as presented in the court below with a view to ascertain whether any error has been committed. It cannot hear any new or additional facts, but must confine its consideration to such facts as the court below acted upon in rendering the judgment or passing the order appealed from. It follows, therefore, that in considering the first appeal in this case we cannot go outside the showing which was made to Judge Fraser when he granted the order confirming the report of sales, and of course cannot consider any facts which were presented to him ten days afterwards when he granted the order from which the second appeal has been taken.

Looking, then, at the first appeal in this light, I do not see how there can be a doubt as to the correctness of Judge Fraser's order. He had before him no facts other than those which were before this court at the hearing of the former appeal in this case (19 S. C., 554), and upon those facts this court had reversed the order of Judge Hudson setting aside the sale, not simply on the ground that a proceeding by mere motion was not a proper proceeding for that purpose (although that was mentioned as an additional reason), but, as I understand it, upon the ground that a bona fide purchaser at a sale under a judgment, not void, but voidable merely, who has paid the purchase money and received titles cannot be divested of such title by the subsequent reversal *or vacation of such judgment. For in that case the court said: "We believe it settled by the great preponderance of authority that property acquired by a bona fide purchaser at a judicial sale under orders regular in form and voidable only, shall not be affected by a future reversal or vacation of the judgment." And the court then went on to adjudge that Monckton was a bona fide purchaser, and as such entitled to the benefit of the rule above stated, and therefore reversed so much of Judge Hudson's order as set aside the sale.

These points being thus adjudged, it seems to me that it necessarily followed that Monckton was entitled to an order confirming the sale whenever he applied to the Circuit Court for the same. It is true, that one of the grounds of appeal from Judge Hudson's order was that he had erred in refusing the motion to confirm the sale, and that this matter was not specially mentioned in the opinion of the Supreme Court, as it was not necessary that it should be, for the reason just mentioned, especially as Judge Hudson's order was allowed to stand so far as it vacated the judgment, only upon the ground of excusable neglect on the part of the defendant to put in her answer, and allowed her to do so. It was not for this court to grant the order confirming the sale, but only to determine the rights of the parties, and this determination, as I have said, necessarily involved the right of the purchaser to such an order whenever he applied for it to the proper tribunal, the Circuit Court. It seems to me, therefore, that the order confirming the sale should be affirmed.

The question raised by the second appeal is whether the Circuit Judge erred in granting the order making the rule absolute against the appellant, and requiring the sheriff to put Monckton, the purchaser, into possession of the premises sold. Appellant contends, first, that the showing made in the return to the rule was sufficient to prevent the granting of the order appealed from; and second, that in any event the notice of appeal from the order confirming the sale operated as a stay of any further proceedings, and that, pending such appeal, the Circuit Judge erred in granting the order to eject the appellant and put the purchaser into possession.

A brief review of the facts of the case will be necessary for a *proper understanding of the first contention on the part of the appellant. On October 13, 1881, the plaintiff instituted this action against the defendant to foreclose a mortgage of the real estate in question, given to secure the payment of a bond bearing date October 7, 1880, payable in four equal annual instalments, with interest from that date, only one of said instalments being then due. To this action the defendant was regularly made a party, but she put in no answer and made no defence. The case was referred to the master, who, on July 25, 1882, made his report, stating that there was then due the first instalment and interest, and that the remaining instalments were not then due. On hearing this report the court granted an order on July 28, 1882, requiring the defendant to pay the whole amount of the bond, as well the instalment then due, as those which had not then become payable, on or before the first day of September, 1882, and in default thereof that the mortgaged premises be sold. Under this order the premises were offered for sale by the master on salesday in November, 1882, and bid off by J. Q. Marshall, the attorney for the plaintiff in the action, who subsequently transferred his bid to W. H. Monckton.

On February 7, 1883, Monckton complied with the terms of the sale, and title was made to him by the master. On the very next day the defendant gave notice of a motion to set aside the judgment and all proceedings thereunder upon two grounds: "First, that if certain money paid by the defendant to the plaintiff or her agents had been properly credited upon said bond, no right of action would have accrued to the plaintiff; and, second, for surprise, in this, that the defendant was not aware, until judgment had been obtained against her, that the payments referred to had not been credited upon the bond." Upon hearing this motion, Judge Hudson granted an order setting aside said judgment and the sale made thereunder, and granting the defendant leave to file her answer. From this order the plaintiff and Monckton appealed, when this court allowed so much of Judge Hudson's order to stand as vacated the judgment and allowed the defendant to come in and answer, but reversed so much of it as set aside the sale. See Le Conte v. Irwin, 19 S. C., 554. Subsequently to the filing of the decision of this court, the defendant put in her *answer, alleging, amongst other things, that the first instalment of the bond had been paid before the action was commenced, but making no allegation of fraud in the obtaining of the judgment of foreclosure. The issue thus raised was pending at the time the orders appealed from were granted.

The defendant in her return to the rule states, amongst other things, that on the morning of the same day, to wit, April 14, 1884, that the order confirming the sales was made, but that at an earlier hour than that at which such order was signed, the defendant herein had commenced an action, by the service of a summons and complaint, against the plaintiff herein and the said Monckton, and "that it is therein alleged under oath that the judgment obtained against this respondent was so obtained by fraud, and the sale a fraud against her; that the plaintiff therein be allowed to pay whatever may be found to be due upon her bond, and that she be allowed to redeem the premises upon payment of the bond, and that W. H. Monckton be ordered to deliver up the title to him to be cancelled, upon her so doing; that the purpose of the suit is to establish the fraud and set aside the sale, and that a speedy trial is expected." There is nothing in the return which alleges that Monckton was a party to the alleged fraud in obtaining the judgment, or even that he had any knowledge thereof. Four days afterwards she made a further return, in which she stated that before the sale by the master, Monckton asked her if her property was for sale, to which she replied "that she had heard so, but that whoever bought it would never get it; that she had paid Mrs. Le Conte more money than was due, and that she owed her nothing. * * * That the said W. H. Monckton was fully apprised of the intention of this respondent to resist the enforcement of the decree of foreclosure taken against her, and bought the property at his peril."

So far as we can discover, this is the only statement or allegation in any way connecting Monckton with any implication in, or knowledge of, any fraud in obtaining the judgment under which the sale was made, even if this could be regarded as importing any allegation of fraud against any one. It is simply an assertion that there was nothing due on the bond at the time the action was commenced, a fact which the defendant had had an *opportunity of asserting and proving, which she had neglected to avail herself of, and that, therefore, she intended to resist the enforcement of the judgment. It cannot be distorted into a charge of any fraud in obtaining the judgment. These facts certainly did not furnish any sufficient reason for discharging the rule, for the Circuit Judge had also before him the fact that an order confirming the sale had been granted, and this precluded any inquiry into such facts. When the application for the order to confirm the sale was made, these facts were not brought to the attention of the Circuit Judge, as they should have been, for that order was granted on April 14, 1884, and the returns stating these facts were not sworn to until the 19th and 23d of April.

In Pope v. Frazee (5 S. C., 269), it was held that an order confirming a sheriff's report of sales under a judgment of foreclosure is a bar to an action against the sheriff and the purchaser to set aside the sale on the ground that it was null and void, as being in violation of the statute forbidding a sheriff from purchasing at his own sale. In that case the following language, applicable to this case, was used by the court: "If there was fraud or illegality, it should have been shown when the motion to confirm the report was made. The confirmation stopped the mouths of all who were interested in the matter, and who had the privilege of then speaking." It is true that there may be cases in which a subsequently discovered fraud might be sufficient ground for opening the order of confirmation, but in this case there is no allegation, and certainly no proof, that the facts relied upon as vitiating the sale were discovered after the order confirming the sale was made; and, on the contrary, it appears from appellant's own return that she not only knew the facts now relied upon, but that she had actually commenced an action to set aside the sale before the order was granted, though for some inexplicable reason she failed to bring these matters to the attention of the Circuit Judge when the order confirming the sale was applied for.

Indeed, this case presents a series of delays or neglects on the part of the defendant, which it is very difficult, if not impossible, to account for. 1st. When the action was originally commenced on a bond, upon which only one of the instalments was then due, it seems unaccountable that the defendant, who now *claims to have paid that instalment in full, should have neglected to appear and make a showing to that effect, which, if done, would have defeated the action. 2nd. That after the sale was made, although the title was not executed until several months afterwards, we have never yet been able to understand why the defendant should have delayed and neglected until the very day after the purchase money was paid and the title executed, to take any step whatever towards opening the judgment. 3d. That when the application for the order confirming the sale was made, it is difficult to conceive why she neglected then to make the showing to the Circuit Judge, which only a few days afterwards she did make on the return to the rule requiring her to show cause why the sheriff should not put the purchaser into possession, all the facts contained in such showing being manifestly known to her at the time the order of confirmation was applied for. While, therefore, it may be a matter of regret that these delays, which may possibly have worked injury to the appellant, have occurred, we cannot allow such a feeling to influence our judgment in determining the legal rights of parties litigant. If a party fails to make his defence or present his claim at the proper time and in the proper mode prescribed by law, he must take the consequences.

We think, however, that the Circuit Judge erred in making the rule absolute, while an appeal from the order confirming the sale was pending. By the express terms of the original judgment of foreclosure, the purchaser was only entitled to be let into possession upon the production of a certified copy of the order of sale, and until the appeal from that order was disposed of, the purchaser was not entitled to a certified copy of such order. The defendant certainly had a right to appeal from such order and obtain the judgment of the tribunal of last resort as to its correctness before any proceedings could be had under it, for until such final judgment was obtained, it could not be known whether there was any valid order of confirmation. The notice of appeal from that order operated as a stay of further proceedings under the provisions of section 356 of the code.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court confirming the sale be affirmed, and that the order making *the rule absolute, and requiring the sheriff to put the purchaser into possession, be reversed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, dissenting. The decree of foreclosure was set aside and the defendant, Margaret Irwin, allowed to answer the complaint as if no judgment had been rendered. It appears that she not only answered, alleging that nothing was due when the decree was rendered, but also filed an original proceeding making Monckton a party, to set aside as absolutely void the judgment and the sale made thereunder. I cannot think that the former judgment of this court involved the confirmation of the sale, and that the matter is in effect res adjudicata. In the former appeal the court reversed the order setting aside the conveyance to Monckton, but, although they moved to do so, did not confirm the sale, and I do not see that anything has occurred since to make it proper to do so now.

It is true it does not appear that the action of the defendant to set aside the sale was brought to the attention of the Circuit Judge when he granted the order confirming the sale, but the proceeding was at that time filed, and it was brought to his attention before he granted the second order ousting the defendant from the premises. It has also been brought to our attention that such proceedings are now pending, and under these circumstances it seems to me that it will only add to the confusion of the case, and possibly do injustice, now to affirm the order confirming the sale, the effect of which must be to deprive the defendant of an opportunity to be heard on the new issues raised, and so far as the sale of the land is concerned, to anticipate the result by deciding the case against her in advance. Pope v. Frazee, 5 S. C., 272. It seems to me that at the present it would be better simply to withhold confirmation and allow the parties to stand upon their rights until the new issues as to the sale now made and pending are decided.

Order confirming the sale, affirmed; order to put the purchaser in possession, reversed.

A debt due by a surety at the time of his death on a county treasurer's bond, for a default of his principal, is a "debt due to the public," and as such is entitled to priority of payment out of the assets of one deceased, under the act of 1789 (Gen. Stat. (1872), 457); but it has not a preference over antecedent liens, either general or special, in the distribution of the proceeds of sale of the property covered by such liens. Cases reviewed.

Under action to marshal the assets of one deceased, costs, disbursements, and counsel fees are primarily chargeable on the unencumbered assets, but the expenses incident to the enforce-

Before Fraser, J., Newberry, February, 1884.

This was an action by Fannie N. Baxter in her own right and as administratrix of her deceased husband, against the children and creditors of the deceased. The decree of the Circuit Judge was as follows:

This case came before me on the report of the master, dated November 14, 1883, and exceptions filed by W. J. Puffie and the State of South Carolina, defendant creditors. I shall announce my conclusions as briefly as I can, it to be obscure:

1. The order in which the debts of a decedent testate or intestate are to be paid out of his estate does not form any part of the contract by which the debt is incurred in his life-time. It pertains only to the remedy. The act of 1878, which was of force at the death of the intestate in this case, controlled the order of payment, and it is the debt, and not the mortgage, which is a mere security for the debt, which is to give the rank in the administration of the assets.

2. I see no reason why a treasurer's bond should hold any higher rank in the administration than the bond of every other public officer, or even recognizance in the sessions. They are all debts due on contracts. If such debts are to be ranked as "debts due the public," and payable as such in the administration, there would be absolutely nothing in this State on which to base a credit. I do not see how even a judicial ascertainment of the amount due on the treasurer's bond would alter the situation, except to make the claim rank as a judgment, which in this case has not been obtained.

3. It has never been the practice, so far as I know, to order the general costs, fees, and disbursements in a case like the one now before me paid out of any other than the unencumbered estate. The master seems to have followed this rule.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the exceptions be overruled, and the report of the master be confirmed.

The State of South Carolina duly served notice of appeal from said decree upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor erred in overruling appellant's exceptions to the master's report, that the master erred in recommending that the demand against the estate of James M. Baxter, deceased, arising out of his suretyship on the bond of Jesse C. Smith, late county treasurer of Newberry County, should only be paid pro rata with the specialty debts of the said intestate; whereas it is submitted that he should have found that the same ranked as a debt due to the public in the administration of the assets of the intestate.

2. Because his honor erred in overruling appellant's exceptions to the master's report, that the master erred in not finding that said demand on account of the suretyship of the intestate on said official bond, takes precedence under the act of 1789 of all other claims against the intestate's estate.

3. Because his honor erred in overruling appellant's exceptions to the master's report, that the master erred in not finding the costs and disbursements of this action, including counsel fees of the estate, should be paid out of the unencumbered personal estate of the intestate; whereas it is submitted that the same should at least be apportioned among the whole personal and real estate of the intestate.

Messrs. George Johnstone and Geo. S. Mower, for appellant.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell and J. Y. Culbreath, contra.

May 19, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

1881, James M. Baxter departed this life intestate, leaving real estate, various articles of tangible personal property, together with sundry choses in action, which being insufficient for the payment of his debts, this proceeding was commenced to marshal the assets of his estate, call in creditors, and sell the lands. The claims consisted of bonds secured by mortgages of real estate, judgments upon which executions were issued in 1869, bonds unsecured, sealed notes, and open accounts. Amongst the unsecured bonds was one in favor of the State, given by Jesse C. Smith, with the intestate as surety, to secure the faithful performance of his duties as county treasurer. Upon this bond it is conceded, for the purposes of this case, that default has been made, though no judgment has yet been recovered thereon; and one of the main questions in the case is whether this bond constitutes a debt due to the public, and if so whether this will give it priority over the debts secured by liens, either special or general. The only other question is whether the costs and disbursements of this action, including the counsel fees of those representing the estate, should be a charge, primarily, on the unencumbered estate, or whether they should be a charge upon the whole estate.

What constitutes "debts due to the public" in the sense of those terms as used in the act of 1789 (Gen. Stat. (1872), 457), the law in force at the time of the death of the intestate, does not seem ever to have been judicially ascertained in this State. In the case of The Commissioners of Public Accounts v. Greenwood (1 Desaus. 150, 600), it seemed to be assumed that a liability for a default on the bond of one of the commissioners of the treasury was such a debt, though the question was not discussed or decided in that case, inasmuch as the decision was rested upon another ground. In State v. Harris (2 Bail., 598), O'Neill, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, expressed the opinion that the meaning of the term "debts due to the public," as used in the act of 1789, was "debts which are due to the State as a sovereign, and for the protection of both the citizen and property," but that debts "which arise ex contractu, and which are therefore due to her in her corporate capacity, or debts which arise ex delicto, and which are the punishment of the law for misdemeanors, cannot be entitled to any preference over the debts due to citizens." But *this is conceded to be, as it manifestly was, a mere dictum. For in that case the question did not arise under the act of 1789, but there the question was as to the distribution of the assigned estate of a living insolvent debtor, and not as to the distribution of the assets of a person deceased, to which alone the act of 1789 applied. All that was really decided in the case was, that the State was not entitled, at common law or on the ground of prerogative, to any preference over other creditors.

In the case of Klinek v. Keckley (2 Hill Eq. 250), the same judge announced the same opinion, basing it upon what he had said in State v. Harris, and seemed to think that the words in question were only intended to embrace taxes. He, however, adds: "But perhaps the words used in the act of 1789 ought to have a little more extended meaning, and to be construed by the common law." This too, was a mere dictum, for all that the case really decides is that the act of 1789 only gives the State preference where the debts due to the State and the citizen were of equal degree; and hence that a junior judgment in favor of the commissioners of the poor, for certain taxes received by the intestate as chairman of the board of commissioners, and not paid over, could not take precedence of a senior judgment in favor of a citizen. It seems, therefore, that the question as to what debts are embraced within the terms, "debts due to the public," as used in the act of 1789, has never been decided. It is true that even the dicta of so eminent a Judge, whose language has been quoted, is always entitled to the highest consideration, but at the same time they are not authoritative, and if found to be in conflict with what we regard as the proper construction of the terms used in the act, they will not be allowed to control our decision. Our duty is simply to ascertain, by the settled rules of construction, the legislative will, as declared by their language, and announce the same.

Now, the language used in the act is very general and comprehensive, "debts due to the public." No limitation is either expressed or implied by the terms used in the act, and we are aware of no rule of construction which would justify us in fixing any limit to general terms, when the legislature has not seen fit to do so. Hence, where we find that there is a debt and that it *is due to the public, we are bound to place it in the class which the legislature has declared shall be entitled to preference. We are less reluctant to reach this conclusion when we see that the court, both in the case of The Commissioners v. Greenwood and Klinck v. Keckley, seemed to assume, without, however, deciding the question, that debts arising from default in accounting for public money did belong to the class protected by the act, and were not disposed to coincide in the limitation placed upon those terms by Judge O'Neill.

Again, if the preference given to the State rested upon the ground of prerogative, then there might be good reason for confining the preference to such debts as were due to the State as a sovereign, as, for instance, taxes; but the above cases show that such is not the ground upon which the preference is based, but that it rests solely upon the terms of the act, and the only question, therefore, is as to the proper construction of the language thereused.

We think, therefore, that the debt due by the intestate as surety on the bond of the county treasurer is entitled to be classed as a debt due to the public.

The next question is, whether such debt is entitled to preference over antecedent liens, either general or special. This question has been so repeatedly decided that it is not now open to argument. That a debt due to the public cannot take precedence of a debt secured by the lien of a mortgage, judgment, or execution, seems to be well settled by the following cases: Commissioners v. Greenwood, supra; Klinck v. Keckley, supra; Rutledge v. Hazlehurst, 1 McCord Eq., 466; Brown v. Gilliland, 3 Desaus., 539; Haynsworth v. Frierson, 11 Rich., 476.

It is true that the case of Percival ads. McVoy (Dudley, 337) appears to be somewhat in conflict with this doctrine. In that case the plaintiff sued for services rendered intestate in his last illness as a nurse, and the administrator pleaded plene administravit praeter a particular sum which was applicable to the payment of judgments recovered in the lifetime of the intestate. The jury having found for the plaintiff, defendant appealed, amongst other things, upon the ground that the demand of the plaintiff was not entitled to rank as "expenses of the last illness" and take precedence of judgments, mortgages, and executions; and *the appeal was dismissed. It does not seem that the question which we are called upon to decide was considered in that case. The controversy there seemed to be whether such services were rendered gratuitously, and whether they could be regarded as expenses of the last illness, and no attention seems to have been paid to the question whether a debt for such expenses could take precedence of prior liens. It may be that the fund in the hands of the administrator, in that case, arose from assets not bound by the lien of the judgments, and if so then there would not be any apparent conflict even with the cases above cited; but whether this was so or not, that case, in which the question manifestly did not attract or receive the attention of the court, cannot have the effect of shaking the doctrine settled by the cases which we have cited, none of which were referred to in Percival ads. McVoy. Indeed, from what is said in the subsequent case of Haynsworth v. Frierson, supra, it is apparent that the court did not regard the case from Dudley as unsettling the law as established by the cases of Commissioners v. Greenwood, and other cases above cited.

While, therefore, the debt due by the intestate as surety on the bond of the county treasurer, is a debt due to the public, and as such entitled to precedence over other bond debts and sealed claims, it cannot take such precedence over the debts secured by liens, so far as the proceeds of the property covered by such liens are concerned.

The only remaining question is as to the fund upon which costs, disbursements, and counsel fees are primarily chargeable. We agree with the Circuit Judge that, as a general proposition, they are primarily chargeable on the unencumbered assets; but so much thereof as arises from the enforcement of these liens, as for example the expenses of surveys, advertisement, and sales of the property encumbered by the liens, should be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of such property; and this we understand to be the view taken by the master and intended to be approved by the Circuit Judge, though the general terms used in the decree might, possibly, leave room for the inference that all the costs, &c., were to be charged on the unencumbered assets.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit *Court be modified in accordance with the views herein announced, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of carrying out such views.

Messrs. L. F. Youmans and W. A. Clark, for appellants.

Mr. F. W. Fickling, contra.

June 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On March 13, 1872 (15 Stat., 220), an act of the legislature was passed authorizing the mayor and aldermen of the city of Columbia to borrow money by issuing bonds of said city, which, together with the then outstanding indebtedness of the city, should not exceed the sum of $600,000, *the declared object of the act being to limit the whole amount of the indebtedness of the said city to the amount above mentioned; and for this purpose it was provided that before any bonds were issued under said act, the city council should recall and cancel certain bonds to the amount of $250,000, issued on August 21, 1871, for the erection of a city hall and market. By the fourth section of said act it was provided that the mayor and aldermen should, at any time upon the written demand of the holder or holders of $50,000 of said bonds, or of corporators to the number of twenty, publish a detailed statement of the city indebtedness and the character of the same. The seventh section of the act prohibited the mayor and aldermen from increasing the debt of said city beyond the said sum of $600,000, and provided that "upon any attempt being made so to do, any bondholder or corporate taxpayer shall have his action to enjoin the said mayor and aldermen from so doing."

The plaintiff, as a corporator and taxpayer of said city, having made the demand upon the mayor and aldermen of the city as provided for in the fourth section of the act, and having failed to obtain the desired information, on August 14, 1875, instituted this action against John Alexander as mayor, and Henry W. Purvis, Augustus Cooper, C. J. Carroll, B. F. Griffin, Sancho P. Davis, John A. Pugh, S. D. Swygert, Adam Thomas, William A. Carr, L. L. Brown, William Simons, and D. Wells, aldermen of said city of Columbia. In the complaint it was alleged that the said mayor and aldermen had contracted debts of the city largely in excess of the amount limited by the above cited act, and were then, from time to time, increasing said debt beyond said limit, and prayed that all debts in excess of said limit be declared invalid, and that said mayor and aldermen be enjoined from further increasing said debt. The mayor and aldermen answered, denying that they had increased the debt of the city beyond the limit fixed by the act, alleging that the debt of the city at the time of the passage of said act far exceeded the limit fixed therein.

On September 7, 1875, the said defendants "were enjoined, by order of the court, from contracting or increasing said city debt, except to a limited amount, ascertained to be necessary for *the current expenses of the city government." On January 6, 1876, the Columbia Waterpower Company and others, as representing various classes of creditors of the city, were made parties, and the complaint was further amended by inserting allegations impeaching certain demands against the city, and by calling in creditors to establish their demands. The only answers to the amended complaint were those put in by John Agnew, mayor, and his board of aldermen, who seem to have succeeded John Alexander and his board on the first Tuesday in April, 1876, and the Carolina National Bank representing one of the classes of creditors.

On January 6, 1876, James P. Lowe was appointed referee "to inquire and report as to the matters embraced in the complaint." He made four reports, dated January 11, July 25, and November 9, 1876, and February 5, 1877, in which is embraced a complete exhibit of the financial affairs of the city, together with a large amount of testimony impeaching or sustaining various disputed claims.

On March 1, 1877, the case, with the testimony taken by referee Lowe, was referred to Louis LeConte, Esq., "to hear and determine all the issues," and on April 28, 1877, he made his report, recommending that the complaint be dismissed as to all the defendants without costs, except as to John Alexander and the persons composing his board of aldermen, and the mayor and aldermen of the city of Columbia, and recommending that John Alexander and the other defendants named in the original complaint be required to pay the costs and disbursements of the plaintiff herein. To this report the plaintiff and John Agnew, as mayor, with his board of aldermen, excepted so far as it related to the validity of certain claims against the city, and B. F. Griffin, S. D. Swygert, Augustus Cooper, C. J. Carroll, Adam Thomas, and William Thomas, six of the defendants named as aldermen in the original complaint, also excepted, amongst other things, because they were required to pay the costs of the plaintiff.

On August 31, 1877, the cause was recommended to Mr. Barnwell, as master, to take further testimony, and, by consent, the city of Columbia, as a corporation, was made a party. The *master made two reports, furnishing a complete history of the cause and the issues involved. From these reports it appears that John Alexander was mayor, and the persons named as the other defendants in the original complaint were aldermen of the city from the first Tuesday in April, 1874, to the first Tuesday in April, 1876, when, as we infer, John Agnew and his board of aldermen succeeded to those offices. It also appears that John Alexander was mayor, and the following persons named as defendants in the original complaint, viz.: B. F. Griffin, Augustus Cooper, C. J. Carroll, and William A. Carr, were aldermen from the first Tuesday in April, 1872, to the first Tuesday in April, 1874, and that two of the defendants in the original complaint are dead, viz., Adam Thomas and William Simons. Whether there were any exceptions to these reports of the master, or whether any recommendation was made therein as to costs, as was done in the report of referee LeConte, which was recommitted to the master, does not appear: but when the case was called for hearing in the Circuit Court, counsel for plaintiff announced that since the passage of the act of February 19, 1880 (17 Stat., 233), authorizing the city of Columbia to fund its debt, and repealing all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions, the case could not proceed to final judgment, and all that was asked for was an order providing for the payment of plaintiff's costs and disbursements.

The Circuit Judge proceeded to consider that question alone, and in his decree, after setting forth the facts substantially as above stated, used this language: "I am satisfied from the evidence as to the correctness of the conclusions of referee LeConte and master Barnwell, that the aggregate debt of the city of Columbia, on October 31, 1873, was $600,000, the amount limited under the act of March 13, 1872; that on April 30, 1874, said debt was increased to $650,000; on December 31, 1874, to $679,000; and on December 31, 1875, to $744,000. I am also satisfied from the evidence that the defendants in the original complaint, John Alexander, as mayor, and Henry W. Purvis and others, aldermen of the city of Columbia, did increase the debt of said city, and, at the commencement of

He therefore adjudged that inasmuch as the action could not proceed to final judgment, since the passage of the act of February 19, 1880, the complaint be dismissed without costs to the defendants; that all pending injunctions be dissolved, and that the defendants, John Alexander and others, named as defendants in the original complaint, having rendered the action necessary by their violation of the provisions of the act of 1872, be required to pay the plaintiff his costs and disbursements incurred prior to February 19, 1880, and that for this purpose plaintiff have judgment, with leave to issue execution, against John Alexander, Henry W. Purvis, Augustus Cooper, C. J. Carroll, B. F. Griffin, Sancho P. Davis, John A. Pugh, S. D. Swygert, William A. Carr, L. L. Brown, and D. Wells, with leave to said plaintiff to make the legal representatives of Adam Thomas and William Simons, deceased, parties defendants by proper proceedings.

From this judgment the defendants, B. F. Griffin, S. D. Swygert, W. A. Carr, and Augustus Cooper, appealed upon the ground of error "in ordering and adjudging that the plaintiff have leave to enter execution against John Alexander, mayor, Henry W. Purvis and others, aldermen, including these appellants, personally, for his costs and disbursements in this action accrued up to February 19, 1880, and the antecedent portions of the decree on which this was based." Pending the appeal, the plaintiff died, and the action has, by the order of this court, been continued in the name of F. W. Fickling as his administrator.

This appeal cannot be regarded as presenting any question except whether there was error in requiring the appellants, personally, to pay plaintiff's costs, for that portion of the exception which imputes error in "the antecedent portions of the decree" is too general to require any notice at our hands. No specific error is pointed out, except as to the costs. Indeed, as the only papers furnished us are the decree of the judge, with a very brief statement appended (in which none of the facts stated in the decree are contravened), and the argument, or points and authorities, of appellants' counsel, we are necessarily confined to the facts stated in the decree as supplemented by the appended state*ment. It is true that the fundamental fact, as to whether the debt of the city was increased by the board of aldermen to which appellants belonged, is not only questioned but absolutely denied in appellants' points and authorities, but, as we have often had occasion to say, we can only consider such facts as appear in the "Case" or are admitted at the hearing, and cannot consider any additional or contradictory statement made in the argument of counsel.

We are, therefore, bound, in considering the question presented by this appeal, to assume as a fact that, at the time this action was originally commenced, the defendants, Alexander and his board of aldermen, amongst whom were these appellants, had increased, and were continuing to increase, the debt of the city beyond the amount limited, fixed by the act of March 13, 1872, and, therefore, that there was good ground for plaintiff's action, and that prima facie, at least, he would be entitled to costs as against them. But granting this to be so, two other questions are presented: first, whether these defendants, being sued in their official capacity, can be made personally liable for costs; and, second, up to what stage in the case would they be liable, inasmuch as it appears that very soon after the action was commenced they went out of office, and they were succeeded by John Agnew and his board of aldermen, when the case by amendment had assumed a totally different aspect.

But before proceeding to the consideration of these questions, it will be necessary to notice a preliminary objection raised by the counsel for the respondent, which it is urged effectually cuts off this appeal. It is contended by him that this is an equity cause, and that in such cases costs are in the discretion of the court, and any order in reference thereto is not appealable. This, as a general proposition, is doubtless true. Under the former equity practice, that court would not entertain an appeal upon a question of costs alone, but the cases in which this was decided were cases in which the chancellor who made the decree as to costs had heard the case on its merits, and his discretion in awarding costs was supposed to have been exercised upon full view of the conduct of the parties. Even in that court, when the appeal was upon other points, as well as upon the question of costs, and *the decree below was reversed upon some point affecting the merits, the order for costs would likewise be reversed (Singleton v. Allen, 2 Strobb. Eq., 166); and in Hext v. Walker (5 Rich. Eq., 5), the Court of Appeals went so far as to modify a decree in respect to the costs, although there was no appeal upon that point, upon the ground that the Circuit Chancellor had inadvertently awarded costs against a party who clearly was not liable for them. So that it appears that even in the old Court of Equity the question of costs was not entirely beyond the reach of the Court of Appeals.

Under the code, as it was originally adopted, costs in equity causes were expressly declared to be in the discretion of the court. See section 332, of the Code of 1870, as construed in Mars v. Conner, 9 S. C., 79. This section was, however, repealed by the act of February 20, 1880 (17 Stat., 303), and now, by section 323 of the Code of 1882, costs follow the result of the action in cases of chancery "unless otherwise ordered by the court." Since these changes of the law, it may, perhaps, be doubted whether costs in cases of chancery are in the discretion of the court; but be that as it may, and assuming that where costs are awarded to one or the other party as a matter of discretion, determined by the relative merits of the several parties upon a review of the whole case, we do not think we are precluded from hearing an appeal from the decision of a judge who only heard the question of costs, in which it is alleged that he had awarded costs against parties who are not, in law, liable to pay them.

We proceed, then, to inquire whether the fact that these appellants were sued in their official capacity as aldermen, protects them from personal liability for costs. The authorities cited by the Circuit Judge (2 Story Eq. Jur., § 955a, and 3 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr., 1548, 1557) show that where public functionaries, who are exercising special public trusts or functions or trustees of private individuals, by their malfeasance or other misconduct render a suit against them necessary, they may be required personally to pay costs. The authorities cited by the counsel for appellants on this point, only go to show that a public officer acting judicially cannot be made liable for any mere mistake or error of judgment, but that malice or corruption must be shown.

In this case the *mayor and aldermen were, by an act of the legislature, positively prohibited from increasing the debt of the city beyond the amount therein fixed, and as the Circuit Judge found that these appellants, together with their associates, had increased, and were continuing to increase, the debt of the city beyond said limit, they were guilty of personal misconduct in a matter not of a judicial nature, but in open violation of the plain terms of the statute, and, therefore, might properly be held liable, personally, for costs.

The only remaining inquiry is as to whether these appellants, whose rights alone are under consideration, should have been made liable for the costs of the whole case, in the new aspect which it had assumed; or, if not, what portion of the costs should they have been required to pay. It will be observed that the proper object of the action, as originally commenced, was simply to obtain an injunction restraining the mayor and aldermen from increasing the debt beyond the prescribed limit, for that was all that the act provided for; for although the complaint did also demand that all debts in excess of the limit fixed by the act should be declared invalid, yet that was beyond what the act provided for, and certainly could not have been determined in the absence of the parties claiming such debts to be due. If, therefore, the then mayor and aldermen, who were the only original defendants, had raised no issue as to the allegation that they had increased, and were continuing to increase, the debt of the city, the action then, having served its purpose, must necessarily have terminated with a simple order for injunction. But they did raise such issue, and, of course, it was necessary to try and determine the same. The injunction granted on September 7, 1875, so soon after the commencement of the action, must have been a temporary injunction, until the issue raised by the answer of the defendants could be heard and determined. It seems to us, therefore, that the action could not be regarded as terminated by that order of injunction, but that it must have gone on until the issue raised had been determined. And as that issue has been determined against these appellants, we see no error in charging them with all the costs and disbursements of the plaintiff in the trial and determination of that issue.

It seems, however, that after the action had been commenced *for the single purpose above indicated, it was, by amendment and by the introduction of new parties, converted into a wholly different action, in which new issues were raised, with which, so far as we can see, these appellants and their associates had no concern; for having gone out of office on the first Tuesday in April, 1876, and their successors brought in by amendment, it was no longer their right or duty to contest such new issues, and they could not, therefore, be properly charged with any of the costs and disbursements incurred by the plaintiff in litigating such new issues.

It seems to us, therefore, that the Circuit Judge erred in charging these appellants and their associates in the board of aldermen with all the costs and disbursements incurred by the plaintiff in litigating and determining the various issues which arose in the action by reason of the change in the object, or, rather, in the addition to the objects originally sought to be obtained; and that they are only chargeable with such costs and disbursements as the plaintiff may have sustained in determining the issue originally raised, viz., whether these appellants with their associates in the board of aldermen had increased, or were continuing to increase, the city debt beyond the prescribed limit, at the time of the commencement of this action; whether such costs and disbursements were incurred before or after the granting the order of injunction of September 7, 1875, taking care that in charging them with costs or disbursements incurred after that date, that they shall be only such costs and disbursements as would be incurred in hearing and determining such issue, and not costs or disbursements incurred in hearing or determining any of the new issues raised by the complaint as amended.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified according to the views herein announced, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of carrying out such views.

*THE BATH SOUTH CAROLINA PAPER CO. v. LANGLEY.

SAME v. SAME.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨1008.]

Findings of fact by the Circuit Judge in a law case (a jury being waived) cannot be reviewed on appeal.

Before Hudson, J., Aiken, October, 1884.

These were two actions by the plaintiff corporation against W. C. Langley, W. C. Sibley, J. G. Bailie, E. R. Schneider, D. B. Hack, and M. F. Foster, commenced in the spring of 1880. They are a sequel to the case of Barrett v. Bath Paper Company, 13 S. C., 128. A jury trial was waived and all the issues of law and fact were referred to John T. Rhett, Esq., "for trial and determination." After taking the testimony and hearing arguments, the referee made a very carefully prepared report, in which, after full discussion, he announced the following conclusions:

Matters of Fact. 1. I find that the rental value of the property is twelve thousand dollars annually. That the time for which the defendants are liable, if liable at all, is from

August 6 *to March 31, 1880, and the whole amount $19,800 (nineteen thousand eight hundred dollars).

2. I find that the plaintiffs did not pay the $10,000 (ten thousand dollars) counsel fees.

3. I find that the defendants were not guilty of negligence in the matter of the breaking of the dam and the injury to the wood-work connected with the pond, canal, and factory, and to the machinery.

4. I find that the injury mentioned in the foregoing finding is eleven thousand five hundred dollars expressed in money.

5. I find that the defendants were not guilty of negligence in the matter of the burning of the house, and that the value of said house is $1,500 (fifteen hundred dollars).

Matters of Law. 1. I find that the plaintiffs are barred from recovering for the use of the property by the matter being within the principles of res adjudicata.

2. I find that the plaintiffs cannot recover the counsel fees for the reason given in the foregoing finding.

3. I find that the defendants are not to be held to extraordinary care in the use of the property, or in the guarding of it, but that the degree of care required of them is that which a prudent man should show in the conduct of his own business in doing or omitting.

4. I find that the defendants cannot be called upon to pay the insurance money received by them to the plaintiffs.

And I find, generally, that judgment should be for the defendants.

Upon exceptions to this report by both parties, the cause came on for trial in the Circuit Court, where the following decree was rendered:

These two actions are sequels to the action of William H. Barrett and Robert A. Fleming, mortgage trustees, against the Bath South Carolina Paper Mill Company and others, including the above named defendants, reported in 13 S. C., 128 to 160. From the report of that case can be gathered the nature of the controversy, its aim, purpose, and final determination, so fully and clearly that it is needless for me to indulge in repetition here. To *that report I refer for all facts therein which have any bearing on the issues arising in the two causes now under consideration. Suffice it to say that the judgment in that case was duly and fully enforced; the sheriff's title to the present defendants was cancelled, the property returned, a resale made, the proceeds distributed in accordance with said judgment, and the new purchasers let into possession.

Thereupon the Bath Paper Mill Company began these actions to recover damages for injuries done to the property by these defendants while they were in the use and occupation thereof, by negligence and remissness, and for the rents and profits thereof in the first action; and, in the second, to recover the value of a dwelling house negligently destroyed by fire. In the first action it is questionable whether the claim for rents and profits arises from the pleadings; but of this I will speak hereafter.

The issues of fact and of law were referred by this court by consent to John T. Rhett, Esq., for determination, and upon exceptions to his report the cases came on for hearing at this term of the court. The questions raised, discussed, and decided, or which must be decided, are in the first of the cases: 1. Is the plaintiff in this action estopped by the judgment in the former action? 2. Has it so framed the present complaint as to include the claim for rents and profits, or is it an action solely in tort? 3. To what rents and profits, if any, is the plaintiff entitled in money? 4. Did the defendants damage the property by negligence or otherwise, and if so, in what amount?

The first of these questions the referee has answered in the affirmative, holding that on the principle of res adjudicata the plaintiff is estopped; not that the question of rents and profits and injury to the property was actually raised, either in the pleadings or in the evidence, but that these matters of controversy were appropriate to the issue then raised, pertained to the cause of action, and should have been there raised by the present plaintiff, and that by failing to claim such relief in that action the plaintiff has waived all right to redress.

Much learning and research on the law of res adjudicata characterize the report of the referee and arguments of counsel on both sides. A want of time prevents me from remarking at *length upon their arguments, and from entering into a full discussion of the subject. Perhaps a conclusion can be more readily reached by applying to the pleading, evidence, and judgment in that case a few plain and common-sense principles of law.

It is conceded that the relief now asked was not demanded by the Bath South Carolina Paper Mill Company in that action in the pleadings, nor was it referred to in the evidence. That action was principally and mainly a foreclosure suit. It was only as a second cause of action that the sale to the defendants now before the court was assailed for fraud, and therefore sought to be set aside. To the action of the mortgage trustees to foreclose their mortgages the Bath Paper Mill Company was a necessary party defendant, and the second cause of action, to wit, the fraudulent sale, could not have changed the company's relative position in the pleadings.

It is true that the company was friendly towards the mortgage trustees throughout the whole scope of the action and extended aid freely on all their issues, but it was a proper and necessary defendant. Nevertheless the law allowed it full privilege to demand affirmative relief against its co-defendants, the purchasers at sheriff's sale, and it might very well either in the pleadings or proof, or in both, have set up the claim to rents and profits of the land in case the sale should be declared void, and could have, furthermore, demanded compensation for property wrongfully injured or destroyed. By so doing a complete determination could have been had of every matter growing out of said alleged illegal sale betwixt all the parties to the action. Under the practice of our former Court of Equity co-defendants were frequently granted relief as against each other as matter of justice, and to avoid multiplicity of suits. See Motte v. Schult & Motte, 1 Hill Eq., 146 [26 Am. Dec. 191]. This was, anciently, and is now, the law in England, and was invariably followed by our Courts of Equity in proper cases. Under our code of procedure the rule has not been contracted, but if anything made more liberal.

Clearly, then, the Bath South Carolina Paper Mill Company could have obtained in that suit all the relief it demands in these two actions, as readily as can be had here. But was it necessary to make claim there, and by failing so to do has the company

*waived its rights? I think not. Such a claim was not necessary to the determination of the issues of that cause. It was not a necessary incident to that suit. In England the claim for mesne profits succeeded a recovery in ejectment. So it does now in some of the United States, and so it was in our State until the action of ejectment was abolished and the action of trespass to try titles substituted, which, in the very form prescribed by statute, was an action "to try the title as well as for damage." So, too, our Courts of Equity, in every case in which by decree the possession of land was restored to its rightful owner, also ordered an accounting for rents and profits, if asked so to do. But the former action which we are considering was, as we have said, to foreclose mortgages and annul a sale in which the Bath Company was a co-defendant with the purchasers at said sale, and was not bound to set up an independent cross claim against the said co-defendant purchasers, although the right to do so existed.

The present defendants in support of the alleged estoppel rely greatly upon the case of Martin and Walter v. Evans et al., 1 Stroh. Eq., 350. The case is very much like the one under consideration. The sale to Evans was set aside on the same ground on which the sale to the present defendants was declared void. The deed was cancelled, the land restored, a resale had, and the purchase money ordered to be returned to Evans. Now, in that decree leave was granted to parties to apply at the foot of the decree for any further orders which might be deemed necessary. Two years thereafter an order was applied for to compel Evans to account for the mesne profits, and was granted. The decree pronounced had been in every respect carried into effect, and the purchase money had been refunded to Evans. Now, the only difference between that case and this is, that the plaintiffs in that suit availed themselves two years after of the right to apply for an account for rents and profits, whilst in the present instance one co-defendant, as against another, prefers to bring an independent suit. In my opinion the doctrine of res adjudicata, waiver, or estoppel does not bar these actions, and it is so adjudged.

The next inquiry is as to the scope of the action. Is this an action to recover rents and profits as well as damage for property

*negligently injured or destroyed, or is it solely an action in tort for negligence? It is well settled with us, that the demand for relief, the prayer of the complaint, is no part of the cause of action: but that plaintiff can and will recover such relief as the allegations of the complaint supported by proof entitle him to. The allegations of the complaint of this plaintiff are not as full and explicit as should be, but they do aver that by the wrongful possession of the defendants the Bath Company was deprived of the use and occupation of the premises, and the claim for damages can be as well referred to this injury as to the subsequent statement of loss from the destruction of and damage to the premises. As a general rule an action in tort cannot be joined with one arising in contract express or implied; but I see no reason why a plaintiff, in suing a trespasser of this kind for the use of property, cannot incorporate a claim also for its abuse and injury, or vice versa, in suing for the trespass why he cannot lay a count for its use. The two, the use and abuse, arise in the same wrongful possession, are inseparably connected, and may properly be embraced in one action. We hold, therefore, that the present actions are maintainable, and are not obnoxious to the foregoing legal objections, and so holding, we will proceed to consider the plaintiff's claims upon their full merits under the evidence adduced and the law applicable thereto.

Let us now examine the question of damage to the property resulting from the alleged negligence of the defendants. The breaking of the dam, the rotting of the wood-work, the rusting of the machinery, and, finally, the burning of the dwelling house, are all attributed to the negligence of the defendants. The first question in this connection to be decided is, what degree of care were the defendants liable for whilst in the possession of the property? In my opinion only for such care as a prudent man should exercise in the management of property of that description, if owned by him. It is a mistake in counsel to say that the sale to defendant was absolutely void, and hence that they were high-handed trespassers from the beginning of their possession, and stood as absolute insurers of the property, or, at least, were bound to exercise extraordinary care, and were liable for slight neglect. The sale was not void, but only voidable, *and by decree of the court was, at the suit of creditors, set aside and declared void. Technically, in consequence of this decree, the defendants' possession was tortious ab initio, but they were not tortfeasors in the sense and to the extent they would have been had they vi et armis ejected the rightful owners and taken violent possession.

In the Circuit decree of Judge Kershaw they are not convicted of positive moral wrong or fraud, but only of having effected the purchase of property at public auction by a combination which is contrary to established rules of public policy. So did the Supreme Court in the case of Dudley v. Odom [5 S. C. 131, 22 Am. Rep. 6], disclaim all intention of imputing to Col. C. W. Dudley moral fraud or wrong in making the contract with Odom. Therefore, I hold that these defendants whilst in possession of the property of the Bath South Carolina Paper Mill Company were liable only for ordinary care and prudence in its custody, use, and management.

Did they exercise such? I have listened to the reading of the testimony and the very full discussion by counsel of the facts, and have since perused the evidence. To discuss it in detail in this opinion would give to it greater length than is proper, and I will content myself with giving only my findings. I am satisfied that the dam broke in a few days after the defendants took possession of the mill, from the defects existing at the time of and before the sale, which were unknown to the defendants, and against which they could not with ordinary care and diligence have guarded. This care and diligence they did exercise, and yet, in open day, the dam went out. For this loss they cannot be made to pay without violating the rules of justice and equity. The loss is a misfortune that should not fall on them, as they were in no way to blame.

But the plaintiff company's counsel say that the defendants should have repaired it. The reply to this is, that it was an immense break, to repair which required a large outlay of money, larger, perhaps, than the defendants had in hand, and moreover, the mortgage trustees about that time began suit to foreclose and set aside the sale, in which suit the company heartily coöperated, though co-defendants with their titles thus assailed. It is perfectly natural that the most prudent would have refrained *from expending so large a sum in repairing the dam. But suppose they had repaired the dam and gone on in spite of the cloud on their title, is it not clear that on a resale the court would have directed the outlay to be refunded to them out of the proceeds of the sale, if, as now, the proof had satisfied the court that the dam broke because of a defect existing at the time of the sale unknown to defendants, and against which their prudence and care could not and did not protect them? The loss most assuredly would have been made to fall upon the company in that event, and there we place it now without hesitation. In Martin and Walter v. Evans, the defendant Evans was without hesitation accorded the right of a bona fide purchaser, and in addition to the purchase money there was refunded to him compensation for improvements put upon property to which he thought he had titles.

In consequence of the breaking of the dam, the mill could not be run, and more or less decay in the wood-work occurred, and some rusting of the machinery from want of use. The evidence satisfies me that they did all in their power to prevent this, and cared for the machinery as well as any prudent owner would or could have done under like circumstances. The plaintiff has failed in so much of this action as claims damages resulting from alleged negligence of defendants whilst in the possession thereof.

Then, as to rents and profits. It is very clear that the remaining property, including the pulp mill and machinery, was useless without the water power to run it: without the pulp mill, the other machinery was useless. This pulp mill was sold subject to a heavy incumbrance. It could only be used by payment of a royalty of several thousand dollars per annum. The company suffered large arrears of this to accumulate prior to the sale, and, as I understand it from statements of counsel on both sides, the accrued, and annually accruing, royalty constituted a lien on the pulp mill and the machinery attached to it. This encumbrance on the pulp mill and machinery was very heavy, so much so that to remove it and to pay up one annual royalty would have required, perhaps, $10,000 or $15,000. To have repaired the dam would have cost as much or more, and for neither of these obstacles and embarrassments were the defendants responsible.

they could possibly *have overcome them and begun the operation of the mills, action was brought against them, involving the title to the entire property. Under these circumstances it could not be expected that they would expend so large an amount of money to repair the works and pay the royalty when in a very short time the title might be annulled. Now, the most intelligent witnesses agree in saying, and none deny the truth of it, that without the use of the pulp mill and machinery, and without the dam, or with a dam so badly broken, the mills, as paper mills, were worthless, and the rental value was nothing. Nor is it pretended that with that property in such condition, they could have made shift and embarked in any other enterprise—certainly not one requiring water power.

The referee's estimate of the rental value of the property is based entirely upon its value in good working order. But we cannot take that basis, even if we were so authorized by the evidence to thus consider it. I could not agree with the referee, when it appears that the present plaintiff, who places so high an estimate on the annual value of the use of the property, so signally failed when using it to realize any profit therefrom. The company had not only encumbered the property with very heavy mortgage debts, but their creditors generally had been forced to put their numerous and large claims in judgment, and even their operatives remained unpaid and were forced to sue their small claims for wages and put them in judgment. All this, when, according to the evidence for the company, the machinery and property generally were in first class order. It was clearing no money, but annually getting deeper involved in debt under the company's management, with dam, machinery, and all in good condition, and yet we are asked to give judgment against the defendants for $15,000 to $20,000 for the rents and profits whilst the dam was broke, the pulp mill overburdened with accrued royalty, and all things necessarily at a stand-still; whilst a law suit, besides, was pending, involving the title. I have no hesitation in saying that the claim is not tenable, and that nothing should be recovered for rents and profits when none were made, nor could have been made and realized.

it should be remarked *that the claim for reimbursements for counsel fees was abandoned.

As to the second action, much of what I have already remarked will apply. As well as I can find, there is nothing in the evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion that the house was burned through the negligence of the defendants. Their employee, Mr. Tyler, and his family were living in it at the time whilst he was engaged in taking care of the property for them. The account of the origin of the fire is just such as is usual in all cases of accidental burnings. No one of the inmates can tell how it occurred, nor does any one outside so testify as to fix negligence upon them. Without such evidence, the loss should not fall on the defendants.

So far as the insurance money is concerned, as hard as it may seem, the plaintiff cannot recover. With that contract the company had no connection. It was in no way privy to it. The defendants purchased and paid for the contract of insurance. The house was accidentally burned, and the insurance money was paid to them, and from them the plaintiff cannot in law recover it.

The findings of facts and conclusions of law by the referee, and the exceptions thereto not sustained herein, are overruled. It is therefore ordered and adjudged and decreed that the complaint in each of the aforesaid actions be dismissed with costs.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions, omitting those which alleged errors in the findings of fact:

1. That his honor erred in holding as a conclusion of law, that the defendants were only bound to exercise such care as a prudent man should exercise in the management of property of that description, if owned by him; whereas, it is submitted that the law is, and his honor should have held, that the defendants were bound to exercise extraordinary care in the use of the property, and in the guarding thereof.

2. That his honor erred in holding that the sale was not void, but only voidable; whereas, it is submitted that the law is, and his honor should have held, that the sale was void ab initio.

3. That his honor erred in holding that the defendants were not tortfeasors in the sense and to the extent they would have been had they vi et armis ejected the rightful owners and taken *violent possession; whereas, it is submitted that the law is, and his honor should have held, that the defendants were tortfeasors, and were liable to the plaintiffs to the same extent as if they had ejected the plaintiff vi et armis and taken violent possession.

4. That his honor erred in holding, as a construction of Judge Kershaw's decree, that the defendants "were not convicted of positive moral wrong or fraud, but only of having effected the purchase of property at public auction by a combination, which is contrary to established rules of public policy:" whereas, it is submitted that his honor should have held, in the language of Judge Kershaw's decree as confirmed by the Supreme Court, that the sale was set aside expressly "upon the grounds of fraud and public policy." (13 S. C., 149.)

9. That his honor erred in holding that the rental value of the property should be estimated upon it while in its damaged condition, accruing after the defendants had taken possession, and as though the defendants had no right to use the pulp mill; whereas, it is submitted that the rule for estimating the damage is the rental value of the property at the time defendants took possession of the same.

11. That his honor erred in holding that the pendency of the action, brought to set aside the sale, exonerated or in any way relieved the defendants of any responsibility; whereas, it is submitted that such action was an express notice to them of their fraudulent title, and any holding of the property thereafter was in utter disregard of plaintiffs' rights, in defiance of law, and was calculated to aggravate the unlawful acts of defendants.

12. That his honor erred in holding that the defendants were not liable for the value of the house destroyed by fire; whereas, he should have found that the defendants did not exercise extraordinary or even ordinary care in the use and protection of said house, and that the same was destroyed through negligence of the defendants and their agents, and, therefore, liable to plaintiffs for the value thereof.

13. It is submitted that the defendants held the house that was *burnt as trespassers, and, therefore, in order to excuse themselves from liability on account of the destruction, it was not enough for them to show that they did not know how the fire originated, but it was incumbent upon them to go further, and show that the fire was unavoidable, and without the least possible blame to themselves; and having failed to do so, they are liable to plaintiffs for the value of said house, and his honor erred in not so deciding.

14. It is submitted that the defendants had no insurable interest in the house destroyed by fire; that the plaintiff was the true owner thereof, and the money received by defendants on account of its destruction was held by them as trustees for the plaintiffs, and they should be made to account to the plaintiffs therefor; and that his honor erred in not so deciding.

The defendants filed the following exceptions:

1. Because, it is submitted, that in reaching the correct conclusion declared by his honor, that the complaint in the first action for $50,000 should be dismissed, he should have given, in addition to the reasons given, the reason and ground that the plaintiffs could not recover "rents and profits" or "rental value" in said action, because the complaint was simply for negligence; and it is submitted that his honor erred in not so finding.

2. Because, it is submitted, that his honor erred in not giving as another reason for the conclusion that he reached, to wit, that the plaintiffs were estopped from recovering any amount for "rents and profits" or "rental value" in this action by the proceedings in the former action of W. H. Barrett et al. v. Bath South Carolina Paper Company et al., upon the principles of res adjudicata.

Messrs. J. Ganahl, James Aldrich, and G. W. Croft, for appellant.

June 19, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

on, consisting of a paper factory and *its appurtenances, belonging to the plaintiffs, was offered for sale under various judgments against said company and bid off by the defendants through their agent, Mr. Henderson, and on the next day, titles having been made to them by the sheriff, they took possession of the property. A very short time after they went into possession of the property, to wit, August 20, 1878, the dam of the pond which furnished the water power necessary for running said factory was broken, and in consequence thereof, the property could not be and was not used by the defendants for the purposes for which it was intended.

On August 21, 1878, an action was commenced by Barrett and others against the plaintiffs herein and the defendants herein and the judgment creditors of the company with a double aspect. 1st. To obtain foreclosure of certain alleged mortgages which had been executed by the Bath Company on said property to the said Barrett and others, the validity of which was questioned; and, 2d. In the event that the court should determine that said mortgages were not valid liens as against the judgments, then for the purpose of setting aside the sale of the property to the defendants of August 5, 1878, upon the ground of fraud therein. The case was heard by Judge Kershaw, who rendered a decree that the mortgages were not valid liens, and that said sale be set aside upon the ground of constructive, not actual, fraud, and upon appeal his decree was affirmed. Thereupon the defendants, on March 30, 1880, surrendered the possession of the said property and the same was subsequently resold under the decree of Judge Kershaw.

For a more full account of the proceedings in the case thus briefly referred to, reference may be had to Barrett v. Bath Paper Company, 13 S. C., 128.

On April 21, 1880, and on May 4, 1880, the plaintiffs commenced the two actions, in which this appeal is taken, against the defendants, which were heard and will be considered together. By the first they seek to recover damages for the illegal seizure and detention of the said property, for the loss of the dam and injury to the wood-work and machinery; and by the second they seek to recover damages for the destruction by fire of a building on the premises, and also the sum of $1,000 received by the defendants from an insurance company for the building so *destroyed by fire during the time the defendants were in possession of the property, which insurance, it appears, was effected by the defendants.

By consent of all parties the issues in these two actions were referred to a referee "for trial and determination." The referee made his report, in which he found that the claim of the plaintiffs in the first action for the use of the property was barred by "the plea of res adjudicata, or rather the principles of it as used in equity," and the claim for damages by the breaking of the dam, and the consequent injury to the wood-work and machinery, could not be sustained, because there was no proof of negligence on the part of the defendants; and in the second action he found that the plaintiffs could not recover the insurance money, as there was "no such privity between them and the defendants, or the insurers, as entitled them to recover from the defendants the insurance received." He therefore found generally for the defendants in both of the cases.

This report, with the exceptions thereto, was heard by Judge Hudson, who held: 1st. That "the doctrine of res adjudicata, waiver, or estoppel, does not bar these actions." 2d. That as to the claim for the use of the property, or the rents and profits thereof, it could not be sustained, as no rents and profits were, or could have been, realized by the defendants in the condition in which the property was, within a very few days after they took possession, which condition was not due to the fault of the defendants. 3d. That no damages could be claimed for the loss of the dam and the consequent injury to the wood-work and machinery, inasmuch as this was not a consequence of the negligence of the defendants, but resulted from causes for which they were not responsible. In the other action he held that the plaintiffs, not being in any way privy to the contract of insurance, could not recover the insurance money received by the defendants. He therefore rendered judgment dismissing the complaints in both of the actions.

From these judgments plaintiffs appeal upon numerous grounds, which need not be set out in detail here. Inasmuch as these are law cases, and not cases in chancery, it is quite clear that we have no jurisdiction to review any findings of fact, but are confined solely to the correction of errors at law, assuming the facts to be as found below. Hence it will not be necessary, or even proper, for us to consider any of the questions of fact raised by the grounds of appeal. The defendants also, by the form of exceptions, seek to sustain the judgment below in the first action upon other grounds than those upon which it is placed by the Circuit Judge, and for this purpose contend that the plaintiffs could not recover anything for rents and profits, or for rental value, because the complaint was simply for negligence; and, 2d. That the plaintiffs were estopped from recovering any rents and profits, or rental value, by the proceedings in the former case of Barrett v. Bath Paper Company upon the principles of res adjudicata.

We do not propose to consider the various exceptions in detail, but simply to determine what we understand to be the fundamental and controlling questions in the case. The fundamental idea upon which the argument for the plaintiffs rests is that the sheriff's sale on August 5, 1878, was absolutely void, and that the defendants, in taking and holding possession of the property under that sale, were tortfeasors, or trespassers in the same sense and to the same extent as if they had taken such possession vi et armis. This, we think, is not a proper view of the relations of the parties. The sale certainly was not absolutely void; for, if so, it would not have been binding on any of the parties, and might have been so treated whenever and wherever it was encountered. Now, it is quite clear that if the defendants had refused to comply with their bid, they could have been compelled to do so, and it is equally clear that the sale could not have been treated as a nullity in any collateral proceeding, but that it was necessary that it should be assailed and set aside in a direct proceeding, as was done. Nor do we think that the defendants could be regarded as trespassers, taking possession vi et armis. They went in peaceably, and with the acquiescence of plaintiffs, under a clear legal title; and it seems to us an entire misuse of terms to characterize them as trespassers. If the position taken by appellants be correct, then it would follow that the sale by the sheriff and his title might have been disregarded and the defendants might have been sued for trespass the *moment they went into possession, and this surely would not be contended for.

and therefore the right to possession, but inasmuch as they had acquired such title under circumstances that a Court of Equity, from considerations of public policy, would not allow them to retain it, they could, by proper proceedings in that court, and only in that court, be required to surrender their title and account for the rents and profits while in possession. Upon the same principle, if one buys trust property with a knowledge of the trust, he will be declared in equity a trustee, and will be required to surrender the property, notwithstanding he may have the legal title, and account for the rents and profits. But certainly such a person could not be regarded as a trespasser, and as such liable for damages.

In this case it does not appear that the defendants personally did or said anything which vitiated the sale; in fact, it does not even appear that any of them were present at the sale. What was done was the act of their agent, Mr. Henderson, and Judge Kershaw in his decree very properly exempted him from any charge of moral wrong, and it is manifest that the Supreme Court took the same view, for their opinion rests solely upon the ground that the arrangement made by Mr. Henderson necessarily tended to chill the biddings, inasmuch as by reason of such arrangement some of the judgment creditors lost that motive to bid at the sale which otherwise would naturally prompt them to do so in order to save their debts, and thus that competition, which is the life of such sales, was prevented. The mere fact that the defendants desired to obtain, and did obtain, the property at a price less than its real value (and this is all that the defendants can be charged with having done personally), would not have vitiated the sale; the real vice was that their agent made such an arrangement as would necessarily tend to diminish the number of bidders and thus prevent that competition which might otherwise have been naturally expected, and this from considerations of public policy the law will not permit.

It not unfrequently happens that acts involving no moral wrong are set aside by a Court of Equity upon the ground of legal fraud, as contradistinguished from moral fraud, because they violate some settled principle of public policy. Thus a person who makes a voluntary conveyance with the most innocent, or even laudable, motives, may find such a conveyance declared fraudulent in law and set aside; or, as in Dudley v. Odum (5 S. C., 131 [22 Am. Rep. 6]), a contract, which it was conceded violated no moral rule, was declared fraudulent, because made in contravention of a well settled principle of public policy. In such cases it would be clearly a misuse, if not an abuse, of terms, to characterize the persons who made such conveyances or contracts as tortfeasors in the sense of those terms as used by the counsel for appellants. So here we think it is a mistake to suppose that the act of these defendants, through their agent, Mr. Henderson, was of such a character as would justify such a charge.

It seems to us, therefore, that the relation of the defendants to the plaintiffs was more like that of a trustee than a trespasser, and hence it has been argued with much force that the claim now made in the first action was a necessary incident to the former suit, and should have been there adjusted and not made the subject of a second action. It is undoubtedly true that the plaintiffs could, in the former action of Barrett v. Bath Paper Company and others, have required these defendants to account for the rents and profits, and such has been the usual practice in this State. Martin & Walter v. Evans, 2 Rich. Eq. 368, and again in 1 Strob. Eq., 350; Brown v. McDonald, 1 Hill Eq. 297; McDonald v. May, 1 Rich. Eq., 91, and other cases cited in the argument for respondents. And we see no reason why, in the same case, the defendants, by proper pleadings and proofs, might not also have been made to account for any damages done to the property by their fault or misconduct while the same was in their possession; for while it is true that a claim for damages is not ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the Court of Equity, yet where they are incidental to the other relief sought of which the court does have jurisdiction, then a Court of Equity may also proceed to award damages as ancillary to such relief, either by a reference to the master or by ordering an issue of quantum damnificatus to be tried by a jury.

Bird v. Railroad Company, 8 Rich. Eq., 46 [64 Am. Dec. 739], and the authorities therein cited; Lamar v. Railroad Company, 10 S. C., 476.

Courts do not try cases by piecemeal, and a Court of Equity especially delights to do full and complete justice. Thus a claim which is necessarily incident to one that has already been adjudicated cannot be made the ground of a second action, even though it may not have been considered or passed upon in the former action. A party cannot, after having obtained judgment for the principal of a note or other interest-bearing demand, bring a second action to recover the interest, even though he may have wholly omitted to claim interest in the first action, because the interest, being a necessary incident to the principal, should have been demanded in the first action, and therefore cannot be made the ground of another action. So, too, in the old action of trespass to try titles, which by the act of 1791 was substituted for the former action of ejectment, in which the party could only recover the land, and was put to his second action for the recovery of rents and profits, a party having recovered the land could not maintain a second action for rents and profits, although the act simply permitted, but did not require, such a claim to be embraced in the first action. Lehie v. Sumter, 1 Tread, Con. R., 102; Coleman v. Parish, 1 McCord, 264; Lowrance v. Robertson, 10 S. C., 33.

It is contended, however, that in the former case the parties were different, and that the claim now sought to be set up was not a claim of the plaintiffs in that case against the defendants, but that it was a claim by one co-defendant against co-defendants. A Court of Equity takes but little note of how the parties are arrayed upon the record, whether as plaintiffs or defendants, but proceeds to determine the issues, whether they arise between plaintiff and defendant, or between co-defendants, and nothing is better settled than that a Court of Equity may render a decree in favor of one defendant against his co-defendant upon an issue growing out of the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and such defendants. Such a decree was rendered in Motte v. Schult (1 Hill Eq., 146 [26 Am. Dec. 194]), where the following language of Lord Redesdale, in Chamley v. Lord Dunsany (2 Sch. & Lef., 710), is quoted with approval: "But it seems strange to object to a decree *because it is between co-defendants, when it is grounded on evidence between the plaintiffs and the defendants. It is a jurisdiction long settled and acted on, and the constant practice of a Court of Equity; so much so that it is quite unnecessary to state any case in its support"—as well as the following words of Lord Eldon, in the same case: "When a case is made out between defendants by evidence, arising from pleadings and proofs between plaintiffs and defendants, a Court of Equity is entitled to make a decree between the defendants—further, my lords, a Court of Equity is bound to do so. The defendant chargeable has a right to insist that he shall not be made a defendant in another suit for the same matter that may then be decided between him and his co-defendant, and the co-defendant may insist that he shall not be obliged to institute another suit for a matter which may be then adjudicated between the defendants. And if a Court of Equity refused so to decree, it would be good cause of appeal by either defendant."

This strong and decisive language of Lord Eldon might have been applicable to the present case, if the issue now presented had been raised by the pleadings and proofs in the former case. The real object of the former case, and the one which was effected, was to set aside the sale and restore the property to its original owner, and it may be that the claim for damages now made might have been asserted by proper pleadings and proofs in that case, but this does not seem to have been done, and, therefore, the court was not called upon to decide, and did not decide, anything in reference to the present controversy. It is true that the Bath Company were, in the former suit, nominally arrayed on the side of defendants, yet they were really plaintiffs, desiring the same relief as the plaintiffs. In their answer they plainly allied themselves with the plaintiffs, and expressly asked for such relief "as the nature of the case may demand, as fully and completely as if this defendant had instituted the said proceeding."

But the "nature of the case," as made by the plaintiffs in the former suit, did not embrace the demand now made, and whether the Bath Company, by joining in the demand for the relief there asked as fully and completely as if they had instituted said proceeding, were bound so to shape their pleadings and proofs as to *embrace the demand now made, is a question about which there may well be difference of opinion; and, therefore, we prefer to rest our decision in this case upon the ground upon which the judgment below was placed by the Circuit Judge, sustained, as it is, by the reasons which he has given, which need not be repeated here. The relations of the parties being such as we have indicated above, it is clear that the Circuit Judge was right as to the degree of care which the defendants were bound to exercise; and as the findings below established the fact that such care was used, there is no ground upon which the defendants could be made liable for the injury, which the property sustained without fault on their part. So, too, as to the rents and profits; the Circuit Judge having found that none were received, or could have been received, by reason of causes for which the defendants were in no wise responsible, there is no ground upon which plaintiffs can claim anything on that account.

As to the second action, we agree with the Circuit Judge in the views which he has presented, so far as the claim for damages for the destruction of the building by fire is concerned. Assuming, as we are bound to do, under the findings of fact below, that the destruction of the house by fire was not due to any negligence on the part of the defendants, they cannot be made liable for any damages occasioned thereby.

It seems to us, however, that the claim for the insurance money received by the defendants stands upon a different footing. If, as we have seen, the defendants stood in the relation of quasi trustees towards the plaintiffs, then the money received by them for the insurance on the house of the plaintiffs belonged, ex aequo et bono, to the plaintiffs. This money may be regarded as a compensation, in part, at least, for the loss of property which has been adjudged to be the property of the plaintiffs, and, therefore, in equity and good conscience, it belongs to the plaintiffs. Any other view would, contrary to well established principle, enable the defendants to make profit for themselves out of the quasi trust property. It is, in effect, money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, and, as such, recoverable by the plaintiffs, subject, however, to a deduc-tion of all amounts *actually paid by the defendants, either by way of premiums or otherwise, in effecting or collecting such insurance.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court in the first action above considered be affirmed; and that the judgment of the Circuit Court in the second action be reversed, and that said second action be remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial.

LANGSTON v. SHANDS.

[1. Payment ⚭66.]

A joint and several bond, which matured January 1, 1860, and was credited with a payment January 5, 1860, was presented in September, 1883, under a call for the creditors of P deceased, one of the obligors. Held, that it must be presumed to have been paid, notwithstanding judgment against the other obligors and payments thereon after P's death; and notwithstanding an action commenced against P's estate in 1870, but dropped from the calendar by the Circuit Judge in 1877, and never restored.

A guardian's bond stands as security to the ward for the payment of whatever may be found due on a proper accounting, for full twenty years from the day that the ward may demand a settlement; but the right to an accounting may be barred in a shorter time, under the statute, where there has been a disavowal of the trust.

The acts of the guardian in this case did not amount to a disavowal of trust, and yet were not admissions binding upon the surety on his bond.

An infant ward having married a husband in March, 1863, the presumption of a payment by her guardian to her husband for her, then commenced to run, and was complete before September, 1883, when the claim was presented in this case for payment.

Before Hudson, J., Laurens, September, 1883.

In this case the Hon. T. B. Fraser, of the third Circuit, and the Hon. I. D. Witherspoon, of the sixth Circuit, sat in the places

devisees, and against the other *devisees and legatees of the plaintiff's testator. Creditors were subsequently called in, and the only questions brought to this court involved the rights of two of these creditors. The report of the master, and the brief decree of the Circuit Judge, together with other facts, are sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. Richard C. Watts, for appellants.

July 1, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. Some time in 1879 this action was commenced by the plaintiff in his own right and as administrator against the devisees, heirs, and representatives of Robert Pitts, deceased, having for "its object the marshalling of the assets and the full and final settlement" of his estate. It does not appear in the "Case" that at the commencement of the action any creditors were made parties to the action. Some time in 1881, an order was made referring the case to the master. On October 17, 1882, an order was made, by whom it does not appear, to call in creditors. The "Case" does not show that there was any publication of the usual notice to creditors, or that there was any order enjoining creditors from prosecuting their claims otherwise than under these proceedings. Amongst the claims presented for payment are two, which are the subjects of this appeal:

1. A bond of Isabella A. Henry, B. C. Beasley, and Robert Pitts, to B. R. Campbell, commissioner in equity, in the penal sum of $3,400, dated March 29, 1859, conditioned to pay $1,701 on January 1, 1860. On this bond there was paid January 5, 1860, $750. On this bond Robert Pitts was a surety.

At the May term, 1875, judgment was obtained on this bond against Beasley for the full amount of the debt, interest, and costs, and nothing has been recovered on it. At the February term, 1878, judgment was obtained against Isabella A. Henry for the full amount of debt, interest, and costs, and there was collected thereon the sum of $125, an amount insufficient to pay the costs which had accrued in that action. Robert Pitts had died in the spring of 1862. An action was commenced against his *executors, and the case stood on calendar No. 1 at the June term, 1870. The case remained on this calendar, No. 1, until the May term, 1877, when, as stated in the "Case," it was marked "struck off," or, as stated by the counsel for the appellants, "adjourned off." The executors of Robert Pitts died about this time, and no further proceedings were had in reference to this bond against the estate of Robert Pitts until the same was presented under the call for creditors in this case.

This claim was allowed by the master, and on exception his judgment was overruled by the Circuit Judge on the ground that the claim was barred by the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time. It does not appear that there was any order enjoining creditors made in this case at any time, and it is not necessary, therefore, to consider what would have been the effect of such an order in arresting the currency of the statute of limitations, or of the presumption of payment from lapse of time. The first order to call in creditors was made October 17, 1882. While there was, on April 16, 1883, an adjournment to communicate with a party in the west and for claims represented by Mr. Watts, one of the counsel for the appellants, there was no presentation of the claim, or any evidence in reference to it until September 4, 1883. It is to be regretted that the "Case" does not furnish more definite information as to the time and mode in which these claims were presented. We must, from such statements as have been made, conclude that this claim and the one to be hereafter considered, were first presented under the call in this case on September 4, 1883. This, therefore, is as to this claim the commencement of the action, which would arrest the presumption if not too late. See Warren v. Raymond, 17 S. C., 202, 205.

The presumption of payment running from the payment of $750, January 5, 1860, even if we allow nine months, during which action cannot be brought against personal representatives, was complete on October 5, 1880, unless it has been in some way arrested. A payment made by Isabella A. Henry, or B. C. Beasley, if made during the life of Robert Pitts, might have given a new starting point for the presumption of payment. A several judgment against them, or either of them, after his death, *can have no such effect, even if a part of the money is collected under the execution issued under the judgment. The judgment was as to each of them several and conclusive only as to the party sued. In any other action against other parties to the bond there must be proof de novo as to every issue involved. See Shubrick v. Adams, 20 S. C., 49.

It is earnestly urged, however, that the presumption of payment was arrested by the commencement of an action against the executors of Robert Pitts in 1870 on this bond, and (as we understand the argument) which was still pending when the claim was presented here, notwithstanding the entry of "struck off" or "adjourned off" in 1877 at the May term of the court. This latter expression, which was a very common one used in such cases by the Circuit Judge alluded to, really has no precedent for its use, and, as far as we are informed, never had any other effect than to induce the clerks to drop the case from the calendar, to be restored, without asking leave, whenever requested by any party to the action. The words had no meaning, and were so regarded by the profession. If the entry of "struck off" had been made, and this is the strongest way in which it can be put as against the claim, the case could have been restored to the calendar on motion made within a reasonable time. Nearly seven years had elapsed since this entry was made on calendar No. 1, before any further steps were taken to submit this claim to the court. The case thus stricken from the calendar, or "adjourned off," cannot certainly have such dormant life as to justify a revival of it now. In Kennedy v. Smith, 2 Bay, 414, it is said: "That all the cases quoted from 3 Blackstone's Commentaries are strong in point, and prove that leaving a chasm in the proceeding, without regular continuance from time to time, will amount to a discontinuance. But the lapse of seven years is so great laches on the part of the plaintiff in this action that nothing on her part can cure it."

In this case we see nothing to excuse the laches, and there was nothing in the way in which suit was brought on this bond and allowed to drop to arrest the presumption of payment. This court therefore holds that there has been as to this bond a presumption of payment arising from lapse of time having a force *equal to the bar of the statute of limitations. Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618]; Shubrick v. Adams, 20 S. C., 49.

2. The other claim is on a bond signed by Robert Pitts as surety for John Langston as guardian of Mary E. Langston, now Mary E. Donnon, wife of James M. Donnon. The bond bears date June 26, 1846. Mary E. was married March 3, 1863, and attained her majority June 30, 1863. As the law then stood, the marital rights attached to the fund in the hands of the guardian, and the change as to the rights of married women by the constitution of 1868 did not divest them. In the absence of any evidence on the subject, we must assume that James M. Donnon was then of age, and he could have received the money from the guardian and given a valid receipt for the same without joining his wife in the receipt. The statute of limitations would then have commenced to run, and the presumption of payment from lapse of time, for the same reason, from the marriage. Glover v. Lott, 1 Strob. Eq., 79; Coleman v. Davis, 2 Strob. Eq., 341.

The bond of a guardian is conditioned that the guardian shall faithfully account for and pay over whatever may come into his hands as guardian. To secure the performance of this duty the bond runs for full twenty years from the time at which the ward attains majority, or, as in this case, from the time when by her marriage there was a person sui juris and competent as her husband to receive and receipt for the fund. When, however, after this period the guardian does an act which purports to be a termination of his trust, he thereby claims to have discharged this duty. From such an act, therefore, the statute of limitations commences to run and becomes a bar to any further accounting. The statute, however, does not bar any claim to the amount admitted to be due on such accounting. It only shuts out any claim to a further accounting, but the bond continues to run for the security of the ward that the sum so admitted to be due shall be paid for the full period of twenty years from the date of such admission.

In the case now under consideration there is a fund in the hands either of the personal representatives of the guardian, John Langston, or of the Probate Court, as a part of his estate *admitted to be applicable to this claim. Neither is the death of the guardian, John Langston, in 1862, nor the recovery of a judgment against his personal representatives in 1875, nor the accounting in the Probate Court in 1879, such a throwing off of the trust as will give currency to the statute of limitations. Neither can any of these things amount to such an admission of the claim as to give as against the surety a new starting-point for the commencement of the presumption of payment from lapse of time, as might have been the effect of an admission by the guardian in his life-time of an amount due and unpaid. Shubrick v. Adams, supra. The presumption of payment commenced to run on the marriage of Mary E., March 3, 1863, and this as well as the claim above considered was first presented September 4, 1883, twenty years and six months after the presumption commenced to run.

It is not necessary here to consider the effect of an injunction against creditors, for in this, as well as in the above considered case, there seems to have been none. Neither is it necessary to inquire whether nine months are to be added to the twenty years in cases of presumption as in cases of the statute of limitations, for which Gray v. Givens (2 Hill Eq. 511) seems to be an authority; for Robert Pitts had died in the spring of 1862, and the nine months had more than expired before the presumption commenced to run, or the marriage March 3, 1863. This claim therefore, of Mary E. Donnion, or rather of James M. Donnion and Mary E., his wife, has also been barred by lapse of time.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, May, 1884.

In this case the Hon. I. D. Witherspoon, of the sixth Circuit, sat in the place of the Chief Justice, who had been of counsel in the cause.

*To the full statement of the case, as made by the Circuit Judge, it will be necessary to add only that the renunciation of dower on the mortgage to Fowler was as follows: "State of South Carolina, Spartanburg County. I, J. W. Stribling, do hereby certify unto all whom it may concern, that Mrs. Susan B. Genobles, the wife of the above named John A. Genobles, did this day appear before me, and upon being privately," &c. (following the usual form). Its conclusion was as follows: "Given under my hand and seal this 22d day of November, A. D. 1878. (Signed) John W. Stribling, [L. S.] (Signed) Susan B. Genobles, [L. S.]"

The Circuit decree was as follows:

The cause came up on a report of a special referee and exceptions thereto. On October 26, 1874, John Genobles executed a deed by which he conveyed to the plaintiffs, Edwin Belton Genobles and others, his children by a former marriage, a tract of land described in the complaint, and the subject of litigation in this case. He reserved in this deed a life estate in himself, and at his death the said land was to be sold and the proceeds divided equally amongst his said children, the children of any one of them then dead to take the share of their parents. In this deed no provision was made for his wife Susan B. Genobles, one of the defendants in this case. To Franklin G. Genobles, another son, and one of the defendants, he gave in said deed one dollar.

On May 31, 1877, the said John Genobles filed a complaint against all of his said children, except Franklin G. Genobles, the purpose of which was to set aside said deed on account of undue influence exercised over him by his said children while he was under incapacity from age, infirmity, and distress of mind, from some great family affliction. To this complaint no answers were filed by any of the defendants, except by Henry C. Genobles, then a minor, near eighteen years of age, by his guardian ad litem, as will be hereinafter more fully stated. There is nothing to show that the adult children made any opposition to the wishes of their father, John Genobles, while the testimony taken in the case shows that several of them were willing that their father should have the relief demanded in the complaint; and all of them knew that the complaint had been filed. The cause *was placed on calendar 6, and when it came up for a hearing Judge Mackey, who was then holding the regular term of the court, made a decretal order, in which it was held that said deed "is void as against the plaintiff (John Genobles), and has no legal force and effect," and "that the said deed be delivered up for cancellation by the clerk of this court, and that the same be cancelled and discharged of record, and that the defendants be perpetually enjoined and restrained from exercising any rights and privileges under said conveyance." This decretal order bears date October 20, 1877, and was marked on the back of it, "Filed October 20, 1877," by the clerk of the court.

After these proceedings were had John Genobles executed a mortgage of this land to one Fowler to secure the payment of $300, money borrowed. On this mortgage Susan B. Genobles, then the wife of John Genobles, duly renounced her dower. John Genobles having failed to pay this debt, Fowler, under a power reserved in the mortgage, and after due notice, sold the land to Dr. Cleveland for $801. This sale was made in the lifetime of John Genobles, and after paying the mortgage debt and some small judgments against him, the surplus was turned over to him. The title was made to Dr. Cleveland, and he conveyed the land to the defendant, J. Walter West.

W. L. Genobles, one of the children, purchased six acres of this land from his father, John Genobles, which, by several intermediate conveyances, was also transferred to the defendant, West. His title to this six acres, I understand, is not disputed in this case. John Genobles died January 8, 1883.

Now, the purpose of the present action is to have this decretal order of Judge Mackey "reversed and adjudged null and void," and the parties "enjoined from enrolling the same," and to have the possession of the said land or partition thereof and general relief. Susan B. Genobles, the widow, is a defendant, and claims dower in the land. Franklin G. Genobles though claiming more in his answer, put in by a guardian ad litem, insists in the argument only on the payment of one dollar and interest and costs. The referee has dismissed the complaint as to Rena Genobles, another minor, who is not in any way mentioned in the deed of John Genobles.

John Robert Genobles having died *since the commencement of the suit, by an order of the referee his widow and children have been substituted in his place in the action, guardians ad litem having been duly appointed by the judge of probate for such of them as are minors.

The case of the plaintiffs in this action is based on the theory that the proceeding above referred to, which terminated in the decretal order of Judge Mackey of October 20, 1877, is absolutely void, or that it is voidable, and should be set aside by the court in this action, and the plaintiffs remanded to their rights under the deed of John Genobles of October 26, 1874. The objections on which plaintiffs rely, as I understand them, are as follows:

1. That the summons in that case was not signed and sealed by the clerk of the court.

2. That the summons was not served personally on the defendants in that action, or by delivery to such other person as was then required by law.

3. That the decretal order of Judge Mackey was never enrolled or recorded.

4. That the minor, Henry C. Genobles, was not served personally with the summons; that there was no personal service on him of the notice of application for the appointment of guardian ad litem; and that the notice which was left at his residence was for an application to Judge Northrop, and not to Judge Mackey, by whom the order appointing the guardian ad litem was made.

5. That neither the petition for nor order appointing the guardian ad litem were filed, nor was his answer filed or served on plaintiffs' counsel in that cause.

6. That the order of Judge Mackey was not endorsed on the complaint.

7. George T. Genobles also claims that he was never made a party to that action, one J. T. Genobles having been named in the complaint, and not George T. or G. T. Genobles.

8. None of the defendants in that action answered, except the minor, Henry C. Genobles, in the manner above stated, and it does not appear that the decretal order of Judge Mackey was founded on any report of a referee as to facts, or any testimony taken in open court.

*I will state my conclusion on these questions as fully as the time at my disposal will allow:

1. Under the old practice a writ in the common pleas or a subpoena ad respondendum in equity, by which an action was commenced, was a process of the court to compel the attendance of the defendant in order that his person as well as his property might be held to answer the judgment in the common pleas or to secure his answer under oath to the allegations of the bill. It was important, therefore, to have the authority conferred by signature of the clerk under seal of the court to such process. The summons now, under the code, is merely a notice that an action has been commenced, to apprise the defendant of the nature and amount of the claims against him, and to compel his attendance on pain of losing all right to dispute the claims or prevent their enforcement.

1 Wait Pr., 468, § 1. I have found nowhere in the acts, or in the books of practice or of forms, any reference to a seal or the signature of the clerk of the court. While these forms in Abbott indicate even the revenue stamp as necessary, the seal and signature of the clerk are conspicuously absent, and I see no use for them.

2. On examining the record in that case I find that the affidavit of service shows, prima facie at least, personal service of the summons on all the defendants, and Judge Mackey states in his order that the summons had been personally served on all the defendants. If it be true, as alleged by some of the plaintiffs here, that in fact they were not personally served with the summons in that case, it seems to me that this is not the proper way to make the question. It seems to me that under the old practice a bill in equity, to which this action is similar, to set aside a judgment at law, or a decree in equity, would not have been a proper proceeding, if the ground of relief was mere irregularities in the service of process or in the course of proceeding in the cause. The proper mode to correct errors of this kind is, to make a motion in the cause itself, supported by affidavits, and made with due promptness. In Wagner v. Pegues (10 S. C., 261), it is said "that the powers of equity cannot be invoked to restrain an execution on the ground of irregularity." I am under the impression that there is another case in which it is held by the *present Supreme Court that any errors or irregularities in a cause must have their remedy in the cause itself, and on motion, and not in another action. I have not been able to find the case, but the principle seems to be a good one as it is the best and only way to end litigation. It is true that great wrong may be done sometimes, but this is incident to all human tribunals.

3. A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action. While the written instrument purporting to be the judgment in a cause remains in the possession of the judge who is to pronounce it, it is of no effect, and like a deed not delivered. The moment, however, it is filed by the clerk of the court it becomes the judgment of the court and fixes the rights of the parties. The recording of the judgment or order is only to give notice and secure the safety of the record of the solemn acts of the courts. This seems to be the principle on which the case of Clark v. Melton (19 S. C., 498) is founded. The failure of the clerk to cancel this deed cannot restore it to validity.

4 and 5. On examining the record in that cause, I think that the minor, Henry C. Genobles, was personally and properly served with the summons. The notice of the application for the appointment of a guardian ad litem was not, as appears on the paper itself, served personally as the law required. The order for the appointment of the guardian ad litem was not filed; the answer was not put in or served on the attorneys for the plaintiff; and the consent of the minor amounted to nothing, as he could not bind himself to anything. The record itself shows that as to this minor, the court never had any jurisdiction, and as to him the judgment is void. Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C., 439.

6. When courts of limited jurisdiction are created by and derive their power entirely from the legislature, it may be that they are confined in the exercise of this jurisdiction to the precise mode prescribed. In reference, however, to courts of general jurisdiction, I think that the rule is properly laid down in a note on p. 226 of Potter's Dwarrris on Statutes and Constitution, as follows: "When a statute directs certain proceedings, to be done in a certain way, or at a certain time, and the form or period does not appear essential to the judicial mind, the law *will be regarded as directory." When provision of the statute relates to the essence, it is mandatory; when to the form or manner, it is directory. Ib., note a, p. 224. I hold, therefore, that the requirement to endorse the judgment on the complaint in cases on calendar 6, now calendar 3, is directory, and a failure to do so does not invalidate the judgment when otherwise regular.

7. In that complaint one of the children was called J. T. Genobles. There was no J. T. Genobles, but one George T. Genobles, sometimes called G. T. Genobles. It seems that the summons was served on this George T. Genobles, who is a party plaintiff in the action now before the court. If George T. Genobles had appeared and answered and taken no exception to the misnomer, it would now be too late to object to it. He did not appear in the case at all, and I do not see how he can in any way be held bound by a proceeding in which he was not named, or called by a name by which it does not appear that he is known; they are different names and there is no better reason for holding George T. bound by a judgment against J. T., than for holding Mr. Smith bound by a judgment against Mr. Jones.

8. If on this hearing I can reverse an order of Judge Mackey, because he took no testimony and had no evidence before him on which he based the findings of fact on which the order rests, I do not see where is the limit at which one judge is to stop his inquiry into the evidence on which another rested. If I could reverse his judgment or order for a total failure of evidence, I could do it on the same principle for a total failure on any one material point, and I do not see why it could not be done for mere insufficiency. I think there should have been testimony in the case, and there is no positive statement that there was not, and I do not think that I am at liberty to infer that there was no testimony in the case. If there was, however, a judgment without any testimony, I do not see how I am to correct it.

It appears from the testimony that all the children of John Genobles knew of these proceedings now assailed and took no steps of any kind to have them set aside or to prevent strangers from dealing with their father as to this land, as if it were his property. I do not see anything, however, which comes up to *my view of an estoppel in their conduct. A man who has a claim on property is not bound to hunt up persons dealing with it, and give notice of his claim. These claims under this deed, if they had any, did not accrue until after the defendant West had bought and gone into possession of the land. There is nothing to show that they had any positive knowledge of the dealings of Cleveland or West until after they had paid their money for the land, and they certainly gave no consent otherwise than they are bound by the judgment or order of Judge Mackey. The entry made by the clerk during the reference under this complaint cannot affect the rights of the parties. They stand as they were at the commencement of this action.

As to the right of dower in the widow, I do not think it makes any difference whether the order of Judge Mackey is valid or invalid. She had an inchoate right to dower in the land before the deed of 1874, and she released her dower on the mortgage to Fowler. Under a power in this mortgage, Fowler sold the land to Cleveland, and made him title. This was in the life-time of her husband, John Genobles. I take this to be the true doctrine in such cases: "Where there is a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises upon a mortgage valid against the wife, the result is entirely to divest her of all claim upon the land, and compel her to look to the surplus proceeds of sale, if any remains after satisfying the mortgage debt." 1 Scrib. Dower, 491, § 16. The only cases in this State where there is an allowance out of the surplus, are where the sale has been made after the death of the husband. There are some New York cases where a part of the surplus has been held by the court to meet the wife's claim of dower, if she survives. Ibid., 501-504, §§ 26-30. I do not think the widow is entitled to dower in this land.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the complaint be dismissed as to all the parties plaintiff and defendant, except Henry C. Genobles, George T. Genobles, Franklin G. Genobles, and J. Walter West: and that the parties as to whom the complaint is hereby dismissed do each pay their own costs. It is ordered, that Franklin G. Genobles be paid out of the land one dollar and interest from the death of John Genobles. It is further ordered and adjudged, that a writ of partition do issue to five *persons appointed, two by the plaintiffs, H. C. and G. T. Genobles; two by the defendant West, and one by the clerk, commanding them to divide the said land, so as to set off one-ninth to Henry C. Genobles; one-ninth to George T. Genobles, and the remainder to J. Walter West; and if the land cannot be divided fairly, that they then make their return according to the requirements of said writ. It is further ordered, that the costs of all the parties as to whom this complaint is not dismissed be paid out of the land; and in estimating the costs to be paid out of the land, only so much shall be charged thereon in favor of Henry C. and George T. Genobles, of the costs heretofore accrued as they two were to the whole number of shares claimed by plaintiffs in the land, to wit, two-ninths thereof.

Ordered, that any parties as to whom this complaint is not dismissed have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for any necessary or proper orders in the cause, and that the report of the referee be modified as above stated.

I. Because his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in holding that H. C. Genobles did not have notice of the application for appointment of a guardian ad litem in the case of John Genobles v. John W. Genobles et al.

II. Because his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in holding that the order for the appointment of the guardian ad litem in said cause was never filed, and the answer of such guardian ad litem was never put in or served on the attorneys of plaintiffs.

III. Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the court never had jurisdiction over said H. C. Genobles in said cause, and that the judgment therein as to him was void.

IV. Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding that though the summons and complaint in said cause of John Genobles v. John W. Genobles et al. was personally served on G. T. Genobles, he was not barred by the judgment therein, because in said summons and complaint he was incorrectly called J. T. Genobles.

V. Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the plaintiffs, H. C. Genobles and

G. T. Genobles, were entitled to an *interest in the land in dispute, and in ordering a writ to issue to partition the same.

VI. Because the Circuit Judge erred in not holding that all the plaintiffs are estopped by their conduct, and by the record of the case of John Genobles v. John W. Genobles et al., from asking any part of the relief demanded in the complaint, and in not dismissing the complaint as to all of said plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs, except Henry C. Genobles and George T. Genobles, appealed on the ground that his honor erred:

I. In not holding that the seal of court and the signature of the clerk are necessary in issuing of the summons which the plaintiffs seek to set aside.

II. In holding that relief should be refused to these plaintiffs, because they came in by bill instead of by motion to set aside the decree complained of.

III. In not holding that the decree of Judge Mackey was null and void.

IV. In not at least holding that the decree of Judge Mackey was voidable, and, under the facts herein, should be adjudged null and void.

V. In not distinctly finding and holding that Judge Mackey's decree was made without the taking of any testimony whatever.

VI. In not sustaining the exceptions to the referee's report.

VII. In not finding the facts as alleged in the complaint of plaintiffs.

VIII. In not making a decree granting the relief prayed for in the complaint of the plaintiffs.

IX. In finding that any deed was ever made by John Genobles to William L. Genobles for six acres of the aforesaid real estate.

X. Because at the least, this plaintiff should have had a decree and interest in the six acres of land mentioned in the decree of the Circuit Judge.

XI. In finding that the title of the aforesaid six acres is not disputed in this case.

The defendant, Susan B. Genobles, appealed on the ground that his honor erred:

*I. In not sustaining this defendant's exceptions to the report of the referee.

II. In not allowing this defendant dower in the whole of the premises in dispute.

III. In not allowing this defendant dower in at least the surplus of said land over and above what was sufficient to pay the mortgage debt due to W. D. Fowler.

IV. In not allowing this defendant dower in at least the six acres of the said land conveyed by John Genobles to F. J. Genobles.

V. In not holding that there was no proof that the alleged renunciation of dower was made before any person authorized by law to take such renunciation.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for plaintiffs.

Mr. S. T. McCravy, for the widow.

Mr. Justice WITHERSPOON. A statement of the case is necessary to a proper understanding of the issues involved in this appeal. [The facts are all stated in the Circuit decree.]

We will first consider plaintiffs' second exception, alleging that the Circuit Judge erred in refusing plaintiffs relief "because they came in by bill instead of by motion to set aside the decree complained of." The judgment sought to be set aside by plaintiffs can only be impeached directly and not collaterally. The main purpose of this action is to have the former judgment adjudged null and void, upon the ground that plaintiffs were not personally served, as well as on account of alleged fatal irregularities and omissions in said action. All of the defendants in the former action are represented as plaintiffs in this action. It is true that this action seeks relief beyond the setting aside of the former action, but several causes of action can be united, and no objection has been urged as to improper uniting of causes of action in this *case. We think that the former judgment is directly attacked in this action, and plaintiffs should have been permitted to impeach the same. But this view cannot avail plaintiffs who make this exception, as we are satisfied that in the former action the court did acquire jurisdiction over such plaintiffs by personal service of summons.

In this connection we will next consider the third, fourth, and fifth exceptions of the defendant, J. Walter West, which allege that the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the court never acquired jurisdiction over the persons of the plaintiffs, G. T. Genobles and Henry C. Genobles, in the former action. Henry C. Genobles was a minor when the former suit was instituted. The Circuit Judge concludes from an examination of the record that he was personally served with the summons; but as the application for the appointment of the guardian ad litem does not itself show that it was personally served, and as the order appointing the guardian ad litem does not show that it was filed, and as the guardian's answer does not show that it was served on plaintiffs' attorney, the Circuit Judge concludes that the record shows that as to the minor, Henry C. Genobles, the court never had jurisdiction in the former case—referring to Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C., 439. The sheriff's writ book, introduced without objection, shows that Henry C. Genobles was not personally served. The officer who made the proof of service upon the summons testifies before the referee that he remembers that Henry C. Genobles was not personally served in the former action. Henry C. Genobles also testifies before the referee that he was not personally served in said action. We think this testimony is sufficient to overcome the presumption of service derived from the record. As a minor, Henry C. Genobles could not be bound by his consent, and the court could only acquire jurisdiction over him by personal service of the summons. We conclude that the court never acquired jurisdiction over the person of Henry C. Genobles, and that he is not bound by the judgment in the former case. The exception as to Henry C. Genobles must be overruled.

In this view it will not be necessary to consider the effect of the irregularities referred to by the Circuit Judge. It does not, however, occur to us that such irregularities can properly enter into the question of jurisdiction, as they arose subsequent to the service of the summons.

The Circuit Judge held that as the plaintiff, G. T. Genobles, was incorrectly called J. T. Genobles in the summons, and as he never appeared or answered, he is not bound by the former judgment. The referee and Circuit Judge both conclude that the plaintiff, G. T. Genobles, was personally served in the former action, although under the name of J. T. Genobles. The sheriff's writ book, introduced without objection, shows that G. T. Genobles was personally served in the former action. Under the decision of Waldrop v. Leonard (22 S. C., 118), the plaintiff, G. T. Genobles, being then under no disability, must be held bound by the former judgment. The fourth and fifth exceptions of the defendant, J. Walter West, must be sustained so far as they relate to the interest of the plaintiff, G. T. Genobles, in the land, and the Circuit decree must be modified to that extent.

We agree with the Circuit Judge that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply in this case, as urged by defendant West. This disposes of the exceptions of the defendant, J. Walter West.

Having concluded that the court acquired jurisdiction over the persons of all of the plaintiffs in the former action, except Henry C. Genobles, we will recur to plaintiffs' other exceptions involving alleged omissions and errors in the former proceeding after the service of the summons. As already observed, after jurisdiction has been acquired by such service, such irregularities do not render a judgment void.

Plaintiffs' fourth exception alleges that the Circuit Judge erred "in not holding that the decree of Judge Mackey was voidable, and under the facts herein should be adjudged null and void." One of the facts referred to in this exception is that the cause was on calendar 6, and that the decree was not endorsed upon the complaint. The act of March 8, 1875, provides that "no execution shall be signed on judgments obtained by default in any other manner." This act does not provide that an order or judgment will be void unless entered upon the complaint. But we concur with the Circuit Judge, that as the statute relates to form or manner, it is directory, and this failure would not invalidate a judgment otherwise regular.

*Another circumstance referred to by plaintiff under this exception is that it does not appear that the final order was based upon a reference, or upon testimony taken as to the facts set forth in the complaint. It is to be presumed that the final order was based upon testimony as to the facts alleged in the complaint until the contrary appears. There is no sufficient evidence to show that the order was passed without testimony as to the facts. We are not at liberty to infer that such was the case. But even if it appeared that the former judgment was rendered without testimony, we think the Circuit Judge properly held that he could not correct it.

Plaintiffs in their exceptions also allege that the Circuit Judge erred in not holding that the signature of the clerk and seal of the court were necessary in issuing the summons in the former action. The summons, under the code, does not issue from the court, but is merely a notice by the plaintiff to the defendant, that an action has been commenced, in which the defendant can appear or not, as he thinks proper. It is not necessary that the summons should be signed and sealed by the clerk of the court.

The other omissions and irregularities referred to in plaintiffs' other exceptions all occurred after all the plaintiffs, except Henry C. Genobles, had been served with the summons in the former action, and we agree with the Circuit Judge that they cannot affect the validity of the final order or judgment in said action.

Plaintiffs' third, fourth, sixth, seventh, and eighth exceptions raise no specific objection to the Circuit decree, and cannot be considered. Plaintiffs' ninth, tenth, and eleventh exceptions cannot be sustained, as nothing was adjudicated by the Circuit decree, as to the six acres of land therein referred to.

The second and third exceptions of the defendant, Susan B. Genobles, the widow, are based upon the ground of error in the Circuit Judge in refusing to allow her claim of dower in the whole land, or at least in the surplus after paying the mortgage debt. Susan B. Genobles renounced her dower according to law upon the mortgage executed by her husband, John Genobles, to W. D. Fowler. This renunciation must be controlled by the terms of the mortgage on which it is made, to which it has reference, and of which it is a part. By recurring to the statement of facts herein it will be observed that the mortgage gave Fowler, the mortgagee, the power to foreclose by a public sale, and to pay from proceeds the mortgage debt and hold surplus subject to rights of other incumbrances, if any, and if none, then to pay same to the mortgagor. It is not contended that Fowler, the mortgagee, abused the trust reposed in him, or in any way failed properly to execute the power conferred upon him. The sale of the mortgaged land was made in the life-time of the mortgagor (the husband), and the surplus, after paying the mortgage debt and two small judgments (incumbrances), was turned over to the mortgagor as provided by the terms of the mortgage. Susan B. Genobles having voluntarily made herself a party to the mortgage by her renunciation, and having thereby disposed of the surplus proceeds of sale, we do not think there was error in refusing her claim of dower.

The fourth exception of Susan B. Genobles alleges that the Circuit Judge erred in refusing to allow her dower in the six acres of land conveyed by John Genobles to J. F. Genobles. The pleadings show that the only issue raised by this defendant was as to her claim of dower in the mortgaged land, upon which dower was renounced. It is true, that a deed for this six acres was introduced before the referee, and that the six acres are in the possession of the defendant West. But the defendant West does not hold or claim the six acres under the Fowler mortgage, but by a title distinct from the mortgage. The pleadings were not amended, nor were they considered as amended by the referee or Circuit Judge so as to extend defendant's claim of dower to embrace the six acres. This exception does not seem to have been taken to the referee's report, or considered by the Circuit Judge. The defendant, Susan B. Genobles', fourth exception must be overruled, but without prejudice to her right to have the pleadings amended in the Circuit Court so as to embrace the six acres, if so advised, before the case is finally disposed of in the Circuit Court.

The fifth exception of the defendant, Susan B. Genobles, must be overruled, as there is sufficient evidence that her renunciation of dower was taken before a trial justice.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit *Court, except as herein modified as to the plaintiff, G. T. Genobles, be affirmed.¹

STATE v. HAINES.

[1. Criminal Law ⇨1028.]

A point not ruled upon in the court below is not properly before this court for review.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2619, 2620; Dec. Dig. § 1028.]

[2. False Pretences ⇨30.]

An indictment for obtaining goods under false pretences should charge that the defendant made the false pretences, at the time knowing them to be false; except, it may be, in cases where the very nature of the misrepresentation implies that the party who made it must have known it to be false.

A false pretence is such a fraudulent representation of an existing or past fact, by one who knows it not to be true, as is adapted to induce the person to whom it is made to part with something of value. A mere promise to do something in the future, as, for example, to pay for goods at a future time, even if false, is not such a pretence as would come within the terms of the statute.

[4. False Pretences ⇨7.]

A person obtaining advances from a factor under a statement that he is then planting cotton, and under a promise to ship his cotton, when made, to such factor, cannot be convicted of obtaining goods under false pretences, unless he was not at that time planting cotton.

[5. Indictment and Information, ⇨125.]

An indictment that charges defendant with obtaining goods from the prosecutor under the false pretence that he was then engaged in planting cotton, and would ship his cotton when made to the prosecutor, alleges only one false pretence.

[Cited in Dargan v. West, 27 S. C. 157, 3 S. E. 68, to the point that if representations are false, and known to be so by persons making them, intent to deceive would be inferred.]

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, February, 1885.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Lee & Bowen, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

obtained from the prosecutor certain *goods "by certain false pretences and representations, that is to say, by falsely pretending and representing unto the said Theodore G. Snowden that he, the said R. Willis Haines, was, at that time, engaged in planting cotton, and for such advances would consign his crop to Theodore G. Snowden, and would in the autumn following send and ship to the said Theodore G. Snowden the cotton crop which he falsely pretended to be cultivating; whereas, in truth and in fact, the said R. Willis Haines was not then and there engaged in planting cotton, and had no cotton crop during the said year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, with intent to cheat and defraud the said Theodore G. Snowden against the form of the statute," &c.

The evidence on the part of the prosecution tended to show that in April, 1882, the defendant bought from the prosecutor corn to the amount of $54.86, on which he paid $25 in cash, and obtained credit for the balance until the fall, under the representation that he was planting cotton, and would send to the prosecutor his crop. There was also some evidence adduced on the part of the prosecution for the purpose of showing that the defendant planted no cotton during that year, that none was sent to the prosecutor, and that the balance due on the account had never been paid. The defendant adduced evidence tending to show that he did plant cotton in 1882, that he had paid the balance of the account with the exception of some few cents, and that the reason why he did not send his cotton to the prosecutor as he had promised to do was that he had paid very nearly all the balance due him, and as he had heard that the prosecutor was in a precarious condition, financially, he was afraid to send him his cotton, as he had agreed and intended to do.

The defendant requested the Circuit Judge to charge the jury, "That in order to convict, the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant did not plant any cotton during the year 1882; and that the State having alleged that the defendant did not plant cotton during the year 1882, should prove the same to the satisfaction of the jury, or the defendant should be acquitted." The solicitor requested that the jury should be instructed as follows: "There may be one or more false pretences charged in an indictment, and the proof of either is sufficient. In

"this case it is submitted that two pretences are alleged." The jury were charged as follows: "The solicitor has correctly stated the legal points by which you are to be governed in this case. * * * Either there has been false swearing on the part of Mr. Snowden, or there has been false swearing on the part of the defendant. The defendant swears positively that he paid the $28, and that he still owes him some cents. Mr. Snowden very positively denies that, and says that the defendant did no such thing. * * * That is the whole case, and as you determine the falsity or truth of the evidence, so will be your verdict. The defendant says that the reason he did not send the cotton to Mr. Snowden was because he had paid him up the $28. But if he promised to send him the cotton, and has not paid him, as stated by Mr. Snowden, then he has deceived him. I cannot undertake to intimate or decide where the truth lies. That is your province, and as you decide that question, so will be your verdict."

The defendant having been convicted, appeals upon the following grounds: "I. Because the indictment was fatally defective in not alleging that the defendant knew, at the time he obtained the goods, that the statement upon which he obtained them was false. II. Because defendant's alleged agreement to ship and consign his cotton to T. G. Snowden, the prosecuting witness, in the autumn of 1882, was a promise and not a pretence, and, therefore, not indictable, though not kept, or meant to be kept, at the time it was made, and his honor erred in not so holding. III. Because the false pretence, as alleged in the indictment, was the avowal of the defendant, that he was planting cotton near Oakley, in the County of Berkeley, during that year (1882), which avowal the indictment alleged to have been false, and further alleged that in truth and in fact said defendant was not planting, and did not plant any cotton during the year 1882; all of which averments in the indictment were material, and should have been sustained by proof, and his honor erred in not so holding. IV. Because his honor's charge to the jury, that the indictment alleged two false pretences, was incorrect and misleading."

The question raised by the first ground of appeal is not properly before us, inasmuch as there does not appear to have been any ruling by the court below upon that point.

and there is, *therefore, nothing for us to review. The Circuit Judge was not asked to decide, and did not decide, anything as to the sufficiency of the indictment. We may say, however, for the purpose of avoiding any misconception, that inasmuch as the gist of the offence charged in this indictment is the obtaining the goods of another by false pretences, with the intent to deceive, it would be better pleading to charge that the defendant made the false pretences, knowing at the time that they were false. For it may well be that a person may, most innocently and with perfect good faith, make representations which prove to be false in fact, in which case there would be an absence of any criminal intent; but if the representations are not only false, but known to be so by the person who makes them, then the intent to deceive would necessarily be inferred. It may be that there are cases, and perhaps this is one, in which the very nature of the representation is such as to imply that if false it must necessarily be known to the party who makes it. If it was not true, in point of fact, that the defendant planted cotton in 1882, it would seem that this must necessarily have been known to the defendant at the time he made such representation, and, therefore, even if the question had been properly made in this case, we are not prepared to say that it would have availed the defendant.

The second and third grounds of appeal may be considered together. The best definition of the offence charged in this indictment is that given by Bishop (2 Crim. Law, § 415) in the following words: "A false pretence is such a fraudulent representation of an existing or past fact by one who knows it not to be true, as is adapted to induce the person to whom it is made to part with something of value." It follows from this that a mere promise to do something in the future, as for example, to pay for goods at a future time, even if false, is not such a pretence as would come within the terms of the statute. 2 Bish. Cr. L., §§ 419, 420. It is true, that the combination of a false promise with the false representation of an existing or past fact will not take the case out of the statute, but it is not the false promise which constitutes the offence, but the false representation with which the promise may be connected. Hence, unless there is a false representation, upon which the false promise is based, there *can be no conviction, for the false promise alone involves no criminal consequences. As is said in 2 Bish. Cr. L., § 424, "though there is a promise connected with the pretence of an existing fact, this promise does not take the case out of the statute. It is, as to the criminal consequences, a mere nullity. If there is a sufficient pretence of a false existing or past fact, the consequence attached to it by law is not overthrown by the promise; if there is not a sufficient pretence of this sort, the promise does not supply the defect." It may be that the promise constitutes the principal motive of the prosecutor to part with his goods, but unless such promise is connected with or based upon a false representation of an existing or past fact, the case does not fall within the statute. These principles are, we think, fully sustained by the cases cited by the distinguished author from whom we have quoted, and are not in conflict with the authorities relied upon by the solicitor.

Looking at this case in the light of these principles, we think it clear that the Circuit Judge erred in refusing to charge the jury that in order to convict the defendant they must be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant did not plant any cotton during the year 1882. That was the only false representation of an existing or past fact alleged in the indictment, and until that was proved the defendant could not be convicted, even though it should have been proved to a demonstration that the defendant had failed to keep his promise to send his cotton to the prosecutor. Indeed, the Circuit Judge, in his charge to the jury, made the case turn entirely upon the question whether the balance due the prosecutor by the defendant had been paid, wholly ignoring the fundamental inquiry whether the goods had been obtained by a false representation of an existing or past fact, coupled with a promise to pay for them by sending the cotton in the fall.

We think, also, that the Circuit Judge, in adopting the suggestion of the solicitor, that there were two false pretences charged in the indictment, may well have misled the jury into the belief that it mattered not whether the allegation that the defendant planted no cotton in the year 1882, was sustained by the evidence, and that if the defendant failed to pay as he had *promised, he still might be convicted. There was in fact but one false pretence alleged in the indictment, that the defendant was engaged in planting cotton, though such pretence was connected with, and formed the basis of, the promise alleged to ship the cotton to the prosecutor in the fall. While, therefore, it might be true, as a general proposition, that several false pretences may be alleged in one indictment, and the proof of any one of them will be sufficient, yet this does not apply to the present case and its statement to the jury under the testimony in the case was well calculated to mislead them. The testimony as to the material inquiry in the case, viz., whether the defendant's representation that he was planting cotton was true or false, was not only conflicting, but the testimony on the part of the State was only negative, while that from several witnesses on the part of the defence was of the most positive character. The jury might, under the instructions given them, very well have concluded that even if the version given by the witnesses for the defence was true, yet if the defendant had failed to keep his promise, he might be convicted.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

STATE ex rel. STEPHENS v. COMMISSIONERS OF PILOTAGE OF BEAUFORT.

[1. Mandamus ⇨73.]

Mandamus is an appropriate remedy to compel a board of pilotage commissioners to reverse their action in suspending a pilot from service for alleged misconduct. Mr. Justice McIver, not concurring.

For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 115, 135, 144-149; Dec. Dig. ⇨73.]

Facts found by commissioners of pilotage in the investigation of the conduct of a pilot in service within the territorial limits of their jurisdiction, cannot be reviewed in proceedings by mandamus.

[3. Pilots ⇨1.]

Under the pilotage law of this State the board of pilotage commissioners have the right to suspend a pilot for dereliction of any duty attaching to his office, whether specifically mentioned in the statute as a cause for removal or not.

Taking a pilot boat off of her regular station and to another port without the owner's knowledge, and putting a pilot on board an outward *bound vessel without provision made for taking the said pilot off again, are derelictions of duty on the part of the pilot so acting.

This was an original proceeding in this court, and is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. B. Howe, for relator.

Mr. W. J. Verdier, contra.

July 3, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This case, like the case of The State ex rel. George McDonald v. William A. Courtenay and others, Pilotage Commissioners of the Port of Charleston (post, p. 180), is within the original jurisdiction of this court, and, like that case, seeks to reverse the action of the pilotage commissioners herein, by mandamus, requiring the said pilotage commissioners to vacate an order made by said board on April 23, 1885, suspending the petitioner as pilot of the port and harbor of Port Royal and St. Helena, &c. This case, however, does not involve, as did the case above referred to, the regularity simply of the proceedings had by the board, but it raises the question whether the charge which was found against the petitioner was of a character which authorized his suspension.

The charge was as follows: "That Charles Stephens violated his duty under the pilotage law, that while on board of the pilot boat Bertha, No. 3, belonging to Captain T. B. Buckley, to wit, on October 25, 1884, he combined with one John Casey, in charge of said pilot boat, contrary to law, to take her off of her regular station without the knowledge or consent of the owner, and assisted in carrying the said boat to Charleston, S. C.; and also in placing a pilot on board an outward bound vessel, making no provision for taking the said pilot off, and the said pilot was compelled to remain on board the said vessel twenty-four hours before he was relieved by another boat, the captain and crew of which had to take him off and bring him to Charleston." In the return to the rule it is stated that the board, after full investigation of this charge, Stephens being allowed the fullest liberty of defence, and being represented by counsel, were satisfied of the truth of the charge, and believing the same to be in violation of the law of the State and of the rules and regulations of said board, "did sentence the said pilot Stephens to be suspended for three months from said April 23, 1885," &c.

No question has been made as to the proceeding by mandamus being a legitimate remedy in a case of this kind, where the facts of the case entitle the petitioner to relief. Ordinarily, mandamus is proper against a public officer for the discharge of a ministerial duty, to which the petitioner shows himself of right entitled, and for the breach of which he has no other adequate redress. Or it may go against an inferior court, requiring said court to proceed in any matter over which it has jurisdiction, yet refuses action. It cannot, however, issue either to a public officer, or to an inferior court, as to matters requiring the exercise of official judgment, or resting on judicial investigation and discretion. Without entering into the discussion here of the question to which of these classes the respondents belong, to wit, whether they are public officers, or whether they constitute an inferior court charged with special duties and invested with certain jurisdiction, it is sufficient to say that, so far as their status is concerned under the cases (Geter v. Commissioners, 1 Bay, 354 [1 Am. Dec. 621]; Singleton v. Same, 2 Bay, 105), they would be subject to this writ in the discharge of their duty where the necessary facts as to the right of the petitioner and the duty of the respondent, upon which, under the law, the writ is usually demandable, appear. In the two cases above cited a tobacco inspector had been removed from office by the tobacco commissioners, a commission of five, authorized by the general assembly to perform certain powers, among them to appoint tobacco inspectors. The removed officer alleging that he had been improperly removed, applied for a mandamus to be restored, and it was granted in each case. In the first (Geter v. Commissioners) a question as to the jurisdiction of the court was raised, which was promptly overruled, Judge Bay saying: "That he would never sit in the Court of Sessions and suffer its authority over any of the inferior officers of any department in the State to be called in question."

*Conceding, then, that the respondents are amenable to mandamus proceedings, the question to be considered is, do the facts here authorize the writ requiring the petitioner to be restored to his office? This depends upon the fact whether the charge of which he was convicted constitutes a sufficient legal cause for his removal. As to the truth of this charge resting entirely upon the evidence, we can take no cognizance, because that is a matter of judicial investigation, and cannot be reviewed by mandamus proceedings. We must take the facts as found by the commissioners, and confine ourselves to the question whether the charge, assuming it to be true, warranted the sentence.

Under the pilotage law found in General Statutes, page 369, commencing with section 1260, several acts are enumerated and specified as violations of the law, and for which, when committed by a pilot, he may be held responsible—in some by suspension, in others by forfeiture of his license, and in others by pecuniary penalties. For instance, in section 1266 it is provided that a pilot shall not engage in any other business while holding his license or branch, without the permission of the commissioners, on pain of being deprived of his license for twelve months. Nor shall a pilot discontinue to act, nor absent himself at any time from the port or harbor, * * * except by permission of the commissioners, under the same penalty as above. In section 1268, certain acts are forbidden on pain of forfeiting his license and also the payment of a certain sum to the State. So in section 1279 and several other sections; but it can hardly be contended that the pilotage commissioners are confined to these enumerated and specified acts in their supervision of the pilots appointed by them. The position of a pilot is a very important one—important to commerce, to the safety of vessels, and to the lives of their crews and passengers, and vastly important to the cities and towns built upon the harbors where pilots are needed; and the pilotage commissioners are expected not only to be careful in their appointment, so as to secure safe and reliable officers, but to be watchful afterwards over their conduct and the manner in which they discharge their duties, and to this end something must be left to their discretion in the application of general principles.

*It is nowhere enumerated in terms by the pilotage act that a pilot may be suspended or deprived of his license or dealt with in any way by the commissioners if he should fail, without excuse, to repair to ships coming into port, or if he should wilfully disreguard a jack hoisted at the foretop masthead of an outward bound vessel. Nor is there any specific penalty provided for recklessly or ignorantly guiding a vessel outside of the channel and upon breakers; but it could not be urged that in acts of this kind the commissioners were powerless because these acts were not specially forbidden in the act. In fact, section 1267 seems to have been intended to provide a general power in the commissioners where it enacts that a majority of the board shall have power and authority to take away the license of a pilot for a given time, or to declare his license null and void, as the nature of the case may demand, upon charge of any dereliction of duty made and proven against him.

In this case, we are satisfied that the act of which the petitioner was convicted was a dereliction of duty. (See the duties of a pilot as specified and mentioned in the oath which he is required to take when appointed, § 1264.) But, in addition to this, one of the acts specially forbidden in section 1266, as stated above, is absenting himself without the permission of the commissioners. Here this pilot was found not only to have absent-ed himself, but to have conspired with another to take away a pilot boat from its station.

It is ordered that the rule be discharged.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur in the result, but am not prepared to assent to the proposition that mandamus is the proper mode of obtaining the relief sought.

23 S. C. *180

*STATE ex rel. McDONALD v. COURTENAY.

[1. Pilots ⇨1.]

The board of pilotage commissioners of Charleston have the power to suspend a pilot and reduce his license, under either section 1266 or section 1267 of the General Statutes, as the facts may warrant, without specifying in their charge the precise section under which they are proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State ex rel. Stephens v. Commissioners of Pilotage of Beaufort, 23 S. C. 176.

[2. Mandamus ⇨77.]

In proper cases, pilotage boards are subject to mandamus at the suit of pilots of their appointment removed from office. Mr. Justice McIVER not concurring.

The summons in this case to a pilot to appear before the commissioners of pilotage was sufficient, as it apprised the pilot of the charge against him and of the investigation to be had.

And the general finding by the board, of dereliction of duty, was sufficient.

[4. Pilots ⇨1.]

A majority of the commissioners was sufficient to constitute the board, and it was not necessary that those present and acting should sign the finding. Gen. Stat., § 1267.

The board having the power to revoke a pilot's license, they could suspend him for three months, and reduce his license from that of full branch to twelve-foot branch.

[6. Mandamus ⇨77; Pilots ⇨5.]

This board has the power to ascertain and determine the fitness of pilots for their office, but not to punish them for crime. In investigating a charge against a pilot for negligence in grounding a steamship, if he is refused the privilege of being represented by counsel in the cross-examination of witnesses, and in argument, he will not, for such refusal, be entitled to a writ of mandamus to restore him to his office from which he has been removed on account of such negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. ⇨77; Pilots, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. ⇨5.]

This was an application to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. P. K. Bryan, for relator.

July 3, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This is a proceeding within the original jurisdiction of this court in which a mandamus is prayed by the relator against the respondents. The relator had been a full branch pilot of the bar and harbor of Charleston for a period of twenty years up to and before the 15th day of January last (1885). On that day he was suspended by a letter from the harbor commissioners, of which the following is a copy:

"Office of the Harbor Commissioners,

"Charleston, S. C., January 15, 1885.

"Capt. George McDonald, Charleston:

"Dear Sir: At a special meeting of the board of harbor commissioners held this day the following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That the letter of the master of the British steamship, Harbinger, and the circumstances attending the said steamship getting ashore be considered by this board at an adjourned meeting to be held to-morrow afternoon, 16th, at 5 o'clock, at which meeting the said pilot and witnesses shall be summoned to attend.

"Resolved, That pending the investigation of this case, the pilot, George McDonald, be suspended."

"You will immediately surrender your license to the harbor master and attend the meeting of the board, at their rooms, to-morrow afternoon, at 5 o'clock p. m.

"Respectfully yours,

"(Signed) James Armstrong, Sect."

On the day (the 16th) and at the time mentioned, the commissioners met, with witnesses summoned, the relator and counsel being present, and though no written charges with specifications, other than the letter above, were made and served on the relator, yet an investigation was had as to the circumstances attending the steamship Harbinger getting ashore. In this investigation, witnesses, after being duly sworn, were examined, with the right of cross-examination freely afforded to and exercised by the relator, as it is said in the return to the rule. It appears, however, that the counsel of the relator was not allowed to participate in this examination, nor was he allowed to represent the relator by argument. It appears, further, that before the investigation began, the relator demanded, by his counsel, from the board, "to declare unto him what charges, if any, were preferred against him, and also demanded written specifications of such charges, if any. That he further demanded the right that his counsel be present to cross-examine all witnesses produced, and to present and make, by addressing the said board, any proper defence of your petitioner. All of which demands were severally denied by said board, whereupon his counsel, on his behalf, formerly protested." These facts are stated in the petition and not denied in the return. The investigation resulted in an order "suspending the relator for three months, at the expiration of which time he be given a twelve-foot branch." At the next ensuing meeting of the board in February, 1885, the relator demanded, in writing, that said board rescind the action of January 16, and forthwith restore him to his office of full branch pilot, which was refused; whereupon his petition for a mandamus requiring the said board to restore the relator to the office of full branch pilot in and for the harbor of Charleston was filed. The respondents, in their return to the rule requiring them to show cause, claim that they had full jurisdiction of this matter by virtue of section 1266 of the General Statutes, and that being satisfied, especially from the testimony of the relator, offered as a witness for himself, "that he had not sounded the channels of the bar for three months, they saw sufficient cause to order and direct the relator, who was the pilot in charge of the Harbinger at the time of the disaster, to give up his license for a period of three months, and to further order that when the new license should be issued, it should be regulated according to his fitness as was discovered in the investigation then had, and be limited to a twelve-foot branch or license, permitting him, however, to remain as a pilot of the bar of Charleston, and not depriving him of his license as such."

Section 1266, under which the respondents claim to have acted, is as follows: "Said board shall have power and authority, for any cause or charge to them satisfactorily proven, to order and direct any and all pilots, for the port to which they belong, to deliver his or their licenses, and to take out a new license or licenses; but no pilot, who shall satisfy them of the groundlessness of such cause or the falsity of such charge brought against him, shall be required to pay any additional fee for his new license."

It cannot be seriously contended that if the cause for which the *pilotage commissioners herein took action against the relator and suspended him, was founded in fact and properly established, that he would be entitled to the writ which he seeks. Because, under the section supra of the pilotage act (Gen. Stat., p. 369), it seems to us that in such case the pilotage commissioners would be fully warranted in doing what they have done. In fact, under this section the license of a pilot might possibly be withdrawn altogether, subject to the right of said pilot to apply for a renewal without any additional fee, upon proof of the groundlessness or falsity of the charge upon which action had been taken by the commissioners.

But if there could be any doubt as to the application of section 1266, can such doubt exist as to the application of section 1267, where it is provided that upon a charge of dereliction of duty made and proven against a pilot, his license may be taken away for a given time, or it may be declared absolutely null and void, as the nature of the case may demand? And this power, by this section, is lodged with a majority of the board. The relator contends in his argument here, that the commissioners were acting under this latter section. This section is a part of the general law governing pilots and pilotage commissioners, as is section 1266, and in the investigation of a case involving the conduct of pilots by a commission like that of pilotage commissioners, where no special rules of procedure are provided, we do not think that it could be made a ground fatal to the proceeding, that the pilot charged with misconduct was not informed under which precise section of the act the alleged misconduct was forbidden. The proceeding of a commission of the character like the pilotage commission must necessarily be somewhat informal, and in the investigation of a charge against a pilot, when he is informed of the character of the charge, in substance and in fact, he is as well prepared to meet it as if the precise section of the act alleged to be violated is pointed out to him.

Supposing that the relator here was properly summoned and was before the commissioners with a charge of dereliction of duty made in connection with the steamship Harbinger, of which he had notice, we think the commissioners had the power to act under either section, 1266 or 1267, as the facts warranted, notwithstanding the precise section under which the commissioners were acting was not mentioned in the charge.

It is not necessary to discuss here the question, whether this board of pilotage commissioners can be made the subject of mandamus proceeding. This has been somewhat considered in the case of State ex rel. Stephens v. Pilotage Commissioners of Beaufort and St. Helena (ante, p. 175), filed at the same time with this case. And under the cases in 1 and 2 Bay, referred to in that case [Geter v. Commissioners, 1 Bay, 354, 1 Am. Dec. 621; Singleton v. Same, 2 Bay, 105], we have conceded that in a proper case these pilotage boards may be subject to a mandamus, in the removal from office of pilots appointed by them.

The question to be considered, then, in the case now before the court is narrowed down to one of procedure. The relator complains: 1. That there was no charge or specification before trial. 2. That he was denied the right of counsel in the cross-examination of witnesses and in argument. 3. That the finding was the general indefinite opinion that he had been derelict of duty without particularising in what. 4. That eight only of the commissioners were present and acted. 5. That this abstract finding even is not signed by the eight commissioners who were present. 6. That the sentence was twofold: suspension for three months, and then taking away full branch and giving pilot a twelve-foot branch.

As to the first, we think the resolution of the board found above, and in which the relator was informed that the master of the steamship Harbinger having complained to the board that his ship had struck in crossing the bar, this matter would be investigated, with witnesses summoned at a time specified, and that pending such investigation he, the pilot, was suspended, was quite sufficient, as a charge upon him that he was the cause of the disaster, and that his conduct therein would be the subject of inquiry and investigation at the time mentioned. That he so regarded and understood it is evidenced by the fact that at the time mentioned he appeared with his counsel to answer and defend. Remembering, as we have already said, that pilotage commissioners do not constitute a regular court, with rules of procedure deliberately prepared and adopted or required, but that it is a mere commission, charged with limited duties and with special functions, *we think their action in the matter of the charge here, and the notice of trial to the relator, was ample.

As to the third ground, that the finding was a general indefinite opinion of dereliction of duty, without particularising in what—we do not think this can be sustained. The relator was evidently charged with dereliction of duty in connection with the ship Harbinger getting ashore, which as pilot he was guiding across the bar. After full investigation, with several witnesses examined and cross-examined, including the relator himself, upon inquiry by the chairman of the board to each member, asking each to give his views, each and all present answered that Geo. McDonald had been derelict in his duty. Derelict in what? Why, certainly in producing the disaster which had been charged upon him, the investigation of which had just closed.

4th. That eight only of the commissioners were present and acted. This was a majority, and under section 1267 a majority may act.

5th. That the abstract of finding is not signed even by the eight. There is nothing in the act which requires the finding to be signed at all, and there is no allegation that the finding, as announced, was not the finding of the board.

6th. That the sentence was twofold. It was within the power of the board to declare the license of the relator null and void. It did not go that far: it simply suspended upon conditions. The less is within the greater, and if the relator is unwilling to take a twelve-foot branch for the future, that is a matter for him.

This brings us to the second objection, which, in our opinion, having the most substance, has been reserved for the last. It would have been better, probably, for the board to have allowed the relator to be represented by counsel, both in the cross-examination of the witnesses and in argument. This is usual in trials involving the rights of parties; in fact, is guaranteed by the constitution, where a party is charged with a crime or offence. In such cases he is entitled to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself or by his counsel, or by both, as he may elect. Art. I., § 13. Here the relator, however, was not charged with crime or other offence, in the sense of this section of the constitution. The pilotage *board is not a board organized for trying crimes or misdemeanors. Its functions, in reference to the appointment of pilots and their suspension or removal from office, have been granted in the nature of powers by which to ascertain and determine the fitness and capacity of such pilots, and in the interest of commerce to secure at all times perfectly safe and reliable pilots, and not for the purpose of punishing crime in such pilots. We do not think, therefore, that the section of the constitution referred to applies.

But there is another section of the constitution which may apply (Art. II., § 31): "Officers shall be removed for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, in such manner as may be provided by law, where no mode of trial or removal is provided in this constitution." Now, section 1267 of the pilotage act provides a mode for removal or suspension of pilots, with the condition that each and every pilot against whom any charge be made shall be entitled to a hearing before the said board of commissioners, and to make any proper defence to such charge, &c. Here the pilot charged appeared before the board at the time to which he was notified. He certainly knew fully the character of the charge against him. He entered upon the trial, and cross-examined the witnesses fully. He offered himself as a witness, and upon the close of the examination he was asked if there was anything not covered by the questions which he wished to state; if so, to say to the board anything that would explain this damage to the steamship Harbinger; and he replied that he had nothing more to add.

Under these circumstances, although the board declined to hear argument on the case from counsel, we do not see that the great prerogative writ of mandamus should be issued as a matter of right to the relator, requiring the pilotage board to restore him to his office, in face of the fact solemnly found by the board, and which, it seems, is sustained by the evidence, that he had been neglectful of his duty to such extent as to have grounded a British steamship in guiding it across the bar, doing such damage as necessitated its return into port.

It is ordered that the rule be discharged.

*Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur in the result, but am not prepared to assent to the proposition that mandamus is the proper mode of obtaining the relief sought.

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, April, 1885. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Wilmot G. DeSaussure and Henry A. DeSaussure, for appellants.

Messrs. J. Barrett Cohen and H. L. P. Bolger, contra.

July 3, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Under proceedings for partition certain real estate in the County of Charleston was sold, and two of the purchasers declining to comply, a rule was taken out which, at the hearing below, was discharged, upon the ground that M. A. Riker, a minor, one of the parties interested in said real estate, had not been properly made a party so as to bind his interest, and therefore the purchasers were not bound to accept the title tendered. The only question made by the appeal is whether said minor had been properly made a party.

The facts are conceded, and are as follows: M. A. Riker is a minor, above the age of fourteen years, resident in the State of Tennessee, and was named as one of the defendants in the action. *There was no order for publication of the summons, but the summons was sent to Tennessee and returned with the following endorsement thereon: "We acknowledge service of the summons and complaint in this action. (Signed) Charles H. Vaughan, Lelia A. Vaughan, and as those with whom the minor defendant, Martin A. Riker, resided. (Signed) M. A. Riker."

Within twenty days thereafter the said M. A. Riker filed his petition, sworn to, setting forth that the case had been begun by service of summons upon the petitioner, &c.; that petitioner was fifteen years of age, and praying the appointment of Wm. A. Hoppoldt as guardian ad litem, who consented to serve, and was appointed.

Conceding that the endorsement on the summons, signed by the minor, though not in form an acknowledgment of service, when taken in connection with the statement in the petition of the minor asking for the appointment of a guardian ad litem, practically amounted to an acknowledgment of service, two objections are made by the respondents:

1. That there was no order for publication of the summons, and that such an order is necessary to give validity, even to actual and formal service of the summons where the party is out of the State. 2. That a minor is incapable of making himself a party to an action by accepting or acknowledging service of the summons.

The mode by which a person may be made a party to an action is prescribed by statute, and in the case of infants jurisdiction of their persons can only be obtained by pursuing the mode prescribed. As is said in Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C., at page 439: "The mode of making infants parties to an action in a court of record is clearly and expressly prescribed by statute, and a due and tender regard for the rights and welfare of infants requires that this statute shall be strictly followed." Section 156 of the code provides the mode by which a non-resident of the State may be served with a summons so as to make him a party to the action, which is by obtaining an order for service by publication; by publication of the summons for the prescribed time, and by depositing a copy of the summons in the post-office, directed to the person to be served, at his place of residence, where, as in this case, it is known. But the section goes on to provide: "Where publication is ordered, personal service of the summons out of the State is equivalent to publication and deposit in the post-office." And then expressly declares: "In case of minors in like cases a similar order shall be made, and like proceedings be had, as in the case of adults."

This being the only mode provided by statute by which a non-resident minor can be made a party defendant to an action, the only question is whether this mode has been "strictly followed." It is quite clear that it has not. The statute, as one alternative, prescribes three things to be done: 1. The procuring of an order for service by publication. 2. The actual publication; and, 3. The deposit in the post-office of a copy of the summons, addressed to the person to be served, at his place of residence. And as the other alternative, two things: 1. The procuring of an order for service by publication. 2. Personal service of the summons out of the State. It is conceded in this case that no order for service by publication was ever obtained, and therefore the first requirement under either of the alternatives above presented has not been complied with. It may be that it is difficult to see any practical benefit to be derived from the order permitting service by publication, yet as the statute expressly requires it, we do not see by what authority we can dispense with that, any more than with any other requirement. So that, even if it should be conceded that the endorsement on the summons signed by the minor, taken in connection with the statement in his petition that the "case had been begun by service of summons upon petitioner," amounted to an acceptance or acknowledgment of service, and as such, equivalent to personal service, there would still be a fatal defect in the failure to obtain an order that the service might be made by publication, for the statute only provides that personal service out of the State shall be sufficient "where publication is ordered."

But, in addition to this, it has been expressly held in the case of Finley v. Robertson, supra, that "an infant is incapable of making himself or herself a party to an action by accepting service, so as to be bound by a judgment therein." It follows from this that even if the minor had, in the most formal manner, accepted or acknowledged service of the summons in this case, he would not thereby have become a party to the action, so as to be bound by any judgment therein.

It is quite clear, therefore, that the non-resident minor, Martin A. Riker, not having been made a party to the action for partition in the mode prescribed by statute, is not bound by any proceedings therein, and that the rule was properly discharged.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN, concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. I feel constrained, under the authority of Robertson and Finley, to concur, otherwise I would hold that M. A. Riker, being over the age of fourteen, having acknowledged personal service, and having appeared and petitioned for the appointment of a guardian ad litem, which appointment was made, was a party before court and bound by the judgment.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, March, 1884.

The facts of this case are stated in the opinion. The judge's charge was as follows:

I consider the court and the counsel on both sides fortunate in having a jury so well informed on subjects of this kind as I am satisfied this jury is. It lessens the burden of responsibility upon both court and counsel.

You are aware, gentlemen, that a policy of insurance is a contract whereby the underwriters undertake to make good any losses which may ensue to the person insured which are provided against in the policy, and, like any other case, the burden is upon the plaintiff claiming to recover under such a contract; first to prove the contract, and next to prove the loss under such circumstances as would entitle them to recover under the contract. If the plaintiffs make out a case of that kind, they are entitled to recover the full amount of the loss which they have suffered by the perils against which they were insured by the policy, unless there be something else in the case shown and established by the evidence which would prevent their recovery. It is chiefly in regard to these objections to the recovery under the peculiar circumstances of this case that your attention has been called by the counsel, and the various propositions which have been made by the counsel to the court in their requests to charge the jury involve chiefly those objections to which I have referred.

I will ask your attention now to what I shall charge you as to the law upon which you are to determine this case. After I have laid down these propositions of law, the whole case is in your hands to deal with as you think the evidence requires under the legal propositions as laid down by the court.

An insurance on a ship does mean ordinarily and prima facie the legal interest in the vessel, and if the policy is intended to cover an equitable interest, it should be so specified. But where the equitable owner of the vessel has possession and control of the same as owner, though the ship's papers may be in the name of another person, who holds the naked legal title, a failure to disclose the true nature of the title of the insurance would not vitiate the policy where the insurer had made no inquiry as to the nature of the title. It would be otherwise, however, if under the circumstances just stated the vessel was not in the possession of the insured, holding the equitable title, and subject to their control as their own property, but was under the control and in the possession of another person as owner, because the insurance of a vessel is supposed to be made by the underwriters, with some reference to the character of the insured, and their prudence and care as owners in the management and preservation of the vessel. A failure in such case to disclose the nature of the interest of insured, when it is other than the legal ownership, the insured being out of possession, would be a material concealment, which would vitiate the policy.

An equitable interest is an insurable one, and may exist and be proved conjointly with the legal title at the custom house in another. If the jury find that the plaintiffs paid the money for the purchase of the tug and for subsequent repairs and the premiums on the insurance, and that the legal title to the said tug was taken and held in the name of W. B. Pringle, Jr., to dispose of the same as the plaintiffs should direct, the said W. B. Pringle, Jr., assenting thereto, then the plaintiffs had an insurable interest in said tug, and, if entitled to recover at all, are entitled to recover to the extent of that interest up to $3,000, provided such *interest be covered by the policy and the policy be in force at the time of the loss.

There is no warranty in the policy as to the legal title, nor any charge in the answer, or evidence on the trial, showing fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation which would of itself avoid the policy.

Any implied warranty of seaworthiness is satisfied if, when the tug was put to work, she was in a condition proper for doing the work, and was kept so by reasonable repairs.

The defences of deviation, misrepresentation, and concealment are questions of fact for the jury and must be proved by the party alleging the same.

The term seaworthiness varies according to the occupation in which the vessel is engaged, and is a question of fact for the jury.

The contract of insurance must be construed in its fair meaning, and having been written and made out entirely by the company, in cases of doubt must be construed most strongly against the company.

If the jury find that the loss has happened wholly from one of the perils insured against, then the negligence of the master and crew in failing to perform their duties as such is no defence to the company when the same did not contribute in any way to such loss.

The warranty of seaworthiness at the commencement of each voyage contained in the policy is a condition precedent, and the plaintiffs cannot recover unless it was literally complied with.

The warranty of seaworthiness, as far as relates to the condition of the boat, requires that when she sails on a voyage under the policy, she should be well furnished, tight, sound, staunch, and strong; that is, competent in her hull to resist the ordinary attacks of wind and weather; and if the "Jennie" left Savannah during the currency of the policy in a leaky condition, and not sound and staunch in her hull, the policy was vitiated, and the underwriters were discharged. A policy of insurance on a vessel or tug imposes upon the insured at all times, during the continuance of the risk, the legal duty of keeping the boat in a condition of reasonable security, and if the plaintiffs, or their agents,

nobody on board competent to protect her against the perils to which she was exposed, and by reason of their negligence she sank, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

In all marine insurance the insured implicitly warrants that his vessel is competent to encounter all the ordinary perils of navigation, and if the "Jennie" sank because of her inability to resist the ordinary perils to which boats similarly situated are exposed, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. If the "Jennie" sank through the carelessness or negligence of the plaintiffs or their agents, either in leaving her in the river in a leaky condition, or by exposing her to perils which would not have been operative but for such negligence, the plaintiffs cannot recover. If an insured vessel is in a leaky and unseaworthy condition, so as not to be able to withstand the ordinary perils to which vessels in like place may be exposed, it is the duty of the owner to repair her, so as to make her reasonably competent to resist the perils to which her situation may expose her. If the "Jennie" was unseaworthy when she was laid up, and the plaintiffs failed to put her in a safe and seaworthy condition requisite for her safety when laid up, then the plaintiffs cannot recover. It was the duty of the plaintiffs to keep the "Jennie" in such condition as to be reasonably sufficient to withstand the ordinary perils attending a boat so laid up at that time and place, and if she was not so kept, the plaintiffs cannot recover.

If a boat sinks without any known cause, the law presumes that such sinking is caused by the unseaworthiness of the boat. So if the loss of the "Jennie" arose from ordinary wear and tear, or from unseaworthiness, or from encountering any ordinary perils of the river, the plaintiff cannot recover, for as to these they are their own insurers. It is the duty of the assured to adopt such measures and to take such precautions for the safety of the boat as a prudent owner uninsured under the circumstances of time and place would have adopted, and if the "Jennie" sank because of the failure of the plaintiffs, or their agents, so to do, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiffs to show that the "Jennie" *sank through the extraordinary dangers and unforeseen accidents against which only the defendants insured them; and if the jury believe that the loss was caused, partly by the insufficient condition of the boat, and partly by the negligence of the plaintiffs, they are not entitled to recover.

In marine insurance anything that materially varies the risks insured against discharges the insurer; and unexcused or unreasonable delay, not justified by necessity, or incurred bona fide, with a view to the purposes of the voyage, does so vary it.

Those are the legal propositions which I charge you, gentlemen. I do not think of anything else to say to you. If you find for the plaintiff, you will find for the full amount of their loss; and if you find for the defendant, you will say: "We find for the defendant."

The jury found for the plaintiffs three thousand dollars.

The exceptions are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. J. Whaley and Buist & Buist, contra.

July 3, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action of plaintiffs upon a policy of insurance issued by the Providence Washington Insurance Company, incorporated under the laws of Rhode Island, and doing business in this State, "on the tug boat 'Jennie,' her hull, tackle, apparel, boiler, machinery, appurtenances, and furniture, on board, for one year from October 20, 1882, at noon. Vessel valued at $4,000. Privilege to tow phosphate and lumber in and around the rivers and creeks between Beaufort, S. C., and Savannah, Ga., and to proceed to Charleston, S. C., if necessary, and also to tow vessels, not oftener than twice a month, from and to sea, off Tybee Light. Vessel valued at $4,000, including premium. Insurance on vessel $3,000, premium $150." The complaint made an exhibit of the policy and set forth the interest of the plaintiffs in the boat, being as stated, for "the repayment of advances made to one Schlegelmilch, who was the purchaser, and engaged in the lumber business on New River; the bill of sale of said tug boat being taken in the name of W. B. Pringle, Jr., the chief clerk of the plaintiffs, and a citizen of the United States, who held the same as security for the repayment of said advances to the plaintiffs." It charged that within the time insured the tug was lost "by the perils of the sea," &c.

The defendants answered, admitting the execution of the policy, but making several defences, which may be condensed as follows: 1. They deny that the legal title to the tug was in the plaintiffs, and insist that the equitable title was not an insurable interest. 2. They allege concealment of their true title by the plaintiffs. 3. Misrepresentation by them.

4. Unseaworthiness of the tug. 5. That the loss of the boat was occasioned by the negligence of insured and agents; and, 6. "Deviation."

The cause was heard by Judge Kershaw and a jury, when much testimony was taken, all of which is printed in the "Brief." In general terms, the testimony tended to show the execution of the policy and the receipt of the insurance by the defendants after full knowledge of the relations of the plaintiffs to the vessel—who had purchased the "Jennie" from the Urie Guano Company and paid the purchase money—that one F. Schlegelmilch was to have her, if he was able to work out her purchase money; and in the meantime the legal title was taken in the name of W. B. Pringle, Jr., the chief clerk of the plaintiffs, who really had no interest, but was to hold it for the benefit of his employers; that Schlegelmilch, the prospective owner, took charge of the boat as master, and ran her in his raft and lumber business; that generally, when she was unemployed, the boat was anchored out in the middle of New River, in front of the *house of the master, Schlegelmilch, which stood some fifty yards from the river, and in full view of the boat riding at anchor; that while in that position the master was absent, but the boat was under the charge of one Hahn, who visited her several times during the day and night, but slept at the house; and that in the evening of April 5, 1882, she was struck by a gale of wind from the southwest, which continued all night, and before daylight the next morning the boat dragged her anchor, went ashore, and sank.

It seems that both parties made requests to charge, but they are not in the "Case," nor is it stated whether the judge refused any of the requests made. Upon the charge, the jury found for the plaintiffs the full amount of the policy, $3,000. The defendants made no motion before the Circuit Judge for a new trial, but appeal to this court upon three exceptions, which will be considered in their order.

The first exception alleges error in the following part of the charge: "If the jury find that the plaintiffs paid the money for the purchase of the tug and for subsequent repairs, and the premiums and insurance, and that the legal title to said tug was taken and held in the name of W. B. Pringle, Jr., to dispose of the same as the plaintiffs should direct, the said W. B. Pringle assenting thereto, then the plaintiffs had an insurable interest in said tug, and if entitled to recover at all, are entitled to recover to the extent of that interest up to $3,000, provided such interest be covered by the policy, and the policy be in force at the time of the loss." "Whereas it is submitted that the plaintiffs, being aliens, could not acquire an interest as equitable owners in the tug, and could have no insurable interest as such in the same."

This exception seems to concede that a mere equitable interest in property may be the subject of insurance as charged by the judge, and in that view we concur. From the terms in which the proposition was announced, it must be assumed that the jury found that the plaintiffs had paid the purchase money of the tug and for subsequent repairs, premiums, and insurance, and that the legal title was held by Pringle only for their benefit. Under these circumstances it would require a very strong case to authorize the insurers, after loss actually occurred, to deny liability according to the terms of a contract made by themselves, with full knowledge of the circumstances, and as to the manner in which the property was held. It has even been matter of controversy whether a mere hope or expectation without any interest in the subject matter, a mere wager policy or bet that a certain event would or would not take place, might or might not be recoverable as a valid contract; but there can be no doubt that any lawful interest existing at the time of the loss will entitle the insured to recover on his contract, whether that interest in the subject insured be absolute or contingent, legal or equitable. A creditor to whom property is assigned as collateral security has an insurable interest to the extent of his debt. Chancellor Kent, with whom the subject of marine insurance seems to have been a sort of specialty, says: "The interest need not be a property in the subject insured. It is sufficient if a loss of the subject would bring upon the insured a pecuniary loss, or intercept a profit. Interest does not necessarily imply a right to, or property in, the subject insured. It may consist in having some relation to, or concern in, the subject of the insurance, and which relation or concern may be so affected by the peril as to produce damage. Where a person is so circumstanced, he is interested in the safety of the thing, for he receives a benefit from its existence, and a prejudice from its destruction, and that interest, in the view of the English law, is a lawful subject of insurance," &c. 3 Kent Com., 276; Arnould Ins., 229.

It is, however, claimed that on the trial below, the plaintiffs themselves proved the fact that, although residing in this State and doing business here, they were British subjects, aliens; and as soon as that fact appeared, there was introduced a new defence not adverted to before, viz., that the plaintiffs, being aliens, could not, under the navigation laws of the United States, hold any interest in a vessel licensed in accordance with those laws; and that, therefore, they could not recover upon a policy insuring said vessel even against those who had made the contract and received the consideration; and that it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to omit so to charge. The issue of the alienage of the plaintiffs was not made in the pleadings. The evidence was not developed with reference to such issue, and the fact of their being British subjects only fell out casually and incidentally, being assigned as a reason why the legal title to the vessel was taken by Mr. Pringle; yet it was urged before us that the defence, based upon this new fact, should have been held conclusive, and that the omission of the Circuit Judge so to charge was error of law.

It does not appear that the Circuit Judge was requested so to charge, and we do not consider the point properly before this court. In a law case, as frequently held, our only province is to correct errors of law committed below, and that cannot be affirmed of a mere omission to charge, even in a case when the issue is made by the pleadings, unless it appears that the judge refused to charge after he was so requested. It is the office of exceptions to bring before the court only such matters as were contested below. Exceptions going beyond that will not be considered. Any other course, as we conceive, would be in excess of our very limited jurisdiction, and neither just to the Circuit Judge nor promotive of a systematic, orderly administration of the laws. "To permit this court to consider alleged errors of the Circuit Judge in omissions to charge, it is absolutely necessary that the case should show that he was requested so to charge." Sawyer, Wallace & Co. v. Macaulay, 18 S. C., 543, and authorities cited.

It is, however, ingeniously urged that as soon as the evidence that the plaintiffs were British subjects fell out on the trial, that fact became a part of the case, and the Circuit Judge was bound, without being specially requested so to do, to charge that the plaintiffs, as aliens, could not hold "an equitable interest" in the boat "Jennie," for the reason that, under the navigation laws of the United States, aliens can hold no interest in an American vessel; that being incapable of holding any interest, they could not, on the principle that the whole includes all its parts, hold an "equitable interest," and that the failure so to charge was really not a mere omission, but an error of commission in charging the law incorrectly on the facts fairly in the case. This is certainly plausible, but it does not seem to us sound. The question made by the pleadings was not whether the plaintiffs had any interest in the boat, but that having only an equitable interest, that would not support the policy and authorize a recovery on it. The defence that the plaintiffs were aliens was a very different affirmative defence, which was not made in the pleadings. When the proof of alienage fell out, it was really irrelevant to the issues joined, and as such possibly might have been stricken out or disregarded. "The question of the relevancy of a fact to a given inquiry is of importance, because evidence is not admissible to prove an irrelevant fact." Best Evid., 352; Steph. Dig. Evid., 135; 2 Rap. & Law. Dict., 1092.

If the defence of the alienage of the plaintiffs, under the complex and numerous provisions of the navigation laws of the United States, was to be insisted on, it should have been distinctly stated in the answer and argued before the Circuit Judge. But it does not appear that it was considered at all, or that even the statutes of the United States, under which the defence is claimed to arise, were submitted for his consideration and construction, or that he was requested to charge the jury upon the subject. In his charge, the judge appears to have made no reference to the matter, and we cannot say that he committed error of law in confining himself to the issues made in the pleadings. As was said in the case of Eason v. Miller & Kelly (15 S. C., 202): "Generally the issues of fact involved in a case will be found contained in the allegations of the plaintiff and the statements of the defence as stated in the answer: and where there is nothing more in the complaint and answer but questions of fact, then an examination of these pleadings will present the true issues submitted to the jury, and to which their verdict will be understood to be responsive. But the pleadings, in addition to questions of fact, may also raise questions of law. In such case, the questions of law do not go to the jury, but must be decided by the court," &c.

But as the court is always desirous that every case should have full consideration and be decided according to the law and the evidence, we have looked through the authorities upon the subject of the alienage of the plaintiffs, so far at least as to satisfy ourselves that no injustice has been done. There can be no doubt that in this State an alien who is not an alien enemy may acquire, hold, and contract concerning property in the same manner as a natural born citizen. Gen. Stat.,

§ 1768. There is *nothing about the contract of insurance which makes it an exception. 3 Kent, 253. But it is claimed that, in reference to a certain kind of property, American vessels, there is in the laws of the United States a prohibition against ownership by aliens on pain of forfeiture. The point as applied to this case has a double aspect: that the "Jennie" at the time she was insured was liable to forfeiture under a section of those laws (U. S. Rev. Stat., § 4320 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 8068]), which, among other things, provides that "The master of such vessel shall also swear that he is a citizen, &c., * * * and if such vessel be less than twenty tons burden, the husband or managing owner shall swear that she is wholly the property of citizens of the United States," &c.; and that, therefore, being liable to a forfeiture for the violation of this law, a policy on the vessel was illegal and void.

It will be observed that the vessel had not been forfeited, and that this was not a proceeding on the part of the government to have a forfeiture declared, and therefore, we need not inquire whether the facts would make out a violation of the law; but it was an action on a contract to insure the vessel made by the defendants themselves upon fair and valuable consideration received. In such an action, as we understand it, the insurers may not escape the consequences of their contract by interposing the defence that the boat insured was liable to forfeiture. The Ocean Insurance Company v. Polleys, 13 Peters, 163 [10 L. Ed. 105]. That case was very analogous to this. The defendants had insured the schooner "Mary" for one year. They were afterwards sued on the policy, and made defence that the "Mary," at the time she was insured, was liable to forfeiture under a law of the United States, and therefore the policy was not binding. The Supreme Court overruled the defence, and Judge Story, in delivering the judgment, said: "The objection then as insisted on by the counsel for the company involved two distinct propositions. The first was that the schooner was liable to forfeiture: the second was that the policy on her was therefore void. Now, the first might have been most fully admitted by the court, and yet the second have been denied, upon the ground that the policy was a lawful contract in itself, and only remotely connected with the illegal use of the certificate of registry, and in no respect designed to *aid, assist or advance any such illegal purpose. We all know that there are cases where a contract may be valid, notwithstanding it is remotely connected with an independent illegal transaction, which, however, it was not designed to aid or promote. * * * Suppose the "Mary" had been repaired in port, and the shipwrights had known the circumstances under which she had obtained the new certificate of registry, would they, in consequence of such knowledge alone, have lost their right to recover for their work and labor? Suppose a vessel had been actually forfeited by some antecedent illegal act, are all contracts for her future employment void, although there is no illegal object in view, and the forfeiture may never be enforced?" &c.

In this case the legal title to the vessel was in Pringle, a citizen, but even if the equitable interest of the plaintiffs made the use of the certificate of license illegal, we cannot see that the policy, a contract in itself lawful and in no way forbidden, was in any respect designed to aid, assist, or advance that illegal purchase. See Clark v. Protection Insurance Company, 1 Story, 131 [Fed. Cas. No. 2,832]; Wilkes v. People's Fire Insurance Company, 19 N. Y., 187; The

The second exception complains that the Circuit Judge "erred in charging that 'the defences of deviation, misrepresentation, and concealment are questions of fact for the jury, and must be proved by the party alleging the same'; whereas it is submitted that the interpretation of the policy as to the voyage prescribed therein and the causes thereof was a question of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury. The court should have construed the terms of the policy in relation thereto, and the jury have applied the facts adduced in evidence to the law so declared."

This exception states the law correctly, but, as it seems to us, there is a misapprehension as to what the judge did charge. There cannot be a doubt as to all questions of misrepresentation and concealment being pure questions of fact for the jury. That narrows the complaint down to the subject of "deviation," which, as applied to marine insurance, is somewhat in the nature of a technical term. We concur that it was the duty of the Circuit Judge to construe the policy, a written instrument, explain what *was meant by the term "deviation" and its effect, and then leave it to the jury to say whether the facts found made out the defence. It would be unjust to take particular detached sentences of the charge and construe them without reference to the context, and taking the different parts of the charge and considering it as a whole, it seems to us that the judge did all it is said he should have done. In the very same connection from which the words quoted in the exception were taken, he proceeds to say: "In marine insurance, anything that materially varies the risk insured against discharges the insurer; and unexplained and unreasonable delay, not justified by necessity or incurred bona fide with a view to the purposes of the voyage, does so vary it."

We do not well see how the judge could have said more. The only "deviation" complained of was that of "delay"; that the boat was not fully manned and engaged every day; but at the time of the accident was lying at anchor in New River. In strictness, the doctrine of "deviation" applies to a particular voyage between places named, as to which delay in starting, change of season, local divergence, longer route, and many other circumstances may materially change the risk from that which was intended by all parties when the policy was effected. We do not, however, see how these things could be properly considered in reference to a policy not for a particular voyage, but for a year, so long as the insured vessel kept within her privilege "to tow phosphate rock and lumber in and around the rivers and creeks between Beaufort and Savannah, and to proceed to Charleston if necessary; also to tow vessels, not oftener than twice a month, from and to sea, off Tybee Light." 1 Am. Ins., 383, 409. But be this as it may, after the judge had charged the jury that "anything that materially varies the risk discharges the insurer," it was for them to say whether the risk had been so varied.

The third exception is as follows: That "his honor erred in charging: 'If the jury find that the loss has happened wholly from one of the perils insured against, then the negligence of the master and crew in failing to perform their duties as such is no defence to the company when the same did not contribute in any way to such loss.' This language, appellants submit, assumed as a fact the presence of a master and crew, whose negligence *would not exempt the insurers, and was calculated to mislead the jury."

We make the same remark as to this exception. The charge must be considered as a whole. The Circuit Judge seems to have been particularly careful to state the law fully upon the subject of seaworthiness. Among other things, he said: "A policy of insurance on a vessel or tug imposes on the assured at all times during the continuance of the risk the legal duty of keeping the boat in a condition of reasonable security, and that if the plaintiffs or their agents allowed the 'Jennie' to remain in a leaky condition, anchored out in New River, with nobody on board competent to protect her against the perils to which she was exposed, and by reason of their negligence she sank, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover," &c. The defendants certainly had no right to complain of this charge. Considering it as applicable only to the question of seaworthiness, we cannot say that it was error, but it came very near trenching on that other doctrine announced by the judge that "when the loss has happened wholly from one of the perils insured against, the negligence of the master and crew in failing to perform their duties as such is no defence to the company where the same did not in any way contribute to such loss."

For a period the effect of negligence on the part of the insured was in cases of insurance a vexed question; but it seems to have been finally settled upon the ground that causa proxima non remota spectatur. Busk v. Royal Exch. Ass. Company, 2 Barn. & Ald., 82; Columbian Ins. Company v. Lawrence, 10 Peters, 507 [9 L. Ed. 512]; Street v. Augusta Ins. Company, 12 Rich., 13 [75 Am. Dec. 714]. In the case first cited, the "Carolina," a Russian vessel, being delayed by stormy weather, was frozen up in the Gulf of Finland. The crew was discharged until the breaking up of the ice the following spring, and the ship was left in charge of the mate, who lighted a fire in the cabin and went on board another ship to sleep. About 4 o'clock the next morning the ship was discovered to be on fire, and was consumed to the water's edge. It was conceded that the loss arose from the negligence of the mate, and it was held that "where the assured had once provided a sufficient crew, the negligent absence of all the crew at the time *of the loss was no breach of the implied warranty that the boat would be properly manned." This case has been followed, and the question may now be considered as finally settled. In our own case of Street v. Augusta Insurance Company, supra, Judge Wardlaw said: "A policy of insurance is construed so as to preserve its practical usefulness without nice metaphysical refinements. If a peril that has been insured against has been the immediate cause of the damage, the purpose of insurance would be defeated, and the general principle upon which courts refrain from considering 'the causes of causes' would be violated, by looking behind this peril for its cause."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The junior encumbrancer was not a necessary party. 11 S. C., 545; Pom. Rem., § 342; Story Eq. Pl., § 193; Calv. Parties, 128, 138. The junior encumbrancer here is the State of South Carolina: how can she be made a party, or served with process?

July 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, respondent, as master for Greenville County in 1884, sold a certain tract of land, located in Newberry County, to the defendant, appellant, at public sale. The land was described in the advertisement and sold as land belonging "to the estate of Reuben S. Chick, deceased, and known as the river or Hodge's place, containing nine hundred acres, more or less, and bounded by lands of Mrs. Worthy and Enoree River," and it was so conveyed to the defendant by deed without warranty. The bond for purchase money was secured by mortgage of the premises. The action below was on this bond, and to foreclose the mortgage. The answer alleges a subsequent encumbrance on the land in the shape of a judgment in a case of the State of South Carolina v. Uriah B. Whites and others for an amount greater than the value of the land, and that said encumbrancer is a necessary party to the action. It is also alleged that there is a deficiency of forty acres in the quantity of the land, which deficiency, at the price paid, amounts in value to $120.66.

His honor, Judge Pressley, presiding, overruled both of these defences, holding that the subsequent encumbrancer was not a necessary party, and that the appellant could not claim a deduction for the deficit of forty acres alleged under the facts of the case, and he decreed a foreclosure for the whole amount of the mortgage debt. The appeal questions the correctness of the *above rulings of the judge, so that the questions raised are, did the judge err, 1, in refusing to make the subsequent encumbrancer a party? 2, in refusing to allow the appellant an abatement for the deficiency in the quantity of the land?

The case does not involve the discussion of the question whether the subsequent encumbrancer might have been made a party without error, nor whether he may not have been a proper party, but it rests upon the question whether under the facts of the case he was a necessary party to such extent as that the plaintiff could not proceed without bringing him in. The appellant has not brought to our attention any case from our reports, nor any authority from text writers sustaining so rigorous a principle as that contended for, as applicable to this case, and he admits that the result of his research in our State reports is that he has found no case where it has been held that a Circuit Judge could properly refuse to make a subsequent encumbrancer a party to an action for foreclosure when defendant insisted upon it. In other words, he has found no case in which the precise question now raised has been determined, to wit, whether in such case the subsequent encumbrancer is a necessary party.

In Adger & Co. v. Pringle (11 S. C., 545), Mr. Justice McIver, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There can be no doubt that all prior as well as subsequent encumbrancers, while not necessary, are proper parties to an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, and in order that the land may produce its full value at the sale sought by such action for foreclosure, it is desirable that such encumbrancers should be made parties." And Mr. Pomeroy, in his Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 342, says: "It is a rule universally established that all subsequent encumbrancers, who are holders of general or specific liens on the land, whether mortgages, judgment creditors, or whatever be the nature of the lien, if it can be enforced against the land, are not necessary parties, in the sense that their presence is indispensable to the rendition of a decree of sale, but they are necessary parties defendants to the recovery of a judgment which shall give the purchaser a title free from their liens and encumbrances. If they are not joined as defendants, their rights are unaffected, their liens remain undisturbed and continue upon the land while in the hands of the purchaser, and they retain the right of redemption from the holder of the mortgage before the sale, and from the purchaser after the sale."

We think the real distinction is drawn here by Mr. Pomeroy. If the object of the proceeding is to adjudicate the right of the encumbrancers, as well as to foreclose for the benefit of the immediate plaintiff, then such encumbrancers are necessary parties, because their rights cannot be determined in their absence. If, however, the proceeding is a proceeding for foreclosure simply, instituted for the recovery of the debt secured by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, while the subsequent encumbrancer may very properly be brought in, yet there is no legal necessity that he should be. See Story Eq. Pl., § 193. In the case referred to by appellant (in Ensworth v. Lambert) 4 Johns. Ch. [N. Y.] 604, a case of foreclosure where a subsequent mortgagee, on the petition of the defendant, was made a party, Chancellor Kent did say: "That it was a fixed rule and essential to justice that no decree should pass until all necessary parties were brought in; all encumbrancers existing at the commencement of the suit must be made parties, or else their rights will not be affected by the decree and sale thereof." This is not in conflict with the quotation from Mr. Pomeroy above, nor what Mr. Justice McIver said in Adger & Co. v. Pringle, supra; on the contrary it is in accord therewith, to wit: where the decree is intended to adjudge or affect the rights of the subsequent encumbrancer, he must be made a party, otherwise he may not be.

The law applicable to the second question is not doubtful. As a general principle, where lands are sold by the acre, the party purchasing cannot be made to pay for more acres than the tract contains, or where lands are sold by any special description, to such extent as that a failure in that respect would amount to a misrepresentation on the part of the vendor, an abatement will usually be allowed in accordance with the facts. But where it is sold as a whole, in gross, and under the name by which it is known as a certain tract, though the number of acres in the general description is mentioned, yet, accompanied with the words, "more or less," an abatement will not be allowed as a matter of course, because there is a deficiency in the quantity afterwards ascertained. On the contrary, abatement will be refused ordinarily. To this, however, there are exceptions, as in a case of a very gross deficiency. On this subject, see the cases referred to in respondent's argument.—Commissioner in Equity v. Thompson, 4 McCord, 434; Peden v. Owens, Rice Eq., 55; Morris Canal Co. v. Emmett, 9 Paige [N. Y.] 168 [37 Am. Dec. 388]; Jones v. Banskett, 2 Speers, 68; Ellis v. Hill, 6 Rich., 37.

Here the land was sold by the master under an advertisement stating "that it belonged to the estate of Renben S. Chick, deceased; that it was known as the river or Hodges place, containing nine hundred acres, more or less, and bounded by lands of Mrs. Worthy and the Enoree River." The defendant must have known that the vendor, acting as master, and selling, not his own property, but the property of a deceased party, under an order of the court, could not be very well informed as to the precise character or quantity of the land. Besides, the land was not offered by the acre. These facts and the absence of all precise description should have put him on his guard. The deficit of forty acres is not of such gross character, when compared to the whole tract, as to bring the case within the exception which sometimes allows parties relief, and the general rule is against the appeal.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the lower court be affirmed.

[1. Trial ⇐191.]

There is no error in refusing a request to charge that assumes the existence of a fact at issue.

[2. Indictment and Information ⇐168.]

Where an indictment charges the defendant with stealing three hogs, the property of J., the defendant may properly be convicted if the evidence shows that any one of the hogs was the separate property of J.

Before Aldrich, J., Berkeley, February, 1885.

Edward Evans was indicted for stealing three hogs. The evidence showed that one of the hogs belonged to Toney Jackson, one to his wife, and the third to her father, who put it in the same pen with the other two to be taken care of, and to be the *property of Jackson's wife, if he (the father) never came for it; and that he had never come for it. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lee & Bowen, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant was indicted for larceny of live stock. The case was heard at the February term of the Court of General Sessions for Berkeley County, 1885, the indictment being as follows: "That * * * certain live stock, to wit, three (3) hogs of the value of twelve ($12) dollars, of the proper goods and chattels of one Toney Jackson, then and there being found, he feloniously did steal, take, and carry away," &c.

At the close of the testimony for the State, the defendant requested his honor, Judge Aldrich, presiding, to charge the jury "that the ownership of the property being laid in one Toney Jackson, and the evidence being that the same was the property of Toney Jackson and two other persons, the variance was fatal, and the defendant should be acquitted on said indictment." His honor declined to charge as requested, but charged as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, I shall not speak to you of the objection to the indictment by counsel; I still have some doubt as to that; but inasmuch as the State has no hesitation, I give the facts of the case to the jury, because, if I am wrong on the law, I may be corrected." The defendant was convicted, and has appealed, assigning as error the refusal of his honor to charge as requested.

The request to charge assumed as a fact that the evidence in the case had shown that the property in question belonged to Toney Jackson and two other persons, and upon this assumption the request as to the law was made. In other words, it was a request, in substance, that the judge should first instruct the jury that, as a matter of fact, the State had not only failed to sustain the allegation in the indictment, that the property belonged to Toney Jackson alone, but had proved that it belonged to two *other persons with the said Jackson, and then to apply the law to this state of facts. The judge could not have done this without invading the constitutional province of the jury as to the facts. There was, therefore, no error in his refusal to make the charge as requested. And, besides, even if the judge had been authorized to look into the question of fact as a foundation for the charge, he would have found no evidence sustaining the assumption that the property belonged jointly to Toney Jackson and to two other persons, which, if true, would have prevented a conviction under the cases of State v. Owens, 10 Rich., 169; State Dwyre, 2 Hill, 287; State v. Risher, 1 Rich., 219.

It seems to be true, however, that all of the property mentioned in the indictment did not belong to Toney Jackson. The indictment charged the stealing of three hogs alleged to be the property of Toney Jackson, when the evidence, as it seems, and as is admitted by the solicitor, established title as to one of the hogs only in Toney Jackson. The case has been argued here on both sides as if the judge had charged as a matter of law that defendant could be convicted if only a portion of the property was found by the jury to belong to Toney Jackson. The judge did not, however, charge this as is seen above; he simply refused the request of the defendant, which he was compelled to do when presented in the shape it was, involving, as it did, the assumption of a fact, the truth of which the jury alone could determine. But even had the judge so charged, we do not think it would have been error on his part. True, it has been held in several cases supra, that where the indictment charges the property in question to belong to one person, and the evidence establishes title jointly in that person and another, the accused cannot be convicted, simply for the reason that the allegation in the indictment has not been sustained by the testimony; not that the indictment is informal, but because there is a failure of proof.

But we have been cited to no case where the accused was entitled to an acquittal on the ground that all of the property alleged to have been stolen had not been proved to belong to the party named in the indictment as the owner. In the case before the court, one of the hogs was proved to be the propthink, was sufficient. *State v. John*son*, 3 Hill, 1. In that case the indictment charged the stealing of three negroes in one count, and it was held that the accused could be convicted if he stole either one of them. See Whart. Cr. Prac. & Pl. (5th edit.), § 252. In such a case it should appear that the larceny alleged embraced that portion of the property which belonged to the prosecutor or the party named in the indictment, and the defendant would be authorized to request the judge to charge that he could not be convicted unless the testimony established title to said portion of the property stolen in such party. This request, however, was not made in this case, and there was no error, therefore, in the fact that the judge made no charge upon this precise point. The only error assigned in the appeal is that the judge failed to charge as requested. In this, as we have seen, there was no error.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Greenville, April, 1884.

The judgment of the Circuit Court was as follows:

After full argument of counsel for the plaintiff and defendants in this case, which by consent was submitted to the court for trial without a jury, I concur with the master in his findings of fact, except, perhaps, modified below, and I arrive at the following conclusions of law governing the case:

By the terms of their contract with the plaintiff, the defendants undertook, for certain specified commissions, to receive from the *plaintiff certain fertilizers, to sell the same, collect the price thereof, either in a specified amount of cotton, at a specified price, or in money, and to turn over to the plaintiff said proceeds, less stipulated commissions. To the extent of these commissions they became the guarantors of the sales. In making all sales, however, the defendants were bound to act in good faith to their principal; that is, they were bound to exercise reasonable diligence in making the sales, and reasonable judgment and circumspection in selecting purchasers and securing the payment of the purchase money, or delivery of the price in cotton according to contract, and were bound to be reasonably active and diligent in making collections. They were also responsible to their principal for good faith and promptness in accounting to him for all collections. Having become agents, they were by that relation to their principal prohibited by the rules of good faith and good stewardship, from sacrificing the interest of the principal to promote their own.

Having advanced the fertilizers of the plaintiff to one engaged in cultivating they had a right also to advance supplies to the same person from their own storehouse to enable him further to make and gather the crop. But in all cases where this course was pursued they had no right to exhaust the crop so made by these manures in paying their own private supply accounts and merchants' accounts to the entire loss of the plaintiff. They could not rightfully thus sacrifice their principal's interest to promote their own. Good faith forbids this, yet the defendants have certainly pursued this course, and from crops raised with the aid of these fertilizers they have reaped a handsome harvest, and by exhausting the crops to pay their store accounts and for animals sold have left nothing to be collected and turned over to the plaintiff.

I find that they are liable to account to the plaintiff for the full balance of the cotton which represents that part of the fertilizers sold and not collected and accounted for. This the master has proven to be 2,399½ pounds, less 63 pounds, which leaves 2,246½ pounds of cotton due by the defendants to the plaintiff November 1, 1882, or at the farthest, January 1, 1883, allowing reasonable time for collecting after maturity. The price *of this cotton, under the testimony, 1 place at 10 cents per pound, but do not allow interest thereon, except from January 1, 1883. From this amount must be deducted the defendants' commissions, amounting in all to sixty-nine 50-100 dollars. Deducting these sums, and counting interest on the balance since January 1, 1883, there remains the sum of one hundred and sixty-eight 75-100 dollars, now justly due by the defendants to the plaintiff, and for which he must have judgment.

Upon the payment of this sum and costs the defendants will be entitled to retain the notes for guano sold and to collect and use the proceeds, but until that is done these notes are subject to the demand of the plaintiff, who, if he collects any part thereof, must credit this judgment with the same, and it is so ordered and adjudged; and it is further adjudged, that the plaintiff do recover of the defendants the sum of one hundred and sixty-eight 75-100 dollars and costs, and that he have leave to enter up formal judgment therefor and issue execution to enforce the same.

Exceptions by defendants for the purposes of an appeal were as follows:

I. That his honor erred in deciding that the appellants acted in bad faith towards the respondents.

II. That appellants conducted the business in the manner usual among fertilizer dealers in the city of Greenville, and are therefore not responsible for the losses enumerated in his honor's decree.

III. That the respondent was fully informed as to the manner in which the appellants were conducting the business, and having made no objection thereto, he is now estopped.

IV. That his honor erred in deciding, in substance, that the appellants are guarantors to the full amount of all fertilizers sold by them, while the agreement specifies that they are guarantors to the extent of their commissions only.

V. That even if his honor had not otherwise erred, it is submitted that the appellants could not be held responsible for cotton at more than 9¼ cents per pound, that being the price at which the parties made their final settlement, and that they are not responsible in any event for interest.

*Mr. Julius H. Heyward, for appellant.

July 13, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This case was heard by his honor, Judge Hudson, upon the report of the master, to whom it had been previously referred, "to take the testimony and state the various matters of accounts involved, with instructions to report the same, together with his conclusions of fact." His honor concurred in the findings of fact by the master, with some slight modification, and decreed to the plaintiff the sum of one hundred and sixty-eight 75-100 dollars and costs. From this decree this appeal has been taken.

The defendants were agents of the plaintiff in the sale of certain fertilizers under a written agreement or contract which is set out in the "Case." Under this agency the defendants sold a quantity of the fertilizers mentioned and took notes as directed; a portion of these they failed to collect, resulting in loss to the plaintiff. For this loss the action below was brought, the plaintiff alleging that the failure to collect by the defendants was occasioned by their gross negligence; and this alleged negligence was the gist of the action. His honor, the Circuit Judge, found the fact of the negligence, and upon this finding based his decree.

Now, the case below being a case at law, we cannot go behind the findings of fact as found by the Circuit Judge. On the contrary, we must assume them to be correct. Such being the status of the case before us, it follows that the only question for our consideration is the question of law involved, to wit, whether an agent can be held responsible to his principal for loss resulting from negligence or bad faith in the conduct of the agency. Upon this question there cannot be two opinions. It therefore needs no discussion or citation of authority.

The Circuit Judge having found the question of negligence and bad faith against the defendants as a matter of fact, and having based his decree upon this finding, the question raised in appellants' exceptions, that the business was conducted in the manner usual among fertilizer dealers in the city of Greenville, *and that respondent was informed thereof, and did not object, cannot be considered by us. These were facts which, if true, were involved in the general question of negligence, and we are bound to assume that the Circuit Judge fully considered them in his final judgment.

As to the exception "that his honor erred in deciding in substance that the appellants are guarantors to the full amount of all fertilizers sold by them, while the agreement specifies that they are guarantors to the extent of their commissions only," it is only necessary to say that the action below did not involve the question of guaranty stipulated in the agreement, but, as we have stated, its gist was the alleged negligence of the defendants in the management of the business entrusted to them, and the action was to recover the damages resulting from this negligence not covered by the guaranty.

We see no error as to the price of the cotton or the fact that interest was allowed in the decree.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

23 S. C. 216

DICKSON v. DICKSON.

[1. Wills ⇐551.]

A testatrix, after a bequest of personalty to her three sons, A, B, and C, by name, devised and bequeathed all the rest and residue of her estate to her daughters, D and E, for life, with remainder to their issue. The will then provides: "But in default of such issue, then the property so given to go to my three sons, share and share alike, or in case of the death of any of them at that time, to and among their then surviving children, such children collectively taking their parent's share." The three sons died, A without children, and B and C both leaving children, and afterwards the daughter D died without issue. Held, that the interest of the sons upon the determination of the life estate in the daughters was a contingent remainder, but nevertheless transmissible to their representatives; and therefore, upon the death of D, the estate held by her for life passed—one-third to the children of B, one-third to the children of C, and one-third to the legal representatives and heirs of A.

*217

*The gift of the remainder to the sons was a gift to them individually and not as a class.

3. Wills [§551.]

Where the will does not make the limitation depend upon surviving the first taker, but places it upon some other contingent event, non-survivorship will not defeat the remainder, and upon the happening of the contingency after the death of the contingent remainderman, the remainder will vest in his heirs or representatives.

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, November, 1884.

This was an action by Louisa O'Hear Dickson, daughter of the testatrix, Sarah O'Hear, against her infant daughter, Sarah O'Hear Dickson, and the children, their heirs and representatives, of James O'Hear and John S. O'Hear, and the administratrix of Joseph O'Hear. The action was commenced in June, 1884, for the purposes stated in the opinion of this court. The case was referred to G. H. Sass, Esq., master, whose report stated the facts and the questions involved, and then continued as follows:

The whole question turns upon the character of the estate created in the second class of remaindermen under the executory devise. It is claimed by the administratrix of Joseph O'Hear that Joseph took an absolute interest in his share; that the gift was an executory devise to the three sons absolutely, subject to be destroyed by the life-tenant's leaving issue, and by no other contingency whatever. The words which follow merely substitute the children of a deceased son in place of the parent as to their parent's share. The right to have the benefit of the terms of the devise became fixed on the death of testatrix. The gift to Joseph being absolute, with no proviso that he was to outlive the life-tenant, but mere provision that should he not, children of his might succeed to his rights, cannot be divested for others. And it is contended that the gift is not to "sons" as a class, but to "my three sons" (as if nominatim they having just been named), "share and share alike." Whatever doubts I might otherwise have had upon the point raised, they must yield to the authority of the case of McElwee v. Wheeler, 10 S. C., 392.

* * * * *

Applying this principle to the present case, it seems to me *clear that the interest of the sons must be held to have been wholly contingent. By the terms of the will, "in case of the death of any of them (the sons) at that time," the property was given "to and among their then surviving children, such children collectively taking their parent's share." I take the words "in case of the death of any of them at that time" to mean "in case any of the sons should be dead at the time of the death of either life tenant without issue." And the effect of this clause is to substitute the children of any deceased son in their parent's place, such children collectively taking their parent's share. The remainder to Joseph (the son who died in the life-time of the life-tenant without children) never took effect at all.

The testatrix designated the persons who were to take upon the happening of the contingency of the death of the life-tenant without issue. They were her three sons. She further contemplated the possibility of one or more of the sons being dead at the time the contingency happened, and she provided that, in such case, the children of such son should stand in their father's place. In my judgment, the bequest to the sons was to them as a class, as contradistinguished from the daughters. Where a bequest is to children at the death of a tenant for life, those who then answer the description take. Cole v. Creyon, 1 Hill Eq., 311 [26 Am. Dec. 208]; Conner v. Johnson, 2 Id., 41.

At the death of the tenant for life in this case, there were no persons alive answering the description of "sons," but there were persons answering the description of the further clause of the will—i. e., there were children of dead sons then surviving, and I think that those children took the whole property. Otherwise the share of Joseph must be regarded as having lapsed. Joseph died before the life-tenant. His chance of future possession, which was a mere possibility, was not such an interest as was devisable or transmissible. He left no children who could take it under the terms of the will. Either the bequest was to a class—"sons, or surviving children of dead sons"—in which case the children of James and John take the whole, or the share of Joseph falls into the estate. Courts will always, if possible, avoid the latter construction, and will endeavor to ascer-

testator. It is my judgment that *upon the death of Amelia without leaving issue, her share passed to the then surviving children of the deceased sons, James and John, there being no children of Joseph to fulfill the terms of the devise.

That this result is in accordance with the intention of the testatrix is, I think, very clear from the construction of the will taken as a whole. Her purpose evidently was to provide for descendants of her own blood. She provides first for her daughters and their issue, and failing that, she substitutes her sons and their children who may survive the life-tenant. It was not in her contemplation that any strangers to her blood should inherit. And the husbands of her daughters and the wives of her sons are equally excluded. It seems to me that the construction which I have given to the devise is fully in accord with the purpose and intent of testatrix.

The devise to the children of the sons will not include grandchildren, and the grandchildren of James do not take. Grandchildren do not take under a bequest to children, unless there are no children, or there are strong and conclusive circumstances to show that such was the testator's intention. Ruff v. Rutherford, Bail. Eq. 7; Izard v. Izard, 2 Desaus., 309.

As it is considered important to have the judgment of the court upon the points thus ruled by me, in order that the principle of the distribution of the estate may be fixed, I have thought it best to file this preliminary report, so that the question of the construction of the will may be settled by the court.

The case came on to be heard in the Circuit Court upon exceptions duly taken to this report by the plaintiff and such of the defendants as were not the children of James and John O'Hear. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The question, as stated by the master, is this: Is Joseph, who died in the life-time of Amelia leaving no children, excluded from sharing in the estate, so that the share of Amelia shall be divided between the children of James and John—one-half to the children of James collectively and one-half to the children of John collectively; or did Joseph take a vested estate upon the death of testatrix liable to be divested upon the death of the life-tenant *leaving issue, and did such vested interest pass upon his death to his personal representative or to his devisees?

I am unable to concur with the master in his conclusion on this point. A gift to persons as a class "is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time * * *." 1 Jarm. Wills, 534 (edit. of 1880, by Linn & Co.). The gift here to the three sons, a definite number of persons, is just the same as if they had been called by name in the will. When there is a remainder to a person who is certain on an event which must happen, as the death of A, the remainder is vested. It is always contingent when the limitation over is on an event which may never happen, as the death of A without issue surviving him. The principles which distinguish vested and contingent interests are clearly set forth in McElwee v. Wheeler (10 S. C., 392), a case relied on here. Judged by these principles, the interest of Joseph was contingent.

It does not follow, however, that because it was contingent it does not now go to the personal or legal representatives of Joseph. "A contingent interest will or will not be transmissible to the personal representatives of the legatee, according to the nature of the contingency on which it is dependent," as where the contingency is a collateral event. 2 Jarm. Wills, 479-480, same edition. See also 1 Wms. Exec., 637-638. So where a testator devised to A and his heirs, and if A should die before twenty-one, then to B and his heirs. A died before twenty-one, but B died before him. Such a devise was "considered equivalent in point of interest to a contingent remainder, and consequently transmissible." 1 Fearnle Rem. 559-560.

I find in this clause no words indicating that the interest of the sons, in case of death in the life-time of the tenant for life, was at all dependent upon that fact, except in the case of their leaving children, in which event the children of the one so dying were substituted for the parent. If all had thus died leaving no children, then there would have been, upon the theory of the report, a case of intestacy as to this property, which the courts ought to avoid if it can be done on any fair interpretation of the will.

*I find nothing in the will which enables me to conclude that the word children includes grandchildren. If any child of either of the sons died in the life-time of the life-tenant, a question might possibly arise as to whether such child had a transmissible interest; but there is nothing in the case before me to raise such a question.

It therefore is ordered that one-third of the estate shall go to the personal representatives of Joseph, or to his heirs or devisees, according as it may be real or personal estate; one-third be divided amongst the children of James, and one-third amongst the children of John S., who survived the life-tenant, Amelia. It is ordered that the case be recommitted to the master with this construction of the said clause of the will and otherwise as directed by the said order of August 4, 1884.

The children of James and John O'Hear appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. Because his honor erred in overruling the report of the master that the devise to the sons of the testatrix was a devise to them as a class.

II. Because his honor erred in overruling the report of the master that the interest of a son dying in the life-time of the life-tenant was not devisable or transmissible.

III. Because his honor erred in holding that the devise to the sons was a devise to them as individuals, as if named.

IV. Because his honor erred in holding that there was nothing in the will indicating "that the interest of the sons, in case of death in the life-time of the tenant for life, was at all dependent upon that fact, except in the case of their leaving children;" whereas it is respectfully submitted that the provisions of the will, taken as a whole, show the intention of the testatrix to have been clear to provide for her sons as a class, the individuals to take to be ascertained upon the death of the life-tenant without issue, and his honor should have so held.

V. Because his honor erred in not holding that the interest of Joseph F. O'Hear was but a "bare possibility," and that such interest was not devisable, transmissible, or assignable.

VI. Because his honor erred in not holding that the remain^{der}, after the death of Mrs. Amelia Hoyt, the life-tenant, should be divided equally between the children of James and the children of John surviving at that time; one-half to the children of James, and one-half to the children of John.

July 15, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This case involves the rights of certain parties (named in the pleadings) under the will of Sarah O'Hear, deceased, late of the city of Charleston. The will is set out in full in the "Case," but as the questions before the court arise more especially out of one clause thereof, it will only be necessary here to refer to that clause. The testatrix left surviving two daughters and three sons, and in the clause of the will referred to supra, she bequeathed and devised as follows: "Item. I give unto my son, Joseph F. O'Hear, my servant boy Peter, absolutely. Item. To my son, John S. O'Hear, my boy Wells, absolutely. Item. To my son, James, my boy Charles, absolutely.

Item. To my two daughters, Louisa and Amelia F. O'Hear, I leave all the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, for their own use and benefit during the term of their natural lives, and upon the death of either, leaving issue, such issue shall take their parent's share at marriage, or on arriving at age, absolutely and forever. But in default of such issue, then the property so given to go to my three sons, share and share alike, or in case of the death of any of them at that time, to and among their then surviving children; such children, collectively, taking their parent's share. It is my meaning and intention, however, *that the interest or income only, arising from the most judicious investment of the said property by my trustees, be paid to my daughters for their maintenance and support, they being allowed to select such servants as they please as attendants about them, and to choose their residence, which shall be purchased or hired, as may be deemed most advisable by a majority of my executors."

Amelia F. O'Hear, one of the life-tenants, died in 1882, leaving no issue. Her sister, Louisa, the other life-tenant, survived her, and has issue living; she is the plaintiff in this action. The three brothers of Amelia predeceased her. Joseph died in 185, unmarried, and leaving no issue. He left a will, dated August, 1852, by which he gave all of his property to his brothers and sisters, in equal division. His brothers were appointed his executors, both of whom have since died, and the defendant, Mrs. S. Isabel O'Hear, has administered de bonis non. James O'Hear died in 1864, leaving children, some of whom have since died, leaving children. John S. O'Hear died in 1875, leaving children.

Upon this state of facts the questions presented for consideration are these: 1st. Joseph, one of the brothers, having died before the life-tenant, Amelia, leaving no issue, is his estate excluded from sharing in the distribution of that portion of the estate of his mother enjoyed by Amelia for life, and shall said portion be divided between the children of James and John, one-half to each family of children? Or, did Joseph take such an interest in the estate of the testatrix as under the facts will entitle his representatives or devisees to receive the same?

The Circuit Judge, his honor, Judge Fraser, overruling the conclusions of the master, held that the representatives of Joseph, or his heirs and devisees, according as the property was real or personal, were entitled to one-third of the estate in contest, and that the children of James and John, who survived Amelia, were entitled among them, each set, to one-third, no part going to the grandchildren. The appeal questions this holding, the appellants contending that the remainder after the death of Amelia should have been divided equally between the children of James and John, surviving at that time, that is, one-half to the children of James, and one-half to the children of John, Joseph having died unmarried and without issue, before the death of Amelia; and, therefore, in the opinion of the appellants, not entitled to any portion of said estate.

It is conceded on both sides that the interest bequeathed and devised to the sons of the testatrix upon the termination of the life estate given to her daughters, was a contingent interest as contradistinguished from a vested one, the contingency being the death of the life-tenants, one or both, without issue surviving. That this is a correct construction, we think is fully sustained by our recent cases of McElwee v. Wheeler, 10 S. C., 392; Boykin v. Boykin, 21 S. C., 513.

The appellant, however, contends that the interest to the sons was given them as a class, and that only such of the sons as were in existence at the time of the happening of the contingency, could take the share of such as may have died in the life-time of the tenant for life, being subject to the other provisions of the will, which directed that said share should go to their surviving children; and that, inasmuch as no one of the class was in existence at the death of Amelia, the life tenant, all of her brothers (the sons) having predeceased her, the contingency never happened upon which either of these sons was to take, and that under these circumstances such of the children of the deceased sons as survived become entitled under that provision of the will, which declared that in case of the death of either of the sons before the death of the life-tenant, leaving children, they should take their parent's share. There is a class of cases in which, when property is given by will to be distributed among a class of persons at some future time, or on some future contingency, all are let in who come into existence before the time or the happening of the event; provided they be in existence at the happening of said event, and no one but such as may be in existence at that time can take. This case, however, in our opinion, does not fall within that class.

As was said by the Circuit Judge, quoting from 1 Jarm. Wills, 534: "A gift to persons as a class is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time." Here the gift was not to a body of persons uncertain in number, and to be ascertained at a future time; on the contrary, it was to the three sons of the testator alive and in being at the time of the execution of the will, and the direction was that the property should go to these three sons, share and share alike, upon the death of the life-tenant, leaving no issue. Certainly it could not be contended that if the testatrix had named the sons, each to be entitled to a share upon the contingency specified, that in such case the doctrine as to the gifts to a class would apply, excluding such as were not in existence at the happening of the contingency, and giving the whole estate to such only as were then in being; and yet the language used seems to us to exclude the idea of a class as fully as if the sons had been named individually. The testatrix had but the three sons, and among these three she directed the estate to be divided upon the happening of the contingency mentioned, share and share alike; calling them by name could not have emphasized the idea that they were to take individually, and not as a class, more strongly.

Our conclusion is, that each of the sons was a contingent remainderman, to the extent of one-third of the property given to the life-tenants. See cases of McMeekin, admr., v. Brummet, 2 Hill Eq., 638, and Pritchett et al. v. Cannon et al., 10 Rich. Eq., 394.

The important question, however, what became of the interest of Joseph on his death before the life-tenant leaving no children? still remains. Had he left children, as did his brothers upon their death, the provision in the will giving the shares of the deceased sons to their children would have met the case; but, as we have said, he died leaving no issue. It appears somewhat anomalous that a contingent remainder which never, in fact, vests in the remainderman during his life, should yet be transmissible to his representatives. But that there are such contingent remainders is well settled. There are several kinds of contingent remainders classified by the character of the contingency upon which they are based. Mr. Fearne divides them into four classes. It is not necessary, however, to discuss all of these. It is sufficient for our present purpose to say that where the existence of the remainderman himself at the time of the event upon which the remainder is to take effect does not constitute the contingency, then the remainder is transmissible. A testator may make it one of the conditions of the limitation that the remainderman shall survive the first taker; but where he fails to do this and places the remainder upon some other event or contingency, wholly disconnected from the survivorship of the remainderman, the fact of his non-survivorship will not defeat the remainder, for the obvious reason that the testator has not so declared and directed. McMeekin, admr., v. Brummet, and Pritchett et al. v. Cannon et al., supra; Fearne Rem., 559, 560.

It is true that the will here defeats the remainder to such of the sons as may die in the life-time of the tenant for life, leaving children, by substituting in such an event the children of such son in the place of the parent. But there is nothing in the will which indicates a purpose that the remainder shall be defeated simply by the death of the sons before the death of the life-tenant. Nor is the remainder either expressly or impliedly made dependent upon the existence of the sons at the death of the life-tenant. On the contrary, it is made dependent wholly upon the event of the life-tenant dying without issue, which event having happened as to Amelia, the remainder takes effect, the share of Joseph being transmissible, and the shares of the other two sons going to their children as by the will directed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[1. Physicians and Surgeons ¶16.]

Partners in the practice of medicine are all liable for an injury to a patient resulting from the negligence, either of omission or commission, of any one of the partners within the scope of their partnership business; but for an injury resulting from the act of one partner outside of the common business, the offending partner is alone responsible. Before Wallace, J., Barnwell, November, 1883.

This was an action by E. W. Hyrne against J. D. Erwin and C. W. Erwin, partners in the practice of medicine, commenced in December, 1882, to recover $5,000, damages for negligent and unskilful conduct in the setting and treatment of plaintiff's broken arm. The testimony shows that the arm was set on the night of December 6, 1881, by Dr. C. W. Erwin, who visited the patient again the next day, but not afterwards until December 10, when sent for, and again the next day, when he took his father, Dr. J. D. Erwin, with him, who then, for the first time, saw the plaintiff. The negligence alleged was in the treatment of the plaintiff's arm by the younger Erwin, before his father was called in, and in the failure to visit between the 7th and 10th of December.

The testimony for the plaintiff tended to show negligence by Dr. C. W. Erwin on these occasions; the testimony for the defendant tended to show that the surgeon had done all that approved practice required.

The opinion of this court states all of the charge that is furnished in the Brief. The exceptions are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert Aldrich, for appellant.

Mr. J. J. Brown, contra.

July 15, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The appellants, father and son, are partners in the practice of medicine in Barnwell County. In December, 1881, the plaintiff had his arm broken by the falling of his horse, and the defendants were called in. Both attended in the first instance, but the case was principally managed afterwards by Dr. C. W. Erwin, the son, both, however, attending occasionally.¹ The plaintiff alleged that the attention given was so negligent and unskilful that he lost the use of his arm; that he is no longer able to engage in his accustomed pursuits; that he has been, and still is, disabled from attending to his ordinary business, whereby he has heretofore obtained support and maintenance for himself and family, to his damage $5,000. The case was heard by Judge Wallace and resulted in a verdict of $1,000 for the plaintiff. The appeal assigns error to the presiding judge at two stages of the case: the first involves his charge to the jury, and the second his refusal to grant a new trial on motion made on the minutes of the court after verdict.

The portion of the charge excepted to was as follows: The judge said "that when two gentlemen associate themselves together in the practice of medicine or law or any other scientific profession, each becomes surety for the other that he will faithfully and properly perform his engagements. And if either fail to display reasonable care, diligence, and skill in the performance of his duties, both are liable." He further said: "That if the jury believed the plaintiff and his witnesses as they testified on the point of the setting of the arm by Dr. C. W. Erwin, and the plaintiff's complaint at the time that the bandages were too tight, the great swelling of the arm and the discoloration of the fingers the next day, the earnest request of the plaintiff and his wife to him to loosen the bandages, his refusal and leaving the patient in this condition, and not returning for several days, when mortification had ensued in consequence, then this made out a case of wanton injury, in which event the defendant, C. W. Erwin, alone would be liable."

¹To prevent misapprehension, I desire to say that in the statement of facts, it was not intended to convey the idea that Dr. James Erwin attended in the first instance, as the testimony shows that he never saw the case until the Sunday after the accident, which occurred on Tuesday.—W. D. SIMPSON, C. J.

When these two portions of the charge are considered together, the law laid down by the Circuit Judge seems to have been this, to wit, that when two or more physicians are practising their profession in partnership, reasonable care, diligence, and skill on the part of each in the performance of their duties is guaranteed *by each and all of them, and if either fails to exercise such reasonable care, diligence, and skill in the management of a case entrusted to his care, resulting in damages, all will be responsible. If, however, a wanton case of mismanagement is made out against one alone, and damage result from this, the others would not be responsible. Was this error? Certainly not such an error, if any, as to give cause of complaint to either of the defendants. It did no harm to the younger Dr. C. W. Erwin, and it opened a door of escape for the elder Dr. J. D. Erwin, to which, according to strict law, it may be, he was not entitled.

The law applicable to such cases, as we understand it, is the same as that which obtains in the general doctrine of agency; it applies, too, in the relation of master and servant, and like cases. It is this: In a partnership the parties associated are, in one sense, agents of each other, and the act of one within the scope of the partnership or business is the act of each and all, as fully so as if each was present and participating in all that is done. And each guarantees that within the scope of the common business reasonable care, diligence, and skill shall be displayed by the one in charge. Or at least that a failure on the part of one thus to exercise such reasonable care, diligence, and skill is a failure in law of each and all, and an injury resulting from such failure is the act of all. Where, however, the injury results from a wanton or wilful act of one of the parties committed outside of the agency or common business, and not from negligence or the failure to bestow reasonable care, diligence, and skill within the agency, then a different principle applies, to wit, that the party doing the act and causing the injury is alone responsible—the distinction between the two cases growing out of the fact that the relation which the party doing the act bears to the others, is different in the one case from the other. In the first his act being within the scope of the business, he acts both for himself and as agent of the others; in the other his act, being beyond and outside of the scope of the business, he acts for himself.

It will be observed, then, that two things are necessary to make the principal responsible for the acts of the agent, under the doctrine of respondent superior, and the same doctrine applies *to partnerships of the character under discussion. First, there must be negligence or a want of reasonable care, diligence, and skill; and, second, an injury must result from this. If either of these is absent, no responsibility attaches to any one, because it requires the presence of both to give rise to a cause of action. Now, an injury in a special case may be the result of an omission on the part of the agent or the party in charge to bestow proper care in doing what he is authorized and attempting to do. Or it may be produced by a direct act on his part within the scope of the business, which act reasonable care and the possession of reasonable skill would have forbidden. Or it may be produced by an act altogether outside of the business and not intended or calculated to further and advance said business. In the first two classes of cases the principal is liable, because here is negligence, the want of proper care within the scope of the business, and resulting in injury. And it makes no difference whether this negligence results from inattention, incompetency, or wantonness. But in the last class of cases, where the party causing the injury has stepped beyond the agency or common business, and committed an act either from wantonness or other motive, the act is his, and he alone can be made responsible. These principles, we think, will be found to be sustained by Story on Partnership, § 166, and the cases and authority cited there; by Cooley on Torts, and Wood on Master and Servant, 593, et seq. The charge of the judge is possibly susceptible of the construction that a wanton act of one partner, even within the scope of the business, would relieve the other parties, as he pointed out no distinction between such an act done within and one done without. But if this be so, yet, as we have said above, neither of the defendants could complain for the reason given above.

The appellant complains, however, of the use of the word "surety" by the judge. It is true, as argued by appellant, that this precise term has not been employed in any of the cases involving the relation of partners to each other or in the elementary books on the subject, but we see no error in its use here.

It certainly did not intensify, or make more rigid or binding, the responsibility of parties, growing out of partnerships, than if it had been omitted. In fact, its tendency was rather er to modify *that responsibility, as sureties on a note might possibly be released sometimes when partners would not be.

This brings us to the question of the refusal to grant a new trial. Under our practice, governed by the code, motions for new trials must always, in the first instance, be made to the court below, either on the minutes of the judge or upon a case or exceptions made. Such motions should be based upon an error of law affecting the verdict or upon error involving the facts, such as insufficient testimony, excessive damage, and the like. If based upon errors of fact, the judgment of the Circuit Judge is final. There can be no appeal to this court in such case, for the reason that this court under the constitution has no appellate power in a jury case, its only province being to correct errors of law in such cases. See Brickman v. S. C. R. R. Co., 8 S. C., 173; Steele v. C., C. & A. R. R. Co., 11 Id., 589. If, however, the motion below is based upon an alleged error of law occurring in the charge, or otherwise in the progress of the trial, it may be the subject of appeal to this court, and it is only in such cases that a motion below for a new trial can be reviewed here.

Now, was the motion below in this case made upon an alleged error as to facts or an error as to the law? The first ground as found in the case is "that no actual damage being proved, there was no evidence upon which to base a verdict." The second ground starts out with the statement that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence in any sense and more especially in this—then follows a particular specification of the facts intended to show that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence. The third and last is the general ground that the verdict of the jury is otherwise contrary to law, which as is well understood raises no question. It will be seen at once, then, that the motion below having been based entirely upon alleged errors of fact, there is nothing in the appeal as to this motion within the cognizance of this court, under the code, supra.

As to the point which was so earnestly pressed by appellant's counsel upon us, to wit, that there being actual damage alleged in the complaint nor proved, the verdict for consequential damages could not as a matter of law be sustained, it is sufficient to say that there does not seem to have been any ruling of the Circuit Judge upon that question from anything that appears in the "Case." Nothing in reference to it appears in the charge, nor was there a request made that the judge should instruct the jury upon it. Nor do we see how, after verdict upon the motion for a new trial upon the ground stated, it could be raised as a question of law so as to reach this court, inasmuch as the grounds of that motion, as we have already seen, involved nothing more than a plain question of fact, to wit, whether the verdict of the jury, both as to the fact of negligence and of damage, was sustained by the evidence. The judge, in refusing the motion for a new trial, must have held that the evidence was sufficient as to both of these questions, and we are not at liberty to go behind this finding and consider a question of law which might or might not be applicable in case the finding was reversed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

July 15, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. There is but one question in this case, and that arises upon a deed of which the following is a copy, to wit:

"State of South Carolina, Darlington County.

"Know all men by these presents that I, William King, Sr., of State and district aforesaid, for and in consideration of the love and affection I bear my son, James King, as well as the sum of ten dollars to me paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, sold, and released, and by these presents grant, bargain, sell, and release unto the said James King that tract or parcel of land where he now resides [describing the land by metes and bounds], supposed to contain three hundred acres, more or less, together with all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging or in any wise incident or appertaining; to have and to hold, all and singular, the said premises before mentioned, unto the said James King, his heirs and assigns forever. And I do hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors, and assigns to warrant and forever defend, all and singular, the said premises unto the said James King and his heirs against myself, my heirs, and against every person lawfully claiming, or to claim, the same or any part thereof. trust, nevertheless, for the benefit of the heirs of his body, and not subject to any debts now or hereafter to be contracted by him, and at his death to be equally divided between the heirs of his body.

"Witness my hand and seal this the twentieth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty, and the eighty-fourth year of American independence.

"(Signed) ^{his} William X King.

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of ^{mark}

"T. C. Law and Albert J. Law."

James King, the son, took possession under this deed; or, as it appears, he was already in possession at the execution of the deed, but how and upon what terms is not stated. He died in 1883, leaving the defendants, his heirs at law, in possession. During his lifetime, a judgment was obtained against him by McCown & Bass, under which the land was sold, after first setting off a homestead of a portion thereof to said James King, which was not included in the levy and sale. At the sale, the plaintiff became the purchaser and received titles from the sheriff in 1882 for two hundred acres, more or less, levied on and sold as the property of James King, under execution in favor of McCown & Bass.

Under these circumstances, the action below was brought by McCown for the possession of the land and for damages for unlawfully withholding the same by the defendants. The defendants, taking the ground that James King acquired no interest under the deed aforesaid from his father through whom plaintiff claimed, offered no testimony on the trial. The case was heard by his honor, Judge Witherspoon, who, holding that James King had a leviable interest in the land under the deed from his father, which had been sold and purchased by the plaintiff, adjudged possession to plaintiff with costs. His honor did not state in terms in the decree pronounced by him the precise character of the estate which in his opinion had passed to James King under the deed in question. But he used the following language in reference thereto, to wit: "The defendants, as heirs of the body, can only claim the land by succession from their ancestor, James King, and in his right subject to his debts," from which the ap*pellants have assumed, in their grounds of appeal, that his honor held that James took a fee thereunder, which no doubt was the construction placed by Judge Witherspoon on said deed.

The appeal raises the single question of the interest of James King under this deed. It is admitted that the execution of McCown & Bass was levied on this land as the property of James King, that plaintiff was the purchaser at sheriff's sale, and that he has the sheriff's deed conveying the same to him. But appellants controvert the construction of the Circuit Judge of the King deed and seek to have it reversed, claiming that his honor, instead of holding that James King took a fee to himself, should have held (in the language of the fourth exception) "that James took an estate in the land conveyed by the deed from William King in trust for his children, and that he had no other interest whatever therein."

The object of construction as to deeds—in fact, as to all papers in contest before the courts—is to reach the intention of the parties, because it is this which must control: otherwise the contract would be the contract of the court and not of the parties. The ascertainment, however, of this intention is not to be had by conjecture, or by what seems to be natural justice, or what the court would have done under the circumstances, but it must be had by the application of the rules of construction laid down in the books, and which the wisdom of the past has established as the best means of reaching the true meaning and intent of such papers. Whatever the application of these rules evolves, nothing more, nothing less, must be regarded and declared to be the intent of the matter under construction, whether it be in consonance with our notions of what it ought to be or not. Now, the application of these rules to the deed in question, we think, results in a different conclusion from that reached by the Circuit Judge.

Take the deed as a whole, and seek the intention of the grantor (William King) through the language employed when reading it as an entirety, and there is no beneficial interest, either equitable or legal, conveyed to James King, as far as we can see; on the contrary, he seems to be expressly excluded by the expression that in no event is the property to be made liable *for his debts now or hereafter to be contracted. The deed is somewhat inartificially drawn, in the fact that the trust clause is separated from the granting clause by the interposition of the warranty; but this may have been, and no doubt was, accidental; yet the deed must be read as a whole, giving effect to each part, but in general harmony if possible. Now, to do this, let the trust clause be attached to the granting clause, and read in connection therewith. It will then read as follows: "Have granted, bargained, sold, and released, and by these presents grant, bargain, sell, and release unto the said James King that tract or parcel where he now resides, &c., to have and to hold all and singular the said premises mentioned unto the said James King, his heirs and assigns for ever. In trust, nevertheless, for the benefit of the heirs of his body, and not to be subject to any debts now or hereafter to be contracted by him, and at his death to be equally divided between the heirs of his body."

When thus read, and it is legitimate to transpose these clauses in this way, there is certainly no beneficial interest expressly conferred or conveyed to James King, but the estate is in trust for the heirs of his body, he being made the trustee simply. Suppose the language had been to James King, his heirs and assigns for ever, in trust, nevertheless, for the benefit of his children, and at his death to be equally divided between his children, could it be successfully contended in such a case that he would take a fee subject to his debts? We think not. Would he be entitled to any beneficial interest under such a deed? Could such a deed be construed in any other way than as conveying the estate (whatever it might be) directly to the children through the operation of the statute of uses (there being nothing for the trustee to do) in common until his death, then to be divided equally between them?

Now, can the words "heirs of the body," as used here, be properly construed to mean children, and therefore intended as words of purchase, indicating who were to take under and by virtue of the deed, or must they be understood as defining the quantity of the estate granted to James King, and, therefore, as words of limitation? These words, when used in the latter sense, to wit, of words of limitation defining the quantity of an *estate, always follow and are attached to terms granting an estate to the ancestor, as where an estate is given to one and the heirs of his body. Here these terms are words of limitation and indicate that the grantee takes a fee conditional at common law. In other words, they are used for no other purpose but to point out how much and what quantity of the fee has been given to the grantee. So, too, under the rule in Shelley's Case, where an estate is given to one for life, then to the heirs of his body, these terms have been held to enlarge the life estate to a fee conditional, being regarded as words of limitation instead of purchase. But where they are not attached to the grant of a previous estate the quantity of which is to be ascertained, there is nothing for them to operate upon, and it cannot be said that in such case they were used as words of limitation.

Now, in the case before the court, could these words have been used to define the quantity of an estate given to James King? Before thus concluding, we must see that a beneficial estate of some kind was intended for him in the deed. Was there any such estate intended for him? By the terms of the deed a full fee is conveyed to James, the words heirs and assigns forever being used, but this was certainly not for his benefit, because, if so, why afterwards was the term heirs of the body used, words which, if used in connection with the estate granted to James, would cut down the fee already granted to him to a fee conditional? There is certainly no estate expressly granted to James, the quantity of which might be ascertained under the light of these words. There is no express estate to him and the heirs of his body, nor is there an express estate to him for life, and then to the heirs of his body, either of which would be a fee conditional, the first under the general law, and the other under the rule in Shelley's Case. But the estate is to him in fee absolute, in trust, however, for the heirs of his body.

There, then, being no beneficial estate to James in express terms to which these words, "heirs of the body," could be attached indicating its quantity, can an estate be raised in him by implication? This must have been the theory of the decree. Inasmuch as the deed directed that no division of the estate between the heirs of the body should take place until the death of *James, and no express grant thereof during the life of James awaiting the final division at his death; and inasmuch, further, as the fee was conveyed to James, there is some ground for the position that the grantor intended that he, James, should enjoy the estate for his life, and then, at his death, the division was to be made between the heirs of his body. Under this view the deed would be read as follows, to wit, to James during his life, and at his death to be equally divided between the heirs of his body. We do not think that this is the proper construction of the deed; but concede that it is, what would be the result as to the quantity of the estate to which James would be entitled? Under the rule in Shelley's Case, as we have seen, where an estate of freehold is given to the first taker as an estate for life, and then to the heirs of his body, with nothing more, these latter words would be construed as words of limitation and not of purchase, and the first taker would take a fee conditional, which would be subject to his debts.

But it is said in several cases, it is always open to inquiry whether the words "heirs" or "heirs of the body" are used in their proper technical sense, or in a more inaccurate sense, to denote children, issue, or next of kin. Bailey v. Patterson, 3 Rich. Eq., 158; 2 Jarm. Wills, 13. And this rule does not apply if enough can be found in the deed to show clearly that the grantor did not intend the words heirs of the body as words of limitation defining the quantity of the estate to the first taker, but that he intended them as words of purchase, indicating that the heirs of the body were to take directly under the deed, and not by succession or inheritance. Holeman v. Fort, 3 Strobb. Eq., 66 [51 Am. Dec. 665]; Darblison v. Beaumont, 1 P. Wms., 230; Thomas v. Bennet, 2 Id., 340; Simms v. Garrot, 1 Dev. & Batt. Eq., 393; Bailey v. Patterson, 3 Rich. Eq., 158, supra.

Now, we think that the term "heirs of the body," as used in this deed, even though a life estate be determined to James, was not used in their technical sense as words of limitation, but was used in the sense of children, and was intended to denote a class of persons who were to take as purchasers. In the case of Bailey v. Patterson, where Ch. Dunkin, who decided the case on Circuit, and who held that the words "heirs of the body" there *meant children, said: I think the words "to be equally divided among them" also indicate that the words were used in their ordinary, and not technical, sense. The Appeal Court, per curiam, concurred. So that, whether we construe this deed as a conveyance directly to the heirs of the body of James, executed through James by the statute, or as creating by implication a life estate to him, and then to the heirs of his body, to be equally divided between them at his death, it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to hold that James had a fee which passed to the plaintiff by his purchase at sheriff's sale. In no event could he have taken more than a life estate, and admitting that this passed to the plaintiff by his purchase, yet James having died before this action, the plaintiff would have no standing in court by virtue of that interest.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

[1. Corporations ◊338.]

A corporation organized in January, 1882, under the act of 1874, providing for the granting of certain charters (15 Stat., 557), was subject to the requirements of chap. LXIII. of the General Statutes of 1872, which made the directors personally responsible for the debts of the company, if they failed to submit to the stockholders a statement of the capital stock paid in and of the assets of the company, or to publish such statement; and, in action by a creditor of the company against the directors individually, the Circuit Judge properly refused a non-suit, there being some evidence of such failures.

[2. Bills and Notes ◊370; Corporations, ◊354.]

In action by a bona fide endorsee for value before due of a promissory note against the maker, its consideration cannot be inquired into; and the note in this case being, for this reason, a binding debt of the company, and the directors being personally liable under the statute and the facts of this case for the debts of the company, the note is their debt also, and they cannot, when sued thereon, question its consideration.

The directors were required by law to make certain annual statements to the stockholders and to publish the same, under penalty of a personal liability for the debts of the corporation.

Held, that the state*ment and publication should have been made, whether the stockholders met in annual convention or not.

[4. Evidence *Ⓒ*164.]

The character of a corporation should be determined by its charter, and oral testimony upon the point is inadmissible.

Before Fraser, J., Richland, April, 1884.

This was an action by H. D. Cooke and Lester A. Bartlett, copartners under the firm name of H. D. Cooke, Jr., & Co., against Samuel A. Pearce, W. T. C. Bates, A. P. Butler, and A. D. Goodwyn, directors of "The South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company," a corporation holding the following charter:

"State of South Carolina.

"Know all men, that in accordance with an act entitled 'An act to provide for granting of certain charters,' approved the twentieth day of February, A. D. 1874, that on the seventeenth day of January, A. D. 1882, a majority of the stockholders of the South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company having by petition applied for a charter for the said South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company: Therefore, know all men by these presents, that J. P. Richardson, R. M. Sims, Jno. Bratton, A. P. Butler, J. D. Neel, T. C. Brown, J. A. Sligh, S. A. Pearce, J. N. Huffman, A. D. Goodwyn, John Taylor, F. B. Orchard, citizens of the State of South Carolina, together with such other persons as now are, or may hereafter be associated with them, and their successors, be, and they are hereby made and created, a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of the South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company; and by said name they are hereby made capable in law to carry on and conduct the business of manufacturing, using, and applying, and granting the right to others to use, manufacture, and apply the Briggs' cotton gin saw cleaner and brush, patented October 28, A. D. 1879, and the various industries connected therewith, and to exercise all the powers suitable and proper for that purpose, and to hold, purchase, receive, work, sell, mortgage, lease, enjoy, and retain to them, their successors and assigns, lands, tenements, goods, and chattels, of whatsoever kind, as may be deemed by them conducive to the objects and interests of said corpora*tion. The said corporation, by its corporate name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded," &c. * * *

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the court at Columbia, this twenty-third day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, and in the 106th year of the independence of the United States of America.

"E. R. Arthur, C. C. P. & G. S."

This charter was duly accepted by the company at a meeting of the stockholders held February 25, 1882.

At the trial, defendants moved for leave to amend their answer by inserting an allegation that on two occasions they had made an effort to obtain a stockholders' meeting, but had failed. The judge refused to allow the amendment, because he deemed such an allegation to be immaterial. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

The judge's charge to the jury was as follows:

Many allegations of the complaint are admitted by the answer. It is admitted that the note set forth in the complaint was executed by the company of which these defendants were the directors. And I charge you that possession of the note by the plaintiffs is prima facie evidence of ownership, and that they are the holders thereof for a valuable consideration. In an action on the note by the plaintiffs against the maker, it would be incompetent for the latter, upon the plea of original want or failure of consideration, to inquire into the consideration of the note, without some notice of failure of consideration, of which there is no evidence. Such negotiable paper implies a consideration, and between the maker and endorsee cannot be impeached. And so I charge you that, in the present action, it is equally incompetent for these defendants to inquire into the consideration of the note upon which the action is based. I have therefore excluded all evidence in reference to the consideration of the note. With that you have nothing to do.

If the defendants were directors, they had no right to resign, as stated by the witness for defendants, so as to relieve themselves of any liability. And if they resigned at any time short of the completion of the twelve months, they are liable for the *non-performance of any of the duties which the law requires of the directors during that period.

Now, the defendants are alleged to be liable upon several grounds:

1. That a portion of the capital stock of the company, greater in amount than its indebtedness to the plaintiff, was withdrawn and divided among the stockholders of the company with the consent of the defendants. Now, I do not hesitate to charge you that there is no evidence whatsoever of this allegation.

2. That before the maturity of the note, and during the administration of the defendants as directors, the debts of the company exceeded the amount of the capital stock paid in by an amount greater than the amount of its indebtedness to plaintiffs. This is altogether a question of fact, to be decided by the jury. I therefore leave it to you upon the evidence which you have heard.

3. That the defendants have failed to make the annual statement to the stockholders, and to make publication of same in the newspapers, as required by law. It is admitted that the statement and publication were not made. I am not prepared to say that the General Statutes of 1882 would not relieve the defendants from the obligation to publish the statement. You need not, therefore, consider the question of publication, and you may assume it to be unnecessary, as the case must turn on the failure of the defendants to make the annual statement to the stockholders. If the defendants were directors, they were bound to make this annual statement. This statement is a great safeguard against the mismanagement of the corporation by its directors. Whether these defendants have reasons or excuses for not making this statement cannot affect the case. The legislature has required them to make it, and attached the penalty unconditionally upon their failure so to do. I therefore charge you that if they have failed in this, they are liable, no matter what may be their excuses.

The only remaining question is, whether this company was a manufacturing corporation. This is a question of law. If the charter which has been proved is the charter under which this company organized and operated, then I charge you, as matter of law, that it was a manufacturing corporation.

The only material question for your consideration is whether the charter proved is the charter of this company.

If you shall find for the plaintiffs, you can only find the amount of the note and interest. The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover against these defendants the amount of the judgment recovered by the plaintiffs against the company.

The defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

The defendants except to the rulings of his honor, T. B. Fraser, presiding judge, upon the following grounds:

1. Because his honor erred in ruling that the consideration of the note described in the complaint could not be inquired into, and in excluding the testimony of the witnesses, S. A. Pearce and J. P. Richardson, as to the same.

2. Because his honor erred in ruling that testimony in support of any efforts on the part of the directors to obtain a meeting of the stockholders of the "South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company" for the purpose of submitting to such meeting a statement of the financial condition of said company irrelevant; and in excluding the testimony of the witnesses, S. A. Pearce and J. P. Richardson, as to the same.

3. Because his honor erred in ruling that the nature of the business in which the "South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company" was engaged could not be shown by parol, and in excluding the testimony of the witnesses, S. A. Pearce and J. P. Richardson, as to the same.

4. Because his honor erred in refusing to allow the defendants to amend their answer as requested.

5. Because his honor erred in refusing the defendants' motion for a non-suit.

The defendants further except to the charge of the presiding judge upon the following grounds:

1. Because his honor erred in charging the jury, "that in the present action it is equally incompetent for these defendants to inquire into the consideration of the note upon which the action is based."

2. Because his honor erred in excluding all evidence in reference to the consideration of the note.

*3. Because his honor erred in charging the jury, "if the defendants were directors, they had no right to resign as stated by the witness for defendant, so as to relieve themselves of any liability."

4. Because his honor erred in charging the jury, "if the directors resigned at any time short of the completion of the twelve months, they are liable for the non-performance of any of the duties which the law requires of the directors during that period."

5. Because his honor erred in charging the jury, "if the defendants were directors, they were bound to make this annual statement."

6. Because his honor erred in charging the jury, "whether these defendants have reasons or excuses for not making this statement cannot affect the case. The legislature has required them to make it, and attached the penalty unconditionally upon their failure so to do. I therefore charge you that if they have failed in this, they are liable, no matter what may be their excuses."

7. Because his honor erred in charging the jury, "the only remaining question is, whether this company was a manufacturing company. This is a question of law. If the charter which has been proved is the charter under which this company organized and operated, then I charge you as matter of law that it was a manufacturing company. The only material question for your consideration is, whether the charter proved is the charter of the company."

The plaintiffs appealed upon the following assignments of error:

1. That his honor charged the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover the amount of the judgment in their favor against "The South Carolina Cotton Gin Saw Improvement Company" and interest, but were restricted to recovery at most of the amount of note on which said judgment was based and interest.

2. That his honor refused to charge that if the defendants were directors, they were bound by statute to publish as well as make the annual statement, and withdrew from the jury all consideration of the liability of the defendants consequent upon the failure to make such publication.

*Messrs. Bachman & Youmans, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Clark & Muller, for defendants.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In January, 1882, the defendants, appellants, with others, obtained a charter from the clerk of the court for Richland County, acting under an act to provide for granting charters, approved 1874, for the incorporation of the "South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company." Of this company the defendants, with one J. N. Huffman, since deceased, were elected directors in January, 1882. On the thirteenth of April thereafter the company made its promissory note for $750, payable to the order of J. H. Sypher, president of the "American Cotton Gin Saw Cleaning Company," on the first of November, 1882. This note was afterwards endorsed before due to the plaintiffs, who, in July, 1883, recovered judgment thereon against said "South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company" for the sum of $878.77, which judgment, and the execution thereon, remain unsatisfied. In the latter part of February, 1883, the defendants resigned their office as directors aforesaid.

The action below was brought, alleging liability on the part of the defendants on the following grounds: 1st. That before the maturity of the note, and during the administration of the defendants as directors, the debt of the company exceeded the amount of the capital stock paid in by an amount greater than the amount of its indebtedness to the plaintiffs. 2d. That a portion of the capital stock of the company greater in amount than its indebtedness to the plaintiffs, was withdrawn and divided among the stockholders of the company, with the consent of the defendants. 3d. That the defendants, as directors, failed to make to the stockholders of said company the annual statement, setting forth the amount of capital stock paid in, and the general assets of said company, or to publish the same in the newspapers, as required by law.

The defendants relied on three defences: 1st. A denial that this company was a manufacturing company. 2d. A general *denial of allegation contained in the grounds above, 1 and 2. They admit, however, that they did not submit the statement or publish the same referred to in ground 3, but allege that before the expiration of the year after organization they resigned their office and severed their official connection with said company. 3d. They allege a total failure of consideration in the note.

At the trial, his honor, Judge Fraser, presiding, refused a motion for non-suit, and during the progress of the trial ruled that testimony as to failure of consideration was incompetent, and he excluded certain witnesses offered to that end. He also excluded testimony offered as to the inability of the defendant directors to obtain a stockholders' meeting for the purpose of making a statement of the financial condition of the company, and also parol testimony offered to show the nature of the business of the company, whether manufacturing or not, and he refused to allow the defendants to amend their answer, as requested, which refusals were excepted to, and have been made grounds of appeal. In addition, the judge charged that the consideration of the note could not be inquired into; that the directors could not, by resigning, relieve themselves of the necessity of making the annual statement referred to; that they could have no excuse for said failure; and, further, that whether the said company was a manufacturing company, was a question of law dependent on the construction of the charter—to all of which the appellants have assigned error in the appeal. The jury found verdict for the plaintiffs, but under the charge of the judge, they found for the amount of the note, and interest thereon, instead of the amount of the judgment against the company. From this portion of the charge the plaintiffs have appealed, and also from the refusal of the judge to charge that the defendants were bound to publish, as well as make, the annual statement mentioned above.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the appeal involves the following questions for our consideration: 1. Should a non-suit have been granted? 2. If not, was the consideration of the note subject to inquiry on the trial? 3. Could the failure of the directors to get a meeting of the stockholders be a legal excuse for not making the annual statement required? 4. Was it error on the part of the judge to exclude testimony going to *show the character of the company, to wit, whether a manufacturing company, the judge holding that that was matter of law depending upon the charter? 5. Was it error in the judge to confine the jury to the note and interest, instead of allowing the amount of the judgment obtained thereon against the company? 6. Did the judge err in withdrawing from the jury the fact of publishing the annual statement, and restricting their investigation to the fact of making, simply, said statement to the stockholders?

1. Should the non-suit have been granted? The rule upon that subject, as established in many cases, is that where there is a total failure of evidence as to the plaintiff's cause of action, or to any material portion thereof as alleged in the complaint, the defendant has the legal right to arrest further proceedings by a non-suit. Carrier & Harris v. Dorrance, 19 S. C., 32. Was there such total failure here? The motion for non-suit was based upon two grounds: 1. That there is nothing in the act of the general assembly under which the company was incorporated, to wit, act of February 20, 1874 (15 Stat., 557), which would make the officers of the corporation responsible for the matters alleged in the complaint; nor is there any other act applicable to said company under which they could be so held responsible—in other words, that plaintiffs had no cause of action. This objection is more in the nature of a demurrer for the want of a cause of action in the facts alleged, than a motion of non-suit for a failure of evidence, and in strict practice it should have been presented in this form. We will, however, consider it as it arises.

"The South Carolina Cotton Gin Improvement Company," of which the defendants were directors, was chartered under the act of 1874 (15 Stat., 557), which is an act entitled "an act to provide for the granting of certain charters," the authority to grant such charters being therein given to the clerk of the court of the county wherein they reside, or propose to carry on business, or hold property. It is admitted that there is no express provision in this act which makes the officers of the corporation organized under charters granted by the clerk responsible, as claimed herein.

*At the time, however, that this act was passed, there were two chapters in the General Statutes of 1872, then of force, on the subject of corporations, to wit, chapter LXIII., p. 337, and chapter LXIV., p. 338. The first chapter is headed, "Of corporations organized under charters;" the second, "Of corporations organized under general statutes." These two chapters, up to the passage of the act of 1874, supra, embraced all the statute law of the State on the subject of corporations, all other acts on that subject having been repealed by the General Statutes of 1872, in which, as we have said, these two chapters were found.

After the adoption of the General Statutes of 1872, corporations could be created in one of two ways: 1. By a direct act of the general assembly granting a charter; or, 2, by the provisions of chapter LXIV., above, of said General Statutes, 1872. In other words, first, by charter moulded, shaped, and granted by special act creating the corporation; or, second, by organization without charter under chapter LXIV. The distinction is seen in the heading or title of the two chapters referred to, the first being "Of corporations organized under charters," and the second, "Of corporations organized under general statutes." In support of this, it will be observed that under chapter LXIV. there is no provision for the granting of charters by any official or other party. The act provides only for articles of agreement entered into between the parties desiring to unite together.

Now, in chapter LXIII. are found the matters upon which the plaintiffs have based their cause of action. Does that chapter apply to this company? In section 3, we find the following: "That all manufacturing companies which shall be incorporated in this State shall have all the powers and privileges, and be subject to all the duties, liabilities, and other provisions contained in sections 4 to 19, inclusive, of this chapter." Among these sections is the section upon which plaintiffs' claim is founded. It is claimed by defendants, appellants, that these sections have no application to the "Cotton Gin Improving Company," and as no such grounds of responsibility on the directors appear in chapter LXIV., nor in the act of 1874, under which said company was incorporated, the plaintiffs have no cause of action thereon, the appellants contending that these sections had application only to *the companies chartered by express act of the general assembly, this position being founded on the fact that said sections appear in the chapter which is headed, "Of corporations organized under charters," and the further fact that they do not appear in the chapter headed, "Of corporations organized under general statutes."

It should be remembered that the general statutes are mostly but the consolidation of previous acts, those touching upon cognate subjects being incorporated in separate chapters, divided into sections, each act thus incorporated still retaining, however, its original force and effect unless otherwise provided. Now, the sections referred to above, incorporated in chapter LXIII., were sections of the act of 1847 (11 Stat., 459), entitled "an act to define the terms upon which manufacturing companies shall hereafter be incorporated." This was a general act, and it applied in express terms "to all manufacturing companies thereafter to be incorporated in this State." If this act, as it originally stood in the statutes, was still a separate act, could it be doubted that it would apply here? Certainly not, if this is a manufacturing company, because then it applied to all such companies. Why should its application be limited now to only such companies as are incorporated by special act of the legislature? Can the fact that the original act in its separate form has been repealed and its sections incorporated into the general statutes have the effect of thus curtailing it? We think not.

But even if we give full effect to the exact heading of chapter LXIII., and confine its application to "corporations organized under charters," still it could not be claimed that this company would be free from its operation. Because this company is organized under a charter granted by virtue of the act of 1874, and therefore, by the express terms of the heading of chapter LXIII., comes within its provisions. And here we might say, in reference to the first ground of the plaintiffs' appeal, that it being required by one of the sections above that the directors of said company should not only make an annual statement to the stockholders, but should also publish the same, we think the Circuit Judge was in error in striking that ground from the case. True, this requirement is not found in the General Statutes of 1882, but it was the law when the debt here was contracted, and it *thereby was a part of the contract. Now, was there a total failure of evidence as to the fact whether or not a statement had been made to the stockholders, which, under the charge, becomes the main ground of fact in the case? We think there was sufficient evidence on the question to carry the case to the jury. The non-suit, therefore, was properly refused.

Was the consideration of the note a legitimate subject of inquiry? Our judgment upon this question will determine the correctness both of the rulings of the Circuit Judge during the progress of the trial as to the testimony offered by the defendants on that subject and also his charge to the jury on said subject. The note given by the company was a promissory note dated April 13, 1882, and payable at a future date. It was transferred to the plaintiffs before due. It is not necessary to cite authorities for the position that, if this action was directly upon the note by the plaintiffs and against the company, failure of consideration could not be interposed as a defence. This is familiar law. The act provides that the directors of the company, in certain contingencies (one of which is the failure to make to the stockholders an annual statement), shall be personally liable, jointly and separately, for all debts of the company then existing, &c. This act was intended to protect the creditors of the company, and wherever a creditor holds a debt against said company the act applies.

Did the plaintiffs here hold a debt against the company? They held a note which is not disputed, except these defendants allege that it was without consideration. But be that fact as it may, the company could not interpose such a defence. The note in the hands of the plaintiffs stands against the company as if founded upon the most perfect and valuable consideration. This the court is bound by law to assume and take for granted. It is certainly then a debt of the company, and being such a debt, it is also, under the act, a debt of the directors. Not by virtue of their individual contract in making the debt, when in such case the consideration might be inquired into, but because under the act they have in substance contracted to pay the debt of the company upon the happening of a certain contingency, which contingency, it is alleged, has happened in this case. We see no error in the judge's rulings or charge upon this subject.

We think the directors were bound to make the annual statement to the stockholders required by the act, whether there was an actual convention of said stockholders or not, and also that the statement should have been published as required in General Statutes of 1872, which was of force when this company was chartered.

We concur with the Circuit Judge, too, that the character of the company depended upon its charter, and was not, therefore, the subject of oral testimony.

And we think the Circuit Judge was right in restricting the verdict to the note and interest. That was the primary evidence of the debt, and, although it has been reduced to judgment against the company, yet the defendants were not parties to that proceeding, and were not bound thereby.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Barnwell, November, 1884.

This case is fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. I. L. Tobin, for appellant.

Messrs. J. J. Maher and C. C. Simms, contra.

July 18, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The pleadings are not in the case, but from the evidence and the statements of the parties, we gather substantially the following state of facts: Boston Cave died in 1880, having the legal title to three tracts of land, viz., the Hayes tract, 280 acres, the Brown tract, 181 acres, and the Thomas tract, 142 acres. He left a widow, Fanny Cave, and four sons by a former wife, viz., Alexander, David, Henry, and Jacob. He left a will by which he devised one-fifth of his estate to his widow Fanny, and the remaining four-fifths to his aforesaid sons. It appears that at the time of the death of Boston, the plaintiff, Simon Brown, held two mortgages on the aforesaid lands, one upon the parcel known as the Thomas tract, given to one Dowling, and assigned to him, and one upon the entire tract given to him. The testator was further indebted to him on note and open account, and to secure this indebtedness the four sons gave him a mortgage of their undivided interests in the land. The action originally was instituted to foreclose these three mortgages, and also to subject the one-fifth devised to Fanny, the widow, to the payment of the debts for which the sons had given their mortgage, and Fanny, as one of the devisees, was made a party. The adult defendants did not answer. It was referred to the master to ascertain the amount due, &c. He made his report, which was confirmed.

At this stage of the proceeding Fanny Cave put in an answer, *setting up a claim for dower in all the lands, subject to the Dowling mortgage, which was executed before her marriage with Boston. Whereupon the four sons also answered, resisting the claim of dower by their stepmother, except as to one-fifth of the land, in respect to which they admitted her right, subject to the Dowling mortgage. This substantially changed the nature of the action, and made it really a claim for dower on the part of the widow, Fanny. Upon this issue the allegations on the part of the sons were, that the several parcels of land (though legal title in Boston) were bought by Boston and themselves together, and were paid for by the five together, each contributing one-fifth of the purchase money, with the mutual understanding that the titles should be taken in Boston's name for their equal benefit as tenants in common; that they occupied and used the land in common; each holding a several possession and planting separately, and that such possession was held under said agreement from the time of the several purchases to the death of Boston, the testator. They claimed that Boston held the legal title in trust for them as equitable tenants in common with him to the extent of their several undivided shares, and that they were entitled to partition, but as against the creditor they did not insist upon that right. They did, however, insist that Fanny Cave intermarried with Boston after the lands had been purchased and the parties were in possession under said agreement, and therefore any inchoate right of dower which may have accrued upon the marriage was subject to their rights as tenants in common, and that the dower should be limited to the undivided fifth part of the land, which was the share of Boston. In this new phase of the case, it was again referred to the master to take the testimony in relation to the claim of dower, which is all printed in the Brief.

The cause came on for hearing before Judge Hudson, who found as matter of fact, "that Boston Cave and his four sons were the joint purchasers of the several tracts of land involved in this controversy, although the title was taken in the name of the father. They labored in common and purchased the land in common, but mortgaged and contracted in the name of Boston Cave. There is abundant evidence to sustain this conclusion, *exclusive of the testimony of the sons, which is, I think, excluded under section 400 of the code. That the debts for which Boston gave mortgages prior to his marriage, were really the debts as well of his sons by his first wife," &c.; and as matter of law he held as follows: "In a Court of Equity, therefore, this real estate must be regarded as belonging, one-fifth to Boston Cave's estate, and one-fifth to each of the four sons. The widow, therefore, of Boston Cave will take dower in the share of her deceased husband, but subject to one-fifth of the liens created thereon by Boston Cave prior to his marriage. Now, as all the lands must be sold under the mortgages in this suit, and consequently the widow must take dower in the proceeds, so to speak, the only mode of assessment will be to take one-fifth of the entire proceeds of the sale of the lands, then subtract therefrom the one-fifth of the amount of the mortgage liens (Dowling) existing on said lands prior to Boston's marriage. This will leave the estate of which she is endowed. Of this net sum she is entitled to the one-sixth, plus the interest thereon since her husband's death," &c.

From this decree the widow, Fanny Cave, appeals to this court upon the grounds: 1. Because the testimony does not prove the existence of a trust. 2. Because the testimony does not show that the purchase money, or any definite portion thereof, was paid by the alleged cestuis que trust at the time of the purchase. 3. Because his honor erred in permitting parol proof to show that the purchase was made for the benefit of, or on account of, the alleged cestuis que trust, they having made no payment at the time of the purchase, which is the foundation of such a trust. 4. Because his honor erred in holding, substantially, that after advances or funds subsequently furnished can, in the law, create a resulting trust. 5. Because there was no plain proof of the application of the funds of the party, for whose benefit the trust is sought to be raised, and a trust cannot be raised by construction merely. 6. Because the testimony of Simon Brown, a party in interest, was inadmissible to prove declarations and transactions between himself and the deceased, and his honor erred in admitting the same. 7. Because all the testimony introduced to prove the trust, as well parol as written, *was vague, uncertain, and indefinite, and does not furnish the clear proof that the law requires. 8. Because the testimony of John A. Hays, the grantor of the deceased, Boston Cave, under warranty deed of the property, the subject matter of the controversy, was inadmissible to prove "declarations and transactions" between himself and the deceased in reference to same, &c.

First. As to the exceptions concerning the admission of testimony, proof, &c. We do not see that it was error to admit the testimony of John A. Hays, who sold and conveyed with warranty one of the tracts of land. He was not a party to the proceedings, and had no interest in the determination of the action, whether Fanny Cave should have dower in the whole of the lands, or only in a part of it. Besides, he testified that he made the trade with the sons as well as with Boston. "A. C. Cave and the father told him they were acting for all the parties. They said they could not buy unless all the boys and the old man joined together." The testimony of Simon Brown did not refer exclusively to "transactions and communications" with the deceased, Boston Cave, but also with his sons, who are still living, and to that extent the objection does not apply. He says: "A. C. Cave came to me and asked me to buy a tract of land which adjoined him for him and his brothers and father. This is the land which I sold them for $1,000, and they paid me some cash. I did not deliver the title until the money was paid. Each of the boys and the old man brought me cotton—each one paying his share. When I sold the land they asked me to make the title to the old man and each would pay me $200, and they would divide it after the land was paid for," &c.

As to the testimony of the four sons, which the judge excluded as not admissible under section 400 of the code. The respondents, in case it should be necessary, gave notice that they would insist that said testimony should have been received and considered by the Circuit Judge. Section 400 of the Code has certainly given rise to many difficult questions, and unless it is applied with careful consideration, the danger is that it may produce the very injustice it was intended to prevent. It is not clear that an action for dower (to which this seems to be reduced) can be said to be "prosecuted" by the widow as

"executrix, heir *at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor" of her deceased husband. But, as we agree with the Circuit Judge that there was sufficient evidence in the case, without considering that which involved "transactions or communications" with the deceased, Boston Cave, it is unnecessary to make any ruling upon the point, and we prefer to reserve our judgment.

We have read all the testimony with care, and considering only that which was undoubtedly admissible, we concur in the findings of fact of the Circuit Judge that the sons and the father agreed to purchase, and did purchase, the lands together, each having an equal interest, and in pursuance of that agreement the titles were taken in the name of the father in trust for all of them, to the extent of their respective interests. The parol evidence alone established the existence of such agreement, and it was strongly corroborated by the conduct of the parties, and the very terms of the father's will, which, seemingly in accordance with the terms of the agreement, gave to the aforesaid four boys four-fifths of the lands and to his widow, Fanny, only his own share, one-fifth.

But it is contended that most of the testimony was parol, and being introduced to establish a verbal agreement, in conflict with absolute conveyances of land, should have been rejected under the statute of frauds.

This case in several particulars is very much like that of Mims v. Chandler (21 S. C., 480), in which this court had occasion to consider the admissibility of parol evidence to establish the facts which will suffice for the purpose of raising a resulting trust, and also the particulars and circumstances of part performance which will take a case out of the statute of frauds. There is no doubt that a resulting trust, or the facts necessary to raise it, may be proved by parol; and we incline to think that the facts proved here made out such a trust in favor of the four sons as to their respective interests of one-fifth in the said lands. Each certainly paid his part of the purchase money, and it has often been said that the whole foundation of the trust is in the payment of the money.

But the objection is interposed that it does not appear that the four sons each paid a definite portion of the purchase money at the time of the purchase, which was necessary according to the case of Ex parte Trenholm, 19 S. C., 127. When must the purchase be considered as having been made? When the minds of the parties first met in verbal agreement or at the time the titles were executed? We take it that, in reference to the rule in question, we must consider the purchase made when it was consummated by conveyance; and, if so, it is certain that, at least as to two of the purchases, the deeds were not executed until after the whole purchase money was paid, each having paid his part. We suppose that a payment made before the execution of the deed would, in the sense of the rule, be a payment at the time of the purchase. In the case of Taylor v. Mayraut (4 Desaus., 516), it is said: "It appears from the authorities quoted that a resulting trust cannot be raised by construction. It must be grounded on plain proof of the application of the funds of the party for whom it is raised."

But if there should be any serious difficulty as to the proof to raise a resulting trust, it would seem that there can be no doubt that there was ample proof to take the case out of the statute of frauds by part performance. "It is well settled that the Court of Equity will enforce specific performance of a contract within the statute when the parol agreement has been partly carried into execution. The distinct ground upon which Courts of Equity interfere in cases of this sort is that otherwise one party would be able to practise a fraud upon the other." 2 Story Eq., § 759; Mims v. Chandler, supra. We think the possession of the parties of their respective shares with the knowledge and consent of Boston, the improvement and cultivation of the same without notice or warning, considered in connection with all the circumstances, and especially the payment of the purchase money, were sufficient evidence of part performance to take the case out of the statute. The agreement alleged by the respondents was proved. They had the equitable right to have specific performance of that agreement, and, if they chose, partition, giving to each his share in severalty. Johnson v. Gilbert, 13 Rich. Eq., 42.

The only remaining question is whether this equity was sufficient to bar the widow's right to dower, which is generally considered a legal right. All the deeds had been executed on December 19, 1876, when Boston Cave intermarried with Fanny. At that time the equitable right of the parties had attached, and the four sons were living upon and cultivating their respective parcels. The widow's inchoate right to dower originated in her marriage with Boston Cave, and must be considered as arising subject to the state of things which existed at that time. "As a general principle, it may be observed that the wife's dower is liable to be defeated by every subsisting claim or encumbrance in law or equity, existing before the inception of the title, and which would have defeated the husband's seizin. An agreement by the husband to convey before the dower attaches will, if enforced in equity, extinguish the claim to dower. * * * The right to dower is regulated in equity by the nature of the property in the equity view of it." &c. 4 Kent, 50; 1 Scrib. Dow., 591, 594, 410. "The principle is that the widow can have dower of no greater or better estate than existed in the husband at some period during the coverture. Her right attaches subject to all encumbrances or equities existing at the time of the marriage or attaching with the purchase by the husband, and is liable to be defeated by every subsisting claim which might have defeated the husband at the period of his best estate." 1 Scribner, 564, 410; and see Jones v. Miller, 17 S. C., 380, and Shiell v. Carderelli [Id.], and Same v. Sloan and Seibels, 22 Id., 151.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

23 S. C. 258

LOPEZ v. LOPEZ.

[1. Wills ⇐ 195.]

A testator died leaving of force a last will containing several bequests and inter alia the following: "Third, I give and bequeath to my executor M. the sum of $25,000 in trust for my daughter H. to be invested according to his judgment in safe productive securities; the interest or income therefrom to be paid to my said daughter for her own use during her life, and after her death then the said sum to become and be a part of my residuary estate, to be divided according as I shall hereinafter give and bequeath the same. And any further estate the said H. may derive as residuary legatee is to be held by my executor, *and shall be held by him subject to the same trusts above recited and set forth. It is my intent and meaning, and I do hereby declare and direct, that my said daughter shall have full power and authority by her last will and testament, either before or after my death, to dispose of the above named share of my residuary estate hereby given in trust for her use unto and among her children, in such shares and in such proportion as she, in her discretion, may deem proper and think advisable. And in case my said daughter shall depart this life, either before or after my death, without leaving in full force any last will and testament disposing unto and among her children of the aforesaid share of my residuary estate given by this will in trust for her use, then in that case it is my will, and I do hereby direct, that the same shall be held in trust as aforesaid for the use of and to go to and be distributed among her children as follows, &c. * * * Seventh. The balance of my estate, after paying the above bequests, I give, share and share alike, to my children, M., II., A., J., and E." The daughter II. having died, the testator executed a codicil to his will wherein he declared: "It is the intent and meaning of my said will, and I do hereby will and direct, that the children of my lately deceased daughter II. shall take the share of my residuary estate given to her, and that it be held and divided among them (her children) in the same manner and proportions as are provided, named, and set forth in my last will and testament aforesaid, and also in her will." Held, that the $25,000 was given to II. for life only, and at her death became a part of testator's residuary estate, divisible under the seventh clause of the will into five shares, one of which passed to the children of the deceased daughter H.

[2. Powers ⚭36.]

II. left of force a will whereby she gave her entire estate to her children in the same proportions directed by her father's will in case she died intestate. II. had no property when she executed her will, which was dated a short time before her father's and was signed by him as one of the witnesses. Held, that the will of II. was not an execution of the power given to her by her father's will, but the property was given to her children by the will of her father, and must be administered by the executor of his will.

There may be a restrictive residuum, but the words in this will, "the balance of my estate after paying the above bequests," created a general residuum and included the $25,000 given to the daughter II. for her life, she having predeceased the testator.

[4. Wills ⚭858.]

It is not necessary that a residuary clause should be at the end of a will; it may be written in the body thereof.

[5. Wills ⚭858.]

The words "after her death to become and be a part of my residuary estate" mean the same thing as the words "at her demise shall revert to my estate."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2173-2183; Dec. Dig. ⚭858.]

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson dissenting.

*Before Fraser, J., Charleston, November, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The plaintiff and the three defendants, Aaron M., Julian L. and Edward H. Lopez, claim that at the death of Mrs. Hart the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000), given in the first paragraph of the third clause of the will, fell at her death into the balance given under the seventh clause to Mrs. Hart and the above named four sons, and is divisible under the last named clause into five equal shares, the four sons taking each one share and the children of Mrs. Hart one share among them, according to the terms of her will. The children of Mrs. Hart claim that the said sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) does not pass into said balance, but that it passes to them, and that they are entitled, in addition thereto, to one-fifth of said balance, as the further estate mentioned in the second paragraph of said third clause.

The difficulty in this case, it seems to me, arises from the use of the words "residuary estate" in the will and codicil, and the words "residuary legatee" in the will, in reference to this fund. The fact that this will was witnessed by distinguished counsel, is by no means conclusive proof that the will was drawn by one who knew the meaning of the technical terms employed in it. (Where, however, technical words are used, the presumption is that they are used in their technical sense, unless the context clearly indicates the contrary.)

It is by no means clear to my mind that this twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) is, by any fair interpretation, included in the balance given in the seventh clause, because it is a balance "after paying the above bequests," amongst which is this bequest of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000). If it was a bequest to some one else besides the executor himself, as trustee, it seems to me it would plainly be excluded from this balance; it is, however, just as much a payment after it is set aside and invested by the executor, as if it had been paid to some one else; the balance to pass under this seventh clause, is the balance after this payment of this legacy, as well as of the other legacies given in the will.

*If, however, this is a residuary clause, as is claimed, it may cover everything not otherwise disposed of; it can cover no more. Now, the legacy, which is to be subject to the will of Mrs. Hart, or in case she dies without a will to go to her children, is thus described in paragraph 3 of the third clause of the will; it is described as the "above named share of my residuary estate, hereby given in trust for her use." In paragraph 4 of the third clause, it is described as "the aforesaid share of my residuary estate, given by this will in trust for her use." In the codicil it is described as "the share of my residuary estate, given to her (Mrs. Hart)." Now, this twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) had been mentioned in this third clause before either of these expressions occur as "a part of my residuary estate," and it was certainly in this clause "given in trust for her use;" it was "aforesaid and above named;" it was called "a part of the residuary estate;" it was "given in trust hereby" by this will," for her use. It was described in the codicil, which does not alter but confirms the will, as "given to her." It seems to me, therefore, that this sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) is covered by the terms describing the property which Mrs. Hart was empowered to dispose of by will, and which on her failing to make a will went under the will of David Lopez to her children.

It should, therefore, go to these children, unless there is something in the will to give it a different direction. The only clause bearing directly on the subject is the seventh, the alleged residuary clause in the will. This clause, for the reason already assigned, seems to me to exclude this twenty-five thousand dollars from its scope, even if the testator called it "residuary." If it had been the intention of the testator that this sum of money should come back to the estate, or "revert to estate" and fall into a residuum, as contended here, it would have been very easy for him to say so, as he has done in reference to the gift of five thousand dollars ($5,000) to each of his sisters, and directed the sum to "revert." If he had done so, the fund would be divisible as now contended by the sons. It seems to me that he has plainly directed otherwise.

the language used by himself, and *while it may be one of those cases where counsel and even courts may differ, the court must ascertain the intention as well as it may, from the obscure and sometimes conflicting language of the will itself.

The conclusion that I have reached is, that the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000), given by the will in trust for Mrs. Priscilla L. Hart, for life, passes with whatever further estate comes to her share in the residuary estate to her children, under the provisions of her will, as directed also by the will of her father, in the last codicil.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the executor of David Lopez, deceased, do pay over the said sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000), mentioned in the first paragraph of the third clause of his will, to the children of Priscilla L. Hart, as directed by her will. That in addition thereto, he do pay over to the said children any further sum which would have gone to the said Priscilla L. Hart, as residuary legatee, if she had survived her father. All of said payments to be made to the executors of the last will and testament of the said Priscilla L. Hart, to be by them held for her children, according to the provisions of her will. It is further ordered, that any matter within the scope of the pleadings in this case, and not herein adjudicated, be reserved for the future order of the court. It is further ordered, that the costs of this action to this date be paid out of the estate of David Lopez, deceased.

Mr. A. M. Lee, for executor.

Mr. A. T. Smythe, for appellants.

Messrs. A. D. Cohen and Simonton & Barker, contra.

July 18, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. David Lopez, late of Charleston, departed this life April 21, 1884, leaving in full force his last will and testament. This action, in the nature of a bill in equity, was instituted by Moses E. Lopez, the executor, for construction of the will. There was no parol testimony of consequence, and the single inquiry is as to the proper construction of the will and *codicils as they are written. The will was executed on January 19, 1882, and among others contains these provisions:

"Third. I give and bequeath to my executor, Moses E. Lopez, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, in trust for my daughter, Priscilla L. Hart, to be invested according to his judgment in safe productive securities, the interest and income thereof to be paid to my said daughter for her own use during her life, and after her death then the said sum to become and be a part of my residuary estate, to be divided according as I shall hereinafter give and bequeath the same. And any further estate the said Priscilla L. Hart may derive as residuary legatee is to be held by my executor, and shall be held by him subject to the same trusts above recited and set forth."

After making several other bequests in the fourth, fifth, and sixth clauses of his will, it provides as follows: "Seventh. The balance of my estate, after paying the above bequests, I give share and share alike to my children, Moses E. Lopez, Priscilla L. Hart, A. M. Lopez, Julian L. Lopez, and Edward H. Lopez."

After several clauses providing for the adjustment of some debts due him by several of the children, the testator provides: "Lastly. I direct my executor to set aside from my estate the sum of five thousand dollars to and for the use of my sister, Miss Sally Lopez. And a like sum of five thousand dollars to and for the use of my sister, Mrs. Louisa A. Moise. The income thereof to be paid to them semi-annually for and during their natural lives. And at the demise of either of my sisters, the share apportioned to her of five thousand dollars shall revert to my estate and be administered according to the provisions of said will."

Previous to the execution of the will of David Lopez, viz., on June 25, 1880, Mrs. Hart had executed her own will, of which her father was one of the witnesses. In her will she gave all her property to her children in proportions similar to those which were afterwards provided by the will of David Lopez as to the property therein given to them. It was said that at the time Mrs. Hart wrote her will she had no property of her own, nothing but the expectancy from her father's estate. After the execution of her father's will, but before his death, she died, August 9, 1882.

*A few days after Mrs. Hart's death David Lopez added a codicil to his will, which provides as follows: "I. It is the intent and meaning of my said will, and I do hereby will and direct, that the children of my lately deceased daughter, Priscilla L. Hart, shall take the share of my residuary estate given to her, and that it be held and divided among them (her children) in the same manner and proportions as are provided, named, and set forth in my last will and testament aforesaid, and also in her will," &c.

The cause was heard by Judge Fraser, who held: "That the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000), given by the will in trust for Mrs. Priscilla L. Hart for life, passes with whatever further estate comes to her share in the residuary estate, to her children, under the provisions of her will, as directed also by the will of her father in the last codicil," &c.

From this decree A. M. Lopez, J. L. Lopez, and E. H. Lopez appeal to this court upon the grounds:

1. "Because his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in holding that if the bequest of $25,000 were to any other person than the executor himself, it would be excluded from the division directed by the seventh clause of the will; and, further, that the balance in such clause directed to be divided is only what remains after the payment of this legacy as well as of the other legacies given in this will; whereas he should have held that under the express words of the will the said sum upon the death of Mrs. Hart was to become a part of his residuary estate, and be divided as he afterwards gave and bequeathed the same, and therefore passed under the terms of the said seventh clause as the residuary clause of the will.

2. "That by the words 'share of my residuary estate hereby given in trust' for his daughter was included in the specific devise of the specific sum of $25,000, specifically given for his daughter's use only during her life, and at her death specifically made part of his residuary estate; whereas he should have held that such words referred only to the interest, share, or estate which his daughter took in his residuary estate, and not to such specific devise.

3. "In not giving to the words 'residuary estate' and 'residuary legatee,' their ordinary and technical meaning, there being nothing in the context or the rest of the will to show that the testator intended to use them differently.

4. "In so construing this will as practically to disinherit the other children of the testator in favor of the children of one deceased child, the will itself not clearly showing any such intention.

5. "That the specific sum of $25,000 passes with whatever further estate comes to the share of Mrs. Hart in the residuary estate to her children, whereas he should have held that the said sum, Mrs. Hart being dead, became a part of testator's residuary estate, and should be divided among his five children named in the residuary clause of his will, the children of his deceased child, Mrs. Hart, taking among them the share which their mother, if alive, would have taken," &c.

The principal contention is in regard to the $25,000, whether given, as it was, for the benefit of Mrs. Hart during her life, it should, after her death, before that of her father, go in solido to her children, in addition to their equal share of the residuary estate; or, falling into the residuary estate, should be divided as a part thereof equally among all the children, the children of Mrs. Hart taking among them her share, one-fifth. After carefully reading the wills and codicils, and considering all the parts with reference to each other and to the whole, it does not strike us that there is as much obscurity or confusion as seems to have been supposed. It is perfectly clear that the direct bequest of the $25,000 for the use of Mrs. Hart was given expressly for her life, and no interest whatever was given thereby to her children after her death. On the contrary, the said clause carefully and particularly provides that "after her death, then the said sum to become and be a part of my residuary estate, to be divided according as I shall hereinafter give and bequeath the same." What "same"? Of course, not the $25,000 ordered to be merged in it, but the "residuary estate" just referred to. Accordingly the seventh clause gives and bequeaths the residuary estate, "share and share alike," to all the children of the testator by name, including Mrs. Hart. And after her death, in the lifetime of the testator, the last codicil confirms this by declaring "that 'it is the meaning of my last will, and I do hereby will and direct, that the children of my lately deceased daughter, Priscilla L. Hart, shall take the share of my residuary estate given to her,' &c.

As the object of construction is simply to ascertain the intention of the testator, it would seem that in this case the intention is placed beyond the possible reach of inference or implication, first by the express limitation of the bequest for the life of Mrs. Hart, and at her death to become "a part" of the residuary estate; and, second, by the reiterated provisions speaking of the interest of Mrs. Hart, and afterwards of her children, as "her share in the said residuary estate." We think that, upon the death of Mrs. Hart, the $25,000 legacy fell into and enlarged the residuary estate, and of this, thus enlarged, the children of Mrs. Hart take among them their mother's share, one-fifth. It is not perceived that the will of David Lopez made any other provision for these children; and they can take nothing under the will of their mother, for the reason that she died before her father, who after that event republished his will, and gave to them directly what he had before given to their mother, outside of her interest for life in the $25,000. Mrs. Hart's will disposes of no part of this property, because it never belonged to her, and it cannot possibly be considered as the execution of a power given by the will of David Lopez, which was not in existence until afterwards. The whole property was disposed of by the will of David Lopez, and must be administered by the executor of his will as herein construed. See the case of Williams v. Kibler, 10 S. C., 429, where it is said: "But the wife died during the life-time of the testator, and after her death he republished his will. The will must, therefore, be read as if all that portion which provides for the wife, or refers to such provision, were erased; unless it should be found necessary to refer to such portion to expound some ambiguous part of the instrument." &c.

This construction is so obvious that we suppose it never would have been questioned, but for the paragraphs which immediately follow the bequest as to the $25,000, as follows: "And any further estate the said Priscilla L. Hart may derive as residuary legatee, is to be held by my executor, and shall be held by him *subject to the same trusts above described and set forth. It is my intent and meaning, and I do hereby declare and direct, that my said daughter shall have full power and authority, by her last will and testament, either before or after my death, to dispose of the above named share of my residuary estate hereby given in trust for her use, among her children in such proportions, &c. And in case my said daughter shall depart this life, either before or after my death, without leaving any last will and testament, disposing unto and among her children the aforesaid share of my residuary estate, given by this will in trust for her use, then and in that case it is my will, and I do hereby direct, that the same shall be held as aforesaid, for the use of and to go to and be distributed among her children as follows * * *."

It is claimed that the reference here made to a "further estate" indicates that the will made a double provision for Mrs. Hart—first and principally the legacy of $25,000, and also "a further estate as residuary legatee," and from this, and the direction that they should both be held subject to the same trusts, the inference is sought to be drawn that both these provisions were intended to reach beyond the death of Mrs. Hart and go to her children, either under her will as the execution of a power or under that of her father. When properly considered, this alleged obscurity is more apparent than real. It clearly arises out of the fact that Mrs. Hart predeceased her father, and the legacy for her during her life never took effect at all. In construing the will, we should put ourselves in the place of the testator when he executed it. At that time Mrs. Hart was alive, and of course he supposed she would survive him; otherwise the provision would not have been made. If she had survived him, she would have had two separate interests under the will, the use of the $25,000 for life, and her share of "the residuary estate"; and in contemplation of this state of facts, it was strictly correct to refer to the latter interest as "a further estate." He had just directed how the $25,000 should be held for his daughter, and it was natural that, in that connection, he should go on and declare that the "further estate" should be held under the same trusts.

But in all this there is nothing that even purports to change the terms of the bequest of $25,000 as being for life only, or to *extend the double provision beyond her death. It was merely a direction as to the manner (by trustee, &c.) in which the provisions should be held. We cannot say that the testator thereby intended to give Mrs. Hart the right to dispose of the $25,000 by her will. He certainly did not say so, and we are not at liberty to assume it, for that would be directly in the face of the positive provision just made that at her death it should become "a part of his residuary estate." This view is based on the express terms of the will, and is strongly corroborated by the fact that after the clause making the bequest for life, the will nowhere refers to the $25,000 specifically as a distinct bequest; but in every instance in which the interest of Mrs. Hart or her children is referred to the expression is limited to "her share of the residuary estate."

It seems to us that it would be an unauthorized liberty with the will of the testator and a great stretch of construction to hold that by the words "share of the residuary estate" he meant such "share" with a super-added legacy of $25,000 still retaining its character as a specific legacy; especially when there was an intent in the will answering precisely to the words used, and the aforesaid legacy, after the death of Mrs. Hart, was expressly declared to be "a part" of the residuary estate. We do not see any provision in the will or codicil giving to the children of Mrs. Hart anything beyond their mother's share of the residuary estate. If they do not take as residuary legatees, we do not see how they can take at all, and coming in as residuary legatees, they must take as such their mother's share, one-fifth.

But it is earnestly urged that there is really no "residuary clause" in the will; that it contains no provision which has the resemblance of one, except the seventh clause, and that cannot be considered as such. If this be so, the $25,000, now that Mrs. Hart is dead, is intestate property. But is it so? It is manifest that the testator intended to make such a provision, and thought he had done so; for in the will and codicils he repeatedly refers to his "residuary estate," and we think the seventh clause is residuary in its character. It is in the following words: "The balance of my estate, after paying the above bequests, I give, share and share alike, to my children, Moses E. Lopez,

Priscilla *L. Hart, A. M. Lopez, Julian L. Lopez, and Edward H. Lopez." It may be true that the word "balance," in the sense of residue or remainder, is not considered elegant English, but in this country it is very often used in that sense, and there is no difficulty in understanding what the testator meant by the phrase "balance of my estate." In one of his definitions, Worcester gives the sense in which it is understood: "The remainder of anything, as the balance of an edition," &c. "No particular form of words is required to pass a residuum. It is sufficient if the testator's intention to include everything not otherwise disposed of is shown." 2 Wms. Exrs., 1310. "The balance of my estate" held to be a residuary clause. Skinner v. Lamb, 3 Ired. [25 N. C.] 155. "I also give all my other property of every kind and description whatever, to be equally divided," &c., held to be a residuary clause. Williams v. Kibler, 10 S. C., 428.

It is, however, still further contended that if the seventh clause is residuary in character, it is not a general residuum, but restrictive, and is capable only of disposing of particular property, viz., the odds and ends of the estate which were overlooked and not disposed of in the will at all; and that the words in the clause, "after paying the above bequests," show that "the balance" contemplated did not embrace property which had been already given, and the $25,000, having been so bequeathed, cannot pass under the residuary clause. A will of personal property speaks at the death of the testator, and it therefore results, as a rule of law, that a general residuum carries all property of the testator which at that time is undisposed of, including not only that which was omitted from the will, but also that which was ineffectually given by it, as in the case of a lapsed legacy; otherwise, to the extent of such legacy, there would be an intestacy. See Cheves v. Haskell, 10 Rich. Eq., 538, and authorities there cited.

It is true that there is such a thing as a restricted residuum, and the rule just stated does not apply when the residuary bequest is of a particular fund or description of property or other certain residuum. See Glover v. Harris, 4 Rich. Eq., 27. In regard to what constitutes such a restricted residuum, and as to what will pass under it, there is much learning and some refinement in the books. But we do not think it necessary to enter upon *that subject in this case. The words "after paying the above bequests" must of course be understood with reference to the nature and terms of those "bequests." There was a bequest of the $25,000, but it was only the use of it during the life of Mrs. Hart; and, of course, the "paying" referred to was of that bequest. According to our construction, the corpus or remainder in the $25,000 was not included in that bequest for the use of Mrs. Hart, and therefore it cannot be said to be excluded from the residuary clause because given away from those interested in it. On the contrary, the exact fact is that, instead of being given away from the residuary legatees, the very clause which made the bequest for the life of Mrs. Hart provided that, after her death, "the said sum should become and be a part of the residuary estate." No controversy can arise here as to whether the seventh clause creates a residuum so restricted as to be incapable of receiving and carrying the remainder in the $25,000; for that being a pure question of intention, is conclusively settled by the terms of the will. The testator himself expressly declares that it shall fall into the residuary estate and be distributed as he should give and bequeath the same; and in a subsequent clause of his will he does give and bequeath it equally among his five children.

We cannot suppose that the character or capacity of the seventh clause is changed in any way by being in the body instead of at the end of the will. It would probably strike a lawyer that the orderly method of proceeding would be to set down first the provisions giving specific property, and then the clause intended to cover everything that might remain undisposed of; but it is believed that the relative position of the different clauses is purely arbitrary. Usually the last clause in a will appoints the executors, and yet in this will he was appointed by the very first.

No question is made as to the construction of the bequest for the use of each of the testator's sisters, which is in the following words: "And at her demise the share apportioned to her of $5,000 shall revert to my estate and be administered according to the provisions of said will." In respect to the point made, we do not see any substantial difference between this provision and that for Mrs. Hart, "and after her death the said sum to *become and be a part of my residuary estate, to be distributed according as I shall hereinafter give and bequeath the same." The words in the first are, "at her demise," and those in the second, "after her death"; and it seems to us that the phrase "to become and be a part of my residuary estate" means the same thing as "shall revert to my estate." That is to say, upon the event indicated, the sum in question shall fall into and be administered as a part of the residuary estate.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so as to conform to the conclusions herein announced.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, dissenting. I am unable to concur in the majority opinion for the following reasons:

In the third clause of his will the testator bequeathed $25,000 to his executor, the interest and income thereof to be paid to his daughter during her life, and after her death to become a part of his residuary estate, to be divided according as I (he) shall hereinafter give and bequeath the same. And any further estate the said Priscilla may derive as residuary legatee is to be held by my executor, and shall be held by him subject to the same trusts and limitations above recited and set forth. He then gave off other pecuniary bequests, and finally, in the seventh clause, he directed as follows: "The balance of my estate, after paying the above bequests, I give, share and share alike, to my children, Moses Lopez, Priscilla L. Hart, A. M. Lopez, Julian L. Lopez, and Edward H. Lopez."

The question is, did the testator intend the $25,000 to fall into the general residue and pass under the seventh clause of the will above, subject to division among his five children, Priscilla being one, and each to take one-fifth, Priscilla's share to be held by his executor for her use during life? I think not, for the following reasons: 1st. The testator, after setting apart the $25,000 for Priscilla for life, then said: Any further estate that Priscilla might derive as a residuary legatee should be held by his executor subject to the same trusts as the $25,000 already *bequeathed to Priscilla. Here he evidently referred to some additional estate that Priscilla would take under the division of the general residue over and above the $25,000. Besides, he certainly intended that the residue covered by the seventh clause should be distributed as soon after his death as practicable. Now, if the $25,000 was to constitute a portion of the residue, Priscilla already having a life estate therein, no distribution could take place thereof until her death.

2d. The testator could not have intended that the $25,000 should fall into the residuary at the death of Priscilla and then one-fifth to go to her, for the reason that he directs that any further estate that Priscilla shall get under the residuary shall go to his executor, to be held for her use for life, as he held the $25,000. Where would be the use of directing that one-fifth of the $25,000 should be held for the life of Priscilla when he had already given the entire $25,000 for her use for life? And further, the theory of the $25,000 falling into the general residue at the death of Priscilla, and then divided under the seventh clause, would involve the idea of her enjoying one-fifth for life after her death when she had already enjoyed the whole amount during her life. On the theory that testator intended the $25,000 to fall into the residue and be distributed under the seventh clause, these conflicting and strange results would follow: 1st. The amount of the residue could not be ascertained until the death of Priscilla. 2d. The distribution could not be made until her death. And then she would be entitled to one-fifth only of the $25,000 for life, when she had already enjoyed the whole amount for life.

But it is said, how can the expression in the will, "then to become a part of my residuary estate, to be divided according as I shall hereinafter give and bequeath the same," be explained, otherwise than that the testator intended the $25,000, of which he was then speaking, should become a part of his general residue and pass under the seventh clause, in which he directed a division of this residue? It appears to me that this expression is susceptible of the following interpretation. Of course, the testator knew that the corpus of the $25,000 was a part of his residue, as he had given only a life estate therein to his daughter, and *recognizing this fact, he directed in the same clause that it should become at the death of his daughter a part of his residuary estate, to be divided according as he should thereafter give and bequeath the same. Now, what did he mean by the word "same"? Did he mean the whole of his residue, or only this portion thereof? Did he mean that the $25,000 should be divided as he might thereafter give and bequeath his general residue, or did he mean that this $25,000 should be divided as a portion of his residue as he might thereafter direct the same? He must have intended the latter, because otherwise the strange results suggested would follow. And, besides, the next clause in the will following the third, in which he directs a distribution, of some portion of his estate in the event that Priscilla failed to dispose of it by her will, can be explained upon no hypothesis but that he referred to the $25,000. In this clause he refers to the above named share of his residuary estate, giving Priscilla the power to dispose of it, and if she fails to do so, then he disposes of it to her children.

This construction is supported and sustained by the codicil executed after the death of Priscilla in which he provides that the share of his residuary estate given to her should go to her children, in the same manner as provided in his will, and also the will of his daughter. It is manifest that the testator, in using the term "share" in connection with the sum of $25,000, constituting a part of his residuary, meant portion. He cut this off from the balance of his estate at the beginning of his will, and although the corpus would constitute a part of his residue in the sense that it was undisposed of to Priscilla, yet he never intended that it should be distributed with his general residue, but intended to direct a different and independent division thereof, which it appears to me he did, first in the clause following the third, and then after the death of Priscilla, by his codicil. I concur in the construction of the Circuit Judge.

Before Cothran, J., Fairfield, September, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The pivotal point of the case, in my judgment, is the transaction of March, 1882, by which the assignee gave up the control of the estate and Groeschel became possessed of it. This was either justified under the act (or deed, if there was one) of composition, or it was an unauthorized abandonment of the trust by Withers. I must assume the former to be the case, unless the latter were made to appear by proof, and of such there is none. I am forced by the proof further to conclude that Sternbach knew of the transfer and ratified it in August, 1882, by receiving $1,000 of his claim from the hands of Groeschel. His letters show that he had confidence in Groeschel's integrity; and, as his relative, he was much concerned about his pecuniary condition, and was willing to assist him. The composition with the unpreferred creditors, to which Sternbach assented, superseded the assignment. See Bur. Ass., 567. Groeschel says in his testimony, and it is not contradicted, that the assigned estate sold for enough to pay the preferred creditors and the composition notes, except Samuels, who was secured by mortgage of real estate. Sternbach promoted the arrangement, was deeply concerned about it, acquiesced in it, ratified it by receiving a part of his debt, six months after it was made, from Groeschel, made no further demand for eighteen months, and until Withers again took charge of Groe-schel's effects, and he is now estopped from setting up his claim here. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., 965-1083; 4 Wait Act. & Def., 332.

The next question is, shall Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co. account for the excess over 36 per cent. received from Groeschel on their claims under the assignment before participating in the fund in hand? If it had been shown that such excess had been paid from the assigned estate, much, if not all, that has been said in argument about "clean hands," "he who asks equity must do equity," "equality is equity," &c., &c., would be of easy and necessary application to the case, but the only proof upon this point is directly to the contrary. The defendant, Groeschel, most likely of all to know the fact, says in his testimony, after some unbecoming hesitation, but positively touching both claims: "Did not pay this additional amount out of sales of either old or new stock." This is affirmative proof and repeated. The witness was not impeached. There was no countervailing testimony. It is not impossible, not improbable, nor without high precedent. He may have had other funds, and if so, with such it appears that he made unto "himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness." In the absence of any proof to show that such excess was paid from the assigned estate, and with the positive proof that it was not so paid, I should not feel warranted in denying to Kerngood Bros. and to Wiesenfeld & Co. the right to participate fully in this distribution. These *claims are otherwise unquestioned, and certain it is that the very fund in controversy has been derived in part from goods and merchandise of theirs taken up by the defendant, Groeschel.

Wherefore it is adjudged and decreed: 1. That the funds in the hands of Isaac N. Withers, the former assignee, be turned over to the clerk of this court for distribution. 2. That the clerk do pay out first, the costs of this proceeding and any arrears of taxes that may be due upon said property. 3. That the balance be paid out pro rata to the creditors of Joseph Groeschel (excepting the defendant, Charles Sternbach), who shall, under the usual form of publication by said clerk, present and prove their demands before him within sixty days from the filing of this judgment. All creditors failing or refusing so to present and prove their demands within the said time, shall be debarred from all benefits hereunder. 4. Any of the parties in interest are hereby permitted to move for any further orders in their behalf.

The points raised by the exceptions are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. S. Douglass, for plaintiffs.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for Sternbach.

Mr. J. E. McDonald, for respondents.

July 20, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant, Joseph Groeschel, on February 8, 1882, being then a merchant at Winnsboro, Fairfield County, and insolvent, made an assignment of all his real and personal property, consisting of a stock of goods and a certain lot situate in said town, for the benefit of his creditors, in which certain named creditors were preferred, among them the defendant, Charles Sternbach. The defendant, Isaac N. Withers, was the assignee. Shortly after the execution of this assignment, a meeting of the creditors was had in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, at which meeting the said Isaac N. Withers was appointed agent of the creditors.

Before anything was done by the assignee with the assigned *property, Groeschel, the debtor, compounded with his unpreferred creditors by agreeing to pay them 36 per cent. on their claims, this amount to be paid in four instalments and in full of said claims, for which he gave notes, bearing interest from February 18, 1882, and payable to James H. Rion, as attorney for the creditors, all of which have since been paid. He also made satisfactory arrangements for the payment of the claims of the preferred creditors, all of whom have since been satisfied, except the defendant, Charles Sternbach, there being still remaining on his claim some $1,200, after crediting a payment of $1,000 made in August, 1882.

After this composition and arrangement, to wit, in March, 1882, the assignee returned the stock of goods to Groeschel, the assignor, who immediately resumed his former business of buying and selling goods, commencing with this returned stock, in which he continued until January, 1884, depleting and replenishing his stock, from time to time, as the business required, and without interruption from any quarter. During this time he contracted many debts in the purchase of goods, and among them the plaintiffs'. In 1884, when the greater part of the stock, if not all, which had been returned to him by Withers, the assignee, had been exhausted and its place supplied by other purchases, being threatened by his subsequent creditors, Withers took possession, claiming, as it seems, under the original assignment. It does not appear whether this action of Withers was assented to or not by Groeschel. However, Withers took possession and immediately sold the goods on hand. Out of the proceeds of the sale, Withers paid off the last of the four notes given by Groeschel to his unpreferred creditors mentioned above, and also a note to one J. Herbst, with certain expenses and commissions, leaving in his hands the sum of $2,978.64.

At this juncture of affairs, the plaintiffs commenced the action below, claiming to be a creditor on account of goods sold and delivered on December 16, 1883, amounting to $274.91, and demanding judgment: 1st. That the defendant, Isaac N. Withers, assignee as aforesaid, be enjoined from paying out of the funds or assets in his hands, or under his control, any balance that may be claimed to be due the defendant, Charles Stern-bach, *as a preferred creditor, or from making any other disposition or application of said funds, except as ordered by the court. 2d. "That the plaintiffs be paid their debt, or their proportionate share thereof, in the ratable and equitable distribution of the same among such of the creditors as may come in and establish their claims in this action." The defendants answered the complaint, admitting the facts alleged in the complaint, except the statement that the stock of goods taken by Withers in 1884 had entirely "changed its component parts" from the stock turned over to Groeschel under the composition agreement in 1882, which was denied. It was also denied that Sternbach had "concurred and acquiesced in and assented to the transfer and delivery of the assigned goods and assets to the said Groeschel by Withers, and that he made a new agreement with Groeschel as to his debt," and Sternbach claimed that he was entitled to be paid the balance due him out of the funds in the hands of Withers as a preferred claim.

The case was ordered to a referee, with instruction to call in all creditors claiming to share in the distribution of the money in the hands of Withers. Under this call, three classes of creditors established their demands. 1. A preferred creditor under the original assignment who had not been paid in full, to wit, Charles Sternbach, whose claim is mentioned above. 2. The unpreferred creditors under said assignment who had been paid their then existing claims, but who since that time had become creditors of Groeschel for goods and merchandise sold him, to wit, Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co. And 3. Those who were not creditors at the time of the original assignment, but had become so since, to wit, the plaintiffs. Upon the coming in of the report of the referee, which contained the testimony upon the issues raised in the pleadings and the claims established, the case was heard by his honor, Judge Cothran.

In the testimony reported, it appeared that Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co., who, as stated, were unpreferred creditors of the original assignment, had received, by a private arrangement made with Groeschel in the composition with them, considerably more than 36 per cent. on their claims, and the plaintiffs contended that they should account for this excess on their new *claims now before the court. Plaintiffs also contended that the defendant, Charles Sternbach, having made a new arrangement with Groeschel as to his preferred claim, should be confined to that, and was entitled to nothing out of the funds in the hands of Withers.

His honor, the Circuit Judge, sustained the plaintiffs as to Sternbach's claim, but overruled it as to Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co., and he ordered (1) that the funds in the hands of Withers be turned over to the clerk of the court for distribution; (2) that the clerk, after paying the costs, taxes, &c., distribute the balance pro rata among the creditors of Joseph Groeschel (excepting Charles Sternbach), who shall, under the usual form of publication by said clerk, present and prove their demands before him within sixty days from the judgment rendered, &c.

The plaintiffs have appealed from so much of the decree as allowed Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co. to share in the funds in contest without accounting for the excess received in the composition, and also from so much as directed the creditors to establish their demands over before the clerk. Sternbach appealed because his claim was ruled out, and also from so much of the decree as directed the funds to be turned over to the clerk and that the creditors should again establish their demands before him.

This is a novel case, and in some of its features without precedent in the books. The main, and as was said by the Circuit Judge the pivotal, question is the effect of the composition upon the original assignment. The Circuit Judge held, in substance, that it annulled, cancelled, the assignment, and in this we think he was entirely correct. The object of the composition, no doubt, was to accomplish this, the creditors by their action at least assented to it, and the assignee carried it out by openly returning the assigned property to Groeschel, upon which he, Groeschel, again began to merchandise, continuing in the business for some two years without objection. We think these facts were entirely sufficient to authorize the conclusion of the judge, that the assignment was at an end. The assignment then being at an end, the property belonged to Groeschel, unencumbered, and by *what right Withers afterwards seized the stock of goods in question, or upon what foundation the plaintiffs instituted the action below for the distribution of Groeschel's property among his creditors, we cannot exactly see. Groeschel is alive, and although insolvent, yet his property is not encumbered with conflicting liens, needing adjustment by the court. Nor has it become by the execution of any paper or agreement a common fund belonging to the creditors. But Groeschel has not objected, and we must suppose that Withers took possession by his consent, and that this transaction amounted to a verbal assignment by Groeschel of his property for the benefit of his creditors. In the absence of all objection by Groeschel, we must so regard it, otherwise the case has no status in court, the original assignment being cancelled.

What are the rights, then, of the parties under this view of the case? No creditor having a prior lien by judgment, mortgage, or otherwise over others, the property would be subject to be pro-rated among all. We cannot see how Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co. can be made to account for the excess which it is said they received in the settlement of their former claims, nor why Sternbach should be excluded altogether. All these parties have claims against Groeschel, his property is about to be distributed among creditors by his consent, no one of whom has a lien thereon, and if he does not object to these parties getting a share, who can?

It is contended, however, in reference to Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co., that under the law of assignments, where a composition takes place, if the debtor, by a secret agreement, pays more to one creditor than to another, that the transaction is fraudulent, and the amount paid by the debtor may be recovered back. Pom. Eq. Jur., § 967. This, no doubt, is good law. But upon whom is such a transaction fraudulent? and for whose benefit can the amount thus fraudulently paid be recovered back? It is fraudulent upon the other creditors entitled under the assignment, and if voidable, it is voidable by them, and by them alone. Because they are the only parties injured, and consequently the only parties having a cause of action. Pomeroy, § 967, supra; 1 Story Eq., §§ 378, 381. The plaintiffs here do not occupy the position of a *creditor at the time of the original assignment. Their claims have been contracted since, and we find no authority warranting them to claim in a proceeding like that they have instituted here, that Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co. should refund the alleged excess. Suppose they were required to refund, what lien would these plaintiffs have upon the money, or what right would the court have in the absence of such lien to appropriate any portion to the plaintiffs? If there is any party before the court who has a right to complain, it is Sternbach. He was a creditor at the time of the assignment, and was entitled to know the terms of the composition. But he makes no claim.

Next, why should Sternbach be excluded altogether? It is said that he was amply secured under the assignment, being a preferred creditor, yet he allowed the goods to be restored to his debtor, and permitted him to resume and continue business for nearly two years, when he ought to have interposed and demanded payment of his claim. This, it is true, was enough to prevent him from now attempting to set up the assignment and claim as preferred creditor thereunder—perhaps so, if even he could find and identify the assigned property, certainly so, as to property since acquired by his debtor. But upon what principle can it be said that his debt should not be paid out of subsequently acquired property until all other debts are paid? It is contended by the plaintiffs, and by Kerngood Bros. and Wiesenfeld & Co., under the principle of Goodhue v. Barnwell (Rice Eq., 240), and other similar cases, he should be excluded. What is this principle? In the case of Goodhue v. Barnwell, the court held that if a creditor stands by and suffers the personal estate to be squandered, he will not afterwards be permitted to look to the heir for payment. In Richardson v. Inglesby (13 Rich. Eq., 59), an execution creditor allowed the bidder at sheriff's sale to take possession of the property without payment. It was held that the execution was satisfied.

The principle of these cases, and many others like them, is that a party will not be permitted to defeat other creditors on a certain fund by interposing a claim otherwise provided for, and which he has failed to secure out of the provided fund, on account of his negligence or bad faith. The doctrine of estoppel *to some extent comes in. But it would be straining this principle very far here—indeed, much too far—to bring Sternbach within it, and altogether exclude his claim. That he surrendered his claim as a preferred creditor under the assignment was an act of kindness to Groeschel, his debtor. Certainly no creditor then in existence had the right to object. He was injuring no one but himself. After he surrendered, his claim as a preferred claim over the property assigned was gone, and gone forever; and how, therefore, can he be charged with standing by and allowing his debtor to squander this property? When he surrendered he then became a simple creditor, just like the plaintiffs and Kerngood Bros., and had no higher rights than they, nor any greater power than they, to stop Groeschel in his downward mercantile career. We can see no legal reason why Sternbach should not have a share in these funds, which it seems Groeschel has consented to be distributed among his creditors without preference.

It being conceded that there are no other creditors of Groeschel except those before the court, and there being no dispute as to the amounts established before the referee, it would be incurring costs and expenses unnecessarily to require these debts to be again established. We think the funds in hand, after paying off expenses allowed, should be distributed by the clerk of the court for Fairfield County among the plaintiffs, Kerngood Bros., Wiesenfeld & Co., and Charles Sternbach, pro rata, according to the amount of the claims of each. And to this end.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified as herein above. Let the case be remanded.

LEVI v. LEGG & BELL.

[1. Chattel Mortgages ⇨127, 129, 131, 161, 173.]

A chattel mortgage operates as a transfer of title, and the stipulation permitting the mortgagor to retain possession until condition broken, is personal to him and cannot be assigned; hence the mortgagee, before condition broken, may maintain action for recovery against the purchaser at sheriff's sale of the mortgaged chattels.

The damages sustained by a plaintiff from the unlawful detention of his chattels, for the recovery of which he sues, constitute no part of his cause of action, but are incident to the violation of his rights; and where damages are not alleged in the complaint, but claimed as part of the relief demanded, the jury may find a verdict for damages.

Before Kershaw, J., Clarendon, October, 1884.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Earle & Purdy, for appellants.

Messrs. Moise & Huggins, contra.

July 20, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case so far as necessary to a proper understanding of the questions raised by this appeal, are substantially as follows: On January 16, 1883, the defendant, Griffin, executed a mortgage on certain property, including the two mules which are the subject of the present action, to the plaintiff, to secure the payment of a bond which became payable on December 8, 1883. This mortgage contained the usual stipulation that upon default in payment of the amount which it was intended to secure the mortgagee might enter upon the premises of the mortgagor and take possession of the mortgaged property, &c., and that in the meantime the mortgagor might retain possession. On April 22, 1883, before the time fixed for payment of the mortgage debt, the property in question was sold by the sheriff under an execution against the mortgagor, and on the same day went into possession of the defendants, Legg & Bell, as purchasers from the party who had bid off the property at sheriff's sale.

While the property was in the possession of Legg & Bell, the plaintiff made a demand for it, which being refused, this action was commenced on April 3, 1883, to recover possession of the two mules so sold at sheriff's sale as the property of Griffin. In the complaint there is no specific allegation that the plaintiff has sustained any damages by reason of the unlawful taking or detention of the property, but in the prayer for relief judgment is demanded "for the possession of the said two mules; and in case possession thereof cannot be had, then for the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, the value thereof, and one hundred dollars damages for the taking and detention thereof." It is stated in the "Case" as prepared for argument here that "the plaintiff did not attempt to offer any testimony whatever as to damages sustained by reason of the taking and detention of the mules."

At the trial below the defendants requested the Circuit Judge to charge the jury "that no damages having been alleged, and no damages having been proved, they could not render a verdict for damages." This request was refused, and the jury were instructed "that upon an allegation of a wrongful taking and conversion of property, damages followed as a corollary, and it was sufficient that damages be claimed in the demand for judgment; and that the jury were at liberty, under the pleadings, to find damages, if there has been any testimony upon that point." The jury were also instructed "that as soon as the property went into the possession of the purchaser at sheriff's sale under execution against the mortgagor, the mortgagee had the right to seize the same under his mortgage, although the condition thereof had not been broken."

The jury having found a verdict that the plaintiff was entitled to the property or its value, and for the sum of fifty dollars damages, the defendants appeal upon exceptions duly taken, which raise two questions: 1st. Could the plaintiff maintain the action before the condition of the mortgage was broken? 2d. Could the plaintiff, under the pleadings and evidence, recover any damage?

The first question, it seems to us, is conclusively determined by the decisions of our own courts in the case of Spriggs v. Camp, 2 Speers, 181, recognized and affirmed in Belune v. Wallace, 2 Rich., 80. These cases, which are binding as authority upon us, expressly decide that a mortgagee of chattels may maintain an action for a mortgaged chat-tel, even before condition *broken, against a purchaser from the mortgagor, either directly or through the process of the court. They rest upon the theory that a mortgage of personal property, unlike one of real estate, operates as a transfer of the title of the property, and that the stipulation usually found in mortgages of chattels, that the mortgagor may retain possession until condition broken, is personal to the mortgagor and cannot be assigned or transferred to another. Hence, whenever a mortgaged chattel is found in possession of another than the mortgagor, who alone can avail himself of the personal license to retain possession, the mortgagee, as the legal owner, may recover possession of such chattel. It is clear, therefore, that in this respect the Circuit Judge committed no error.

The next inquiry is as to the damages. The judge could not have charged as requested upon this point, because it required him to determine what was proved, which, of course, he could not do, as that was a matter exclusively for the jury. It therefore only remains for us to consider whether there was any error in the instruction which he gave to the jury as to the question of damages as that also was excepted to. That instruction practically amounted to this, that there was no necessity for any specific allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff had sustained any damage by reason of the unlawful taking and detention of his property, but that the violation of plaintiff's rights having been alleged, damages were a mere incident to such violation and need not be specially alleged, and it was sufficient that damages should be claimed in the demand for relief. In this we cannot say there was any error of law. It is true that the demand for relief constitutes no part of the plaintiff's cause of action, and cannot be resorted to for the purpose of supplying any fact necessary to the plaintiff's cause of action which has been omitted in the body of the complaint. Here, however, the damages which the plaintiff may have sustained constituted no part of his cause of action. They were only the consequences which flowed from the violation of the plaintiff's rights by the unlawful seizure and detention of his property, and really constituted a part of the relief which he demanded for such violation of his rights. It is true that there may be cases in which it is necessary to the maintenance of the action that special damages should be alleged and *proved, but this is not such a case, and therefore we need not go into that matter.

Whether there was any proof, or any sufficient proof, to warrant the jury in finding the amount of damages which they did find, or any at all, are questions of fact over which we have no jurisdiction. If there was any error on the part of the jury in this respect, the proper mode of correcting it would have been by a motion, addressed to the Circuit Court, for a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Laurens, February, 1885.

This was an action by W. H. Pool against the Columbia & Greenville Railroad Company, commenced September 4, 1884. The opinion states the case. The appeal was brought upon the following exceptions:

1. Because the complaint alleged ownership and unlawful detention of the goods on the third and fourth days respectively of September, 1884, and there was some evidence to sustain these allegations. II. Because neither the answer nor defendant's evidence justified the defendant's conduct in refusing to deliver the goods, but, if so, it was a matter solely for the jury. III. Because the goods were not in transit, but had reached their destination, and were in the constructive possession of the plaintiff. IV. Because the statement agreed upon by counsel was only evidence for the defendant, and should have been submitted to the jury. V. Because the complaint should not have been dismissed on motion of non-suit by defendant's counsel, and judgment should not have been entered up against the plaintiff for the return of the goods or their value.

Messrs. W. H. Martin and F. P. McGowan, for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. These actions were brought to recover certain personal property in the possession of the defendant, and alleged by the plaintiff to belong to him. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant moved for a non-suit, which was granted, the court ordering the cause to be dismissed, and with leave to the defendant, on failure of the plaintiff to return the goods in question within five days, to enter judgment against the plaintiff for the sum of $363.67 in the one case, and for the sum of $448.17 in the other, with costs in both, it appearing that the plaintiff had taken possession of the goods under bond to prosecute the actions, and to return the goods upon failure of success.

The plaintiff has appealed upon several exceptions. These exceptions, however, raise but a single question, to wit, was the non-suit rightfully ordered? This court has held in several cases that a non-suit is demandable by the defendant in a case where there is total failure of evidence, either as to the whole case stated in the complaint, or as to any material part thereof. Was there such a failure here? The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of the goods and chattels mentioned in the complaint; that he was entitled to immediate possession; that defendant detained them after demand made, to the damage of the plaintiff $500. The answer admitted possession, but stated that the goods had been received by defendant as a common carrier from certain consignors in Richmond, Va., directed to the plaintiff, but before the goods were demanded or delivered to said plaintiff, defendant was instructed by said consignors, Wingo, Ellett & Crump, not to deliver said goods to plaintiff.

The only witness examined was the plaintiff himself. It will be seen upon examination of this testimony that while some question might arise as to its force and effect, yet it was upon the point at issue. He said that he had bought the goods in question in the month of August, 1884; that they consisted of fifteen boxes of boots and shoes, of the value of $448.17, and also of a bill of hardware, valued at $363.67; that he was the owner thereof on September 4, 1884; that they were in the depot of defendant at Laurens C. H., and were consigned and addressed to him at Laurens C. H.; that he had demanded the goods from the agent, and had tendered the freight account; that the agent had refused to deliver, and then stated the custom prevailing at that point as to the delivery of goods by the agent to merchants—this being objected to by the defendant. This testimony certainly touched the issues raised in the complaint, and up to this point it could not be said that there was total failure as to the whole case, or as to any material part thereof.

Before, however, the plaintiff closed his testimony, a paper was read by the defendant's counsel—read by him, as stated, because it "was in his handwriting"—in which the counsel of the plaintiff admitted "that the defendant in the above cases held the goods * * * in obedience to orders to that effect from the shippers, Wingo, Ellett & Crump, Richmond, and Robinson, Lane & Co., Baltimore." Now, what effect did this admission have, coming, as it did, as a part of the plaintiff's testimony, or, at least, before the plaintiff had closed? Did it negative and destroy the other testimony of the plaintiff, and leave the case as if no such testimony had been offered? Did it negative such portion of said testimony as was applicable to some one or more of the material allegations in the complaint and leave such allegations wholly without evidence? If it had these effects, either the one or the other, then there was a total failure of evidence, and the non-suit was proper. The admission was not in conflict with the facts, either of ownership by plaintiff, of possession by defendant, of the demand made, nor of refusal to deliver. As to these questions it had no effect, and the testimony which had been offered by the plaintiff bearing upon these questions still remained untouched.

It may be said, however, that one of the material allegations in the complaint was the alleged right to immediate possession, and that this admission, to wit, that defendants refused to deliver possession because they had been ordered by the shippers not to deliver, left that material allegation without any testimony to support it, and therefore the non-suit was right. Whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to immediate possession, was a question of law, dependent upon the facts of the case, to wit, ownership and the character of the defence. But it may be true that where a plaintiff alleges in his complaint facts constituting a cause of action, and offers testimony sufficient to entitle him to go to the jury thereon in the first instance, yet if he admits the defence relied on, and that defence be one which, if true, would as matter of law defeat his action, his case becomes a case where there is a total failure of evidence—that is, a total failure of evidence as to his legal right, and subjecting him to a non-suit. Let this be granted as to this case. Then the question arises, was the admission of the plaintiff below an admission of the kind suggested?

No doubt, the goods in question were in a condition to be subject to the doctrine of stoppage in transitu. That is, they had been ordered by the plaintiff from merchants in Richmond and Baltimore; they had been shipped by these merchants to the plaintiff in boxes marked in his name. The defendant was a common carrier, and had not yet delivered them to the plaintiff either actually or constructively, and if the shippers had the right to avail themselves of the doctrine of stoppage in transitu, the goods not having been delivered to the plaintiff, or put under his control, were in condition to be made subject thereto. Now, when does the right of stoppage in transitu attach to the vendor, and what is its effect when applied to goods in the hands of a carrier? Mr. Benjamin, in his work on sales, where he has discussed this doctrine fully, referring to numerous cases both English and American, says that "this right arises solely upon the insolvency of the buyer" (§ 1229), and in section 1243 he *repeats the same in these words: "The vendor can only exercise this right against an insolvent or bankrupt buyer." So that in a contest between the vendee and the vendor, where the vendor has attempted to exercise this right, he cannot vindicate his action unless he proves that at the time of its exercise the vendee was insolvent.

But how is it in a contest between the carrier in whose hands the goods have been arrested and the vendee, as was the case below? And where a carrier is sued by the vendee for possession, what facts will justify him for having withheld the property? Mr. Benjamin says: "All that is necessary to stop the goods in the hands of the carrier is a simple notice from the consignor forbidding delivery to the vendee." He says the effect of this notice is to revert possession in the vendor, and if the carrier delivers after such notice to the vendee, he becomes liable to the vendor. § 1277, and the cases there cited in note. The carrier is not bound to know whether the consignor is exercising his right to stop delivery upon proper and legal grounds or not. All that he is bound to know is that the consignor has ordered a stoppage before delivering, and if so, his delivery afterwards becomes illegal.

If this be the law (and of this there seems no doubt), the refusal of a carrier to deliver, with an order in his hands from the consignor not to deliver, is a full protection to him, the refusal under such circumstances affording no cause of action against him to the vendee. As we have said, the order of nondelivery reverts the possession of the property in the vendor in contemplation of law, and transfers the cause of action of the vendee for non-delivery from and against the carrier to and against the vendor. From this it follows that the defendant below had not only the right to refuse the demand of the plaintiff, but was legally bound to do so. And this fact appearing in the case by the admissions of the plaintiff, before the close of his testimony, it negated and destroyed the inference proper from the other facts of the case in its absence, to wit, that the plaintiff had the right to immediate possession.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Marlboro, September, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit Judge, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The defendants, William T. Newton, his wife, Mary Newton, and Rebecca Wright, demur to the complaint on five grounds. The first and second grounds of demurrer allege a defect in parties in the omission of the names of certain persons. I find that nearly all of the persons named and alleged to have been omitted are embraced in the body of the complaint. Exception for want of proper parties can only be taken by demurrer when the omission appears on the face of the pleadings. Clark v. Tompkins, 1 S. C., 124. Where the omission does not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer. Code, § 168. The first and second grounds of demurrer must be overruled, as the defect of parties does not appear on the face of the complaint.

The third ground of demurrer is based upon the plaintiffs' omission to make ——— Pankey the eldest son of Stephen Pankey, the deceased trustee, a party. Is he a necessary or proper party? This will depend upon whether or not the titles to the land vested in the cestui que trust upon the death of the said Lucy Covington. The complaint alleges that Lucy Covington conveyed the land by deed to the trustee, Pankey, in trust that he would convey the same at her death to her children and grandchildren surviving her. Is this a passive trust when the title passes directly through the trustee to the cestui que trust? In Bristow v. McCall (16 S. C., 548), the court say the statute of uses never executes the use while there is anything for the trustee to do necessary to the accomplishment of the trust created by the deed; when the trustee is charged with the performance of some duty in connection with the property which cannot be performed except by the authority of the legal title vested in him, the statute has no application. In Harley v. Platts (6 Rich., 315), it is stated that whenever any act is to be done by the trustee, as to convey, it is a trust, and not a use executed. The parties to this action do not claim as heirs at law, but through the deed to the trustee, Pankey. The complaint alleges that Pankey, the trustee, is dead. He either left an elder son or heirs, who should be made parties to this action. The third ground of demurrer must be sustained.

I do not see how the fourth ground of demurrer can be sustained. It refers to plaintiffs' omission to state whether or not plaintiffs and defendants have or own other lands in common. The rule of court provides that where infants are concerned, the complaint should contain such statement. It does not appear from the complaint that any of the parties to this action are infants. Even if it did so appear, I think plaintiffs should be allowed to amend. The fourth ground of demurrer must be overruled.

The fifth and last ground of demurrer alleges that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This ground of demurrer must also be overruled. The form of plaintiffs' complaint is objectionable, inasmuch as the names of parties, plaintiffs and defendants, are not set forth in the title. However, the requirements of the code will be satisfied if (as in this case) the names are intelligibly given in the body of the complaint. See 2 Wait Prac., 370.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the third ground of defendants' demurrer be sustained, and that the first, second, fourth, and fifth grounds of said demurrer be overruled, with leave to plaintiffs, within twenty days from notice of the filing of *this order, to amend their complaint by making the eldest son or heirs of Stephen Pankey, the deceased trustee, parties, if they should be so advised.

Plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. There is error in holding that the eldest son or heir of Stephen Pankey is a necessary party in this case. II. There is error in holding that this is not a passive trust. III. There is error in holding that in this case the use was not executed. IV. There is error in holding that the estate was not vested in the cestuis que trust. V. There is error in assuming that the deceased trustee left either son or heir, no such statement appearing on the face of the complaint. VI. There is error in ordering a party to be made on demurrer unless the name, residence, or some other designation be given to enable the plaintiff to make such party. VII. The cestuis que trust had an equitable title at least, and could have compelled the trustee, if living, to make a conveyance, and it was error to hold the contrary or require the intervention of his son or heirs.

Messrs. Prince & Dargan, for appellants.

Messrs. Dudley & Newton, Townsend & Livingston, D. D. McCall, contra.

July 22, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. One Lucy Covington, late of Marlboro County, died intestate in 1882. Previous to her death, to wit, in December, 1852, being the owner of a certain tract of land, containing 208 acres, and described in the complaint, she executed a deed by which she conveyed all of her right, title, and interest in said land to one Stephen Pankey, in trust that he would permit her to enjoy the land during her natural life without rendering rent or hire, and after her death that the said trustee would convey the same to her children then living or to the children of such as might be dead, in equal shares, such child or children taking the share which its parents would have taken had such parent survived Lucy. Lucy

and grandchildren. The deed to Pankey as trustee was duly recorded, but the trustee predeceased the said Lucy, and no other trustee has been substituted. Stephen Pankey, the trustee, was the father of Lucy, and the land was conveyed to him with certain personal property, his heirs and assigns forever, in trust, as stated. The land is in the possession of the defendant, William T. Newton, and his family. William T. Newton is the husband of Mary, the widow of a deceased son of the said Lucy.

It is claimed in the complaint that on the death of Lucy, an undivided estate in the land vested in the remaindermen mentioned in the trust deed, and the action seeks partition of said land between the plaintiff and the other remaindermen. The defendants, William T. Newton, his wife Mary, and Rebecca Wright, demurred to the complaint on five grounds—the first and second on the ground of defect of parties in the omission of certain persons therein named; the third on the ground that ——— Pankey, the eldest son of Stephen Pankey, the deceased trustee, is not made a party; the fourth on the ground that the plaintiffs omit to state in their complaint whether they and the defendants have or own any other lands in common in the State of South Carolina besides the land described in the complaint; the fifth because the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

His honor, Judge Witherspoon, who heard the cause, overruled all of the grounds except the third, which he sustained, holding that the eldest son of the trustee, or, if he be dead, the heirs of the trustee, should have been made parties; and he ordered that the plaintiffs have leave, within twenty days from notice of the filing of the order, to amend their complaint by making the eldest son or heirs of Stephen Pankey, the deceased trustee, parties, if they should be so advised. The plaintiffs have appealed on the ground that it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to hold that the eldest son (or heirs) of Stephen Pankey was a necessary party in the case. This holding is alleged to be error for various reasons stated in the grounds of appeal, all of which will be considered in connection with the question as *to the necessity of making the eldest son of the trustee or the heirs of the trustee parties to the action. No exception has been taken by the defendants to the ruling of the Circuit Judge as to the other grounds in the demurrer, so that the only question before the court is that raised in the appeal of the plaintiffs above.

There can be no doubt that in contests over real estate where the fee is involved, that the holder of the legal title is a necessary party, otherwise the fee cannot be disposed of so as to be binding and effectual; and this applies as well to a trustee holding for the benefit of others as to parties holding for themselves. Story Eq. Pl., § 207. And in cases where the fee is in a trustee and he be dead, if the estate be one of inheritance, the heirs or other proper representatives in the realty of the deceased should be made a party. Ibid., § 211; Leroy v. Charleston, 20 S. C., 77.

This is not denied by the appellants. It is contended, however, that by virtue of the statute the trusts under the deed in question were executed, and that thereby the legal title to the land in dispute vested in the cestuis que trust upon the death of Lucy, all of whom are before the court. The case turns upon the soundness of this position. Did the statute execute the trust? It is familiar law upon this subject, that a trust is never executed so long as there is anything to be done by the trustee in the proper discharge of his duties as said trustee; or, as was said in Bristow v. McCall (16 S. C., 548), "where the trustee is charged with the performance of some duty in connection with the property, which cannot be performed except by the authority of the legal title vested in him, the statute has no application." In McCaw v. Galbraith (7 Rich., 74), where one W. made a will in which he devised certain lands to one M. in trust, to have and hold for the use and benefit of a brother of the testator, if alive at his death, then residing in Ireland, the legal title to remain in the said M. until such time as the said brother, then an alien, should become qualified according to the act of Congress to take and hold real estate, and when he became so qualified, the said M. was directed to execute to the said brother a valid conveyance in fee of said lands, the court, in discussing the question whether *this use was executed by the statute, said: "Not only is there a declaration that the legal estate shall be vested in the trustee, but there is the requirement of an act to be done by him, the conveyance of the estate in fee, which necessarily supposes the fee in him."

In the case before the court there is the requirement of a similar act to be done by the trustee after the death of Lucy, the life-tenant. He is required to convey land to her children then living, or to the children of such as may be dead, in equal shares and proportions, the child or children of such deceased child or children representing his, her, or their father or mother, or fathers or mothers, and taking the share or shares which such father or mother, or fathers or mothers, would have taken had they survived. Trusts in favor of married women, or to preserve contingent remainders, are never executed. Jemey v. Laurens, 1 Speers, 365. Here the remainders were contingent, and it was necessary that the legal title should remain in the trustee until the contingency should happen, which was to determine who should take; which being determined, the trustee was directed to convey. This was an act to be done, and without which no title could pass. We do not think there was error in the Circuit Judge holding that this was not a passive trust, and that the use was not executed.

It is not necessary in a demurrer for defect of parties to give the names of those who should be joined. This, in many cases, would be utterly impossible. All that is necessary is to point out to the plaintiff the objection to his complaint in such manner as to enable him to amend by making proper parties. Story Eq. Pl., 543.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*ST. PHILIP'S CHURCH v. ZION PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

[1. Jury ⚭13.]

An action (1) for the recovery of a lot of land, or, failing in this, (2) for an order limiting the use of such lot, involved in its first phase an issue of title to real estate, which could be tried only by a jury, a jury trial not having been waived.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, March, 1884.

This was an action by the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Parish of St. Philip, in Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, against the Zion Presbyterian Church of Charleston, of Charleston County, commenced September 30, 1882. The opinion of this court sufficiently states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This action was tried by the court without a jury on the pleadings, the testimony taken before the master, and the argument of counsel. There were numerous objections made to the testimony, which I do not deem it necessary to consider severally. It is suffi*cient to say that few of the matters objected to (if any) involved facts which in any way affect the result I have reached, and I do not consider any of them well taken.

It will be noticed that plaintiffs' title to the land is controverted by the answer. This raises an issue which can only be determined by a jury trial, unless waived by the defendants. It has not been so waived. Dewalt v. Kinard, 19 S. C., 291. In so far, therefore, as plaintiffs seek to recover possession of the premises, they cannot have that relief at the hands of the court without a jury. In this view of the case it would not be necessary for me to pass upon the question of legal title as presented by the pleadings and the evidence. Lest, however, a different view may prevail elsewhere, I will proceed to give my conclusions in regard thereto.

I will premise by saying that the plaintiffs have established a perfect title in them at the time that the lots in question were conveyed to the Glebe Street Presbyterian Church, nor do I entertain a doubt that the law contended for by the plaintiffs is correct; that lands granted to a corporation, other than a moneyed or trading company, revert to the grantor on its dissolution by the expiration of its charter, unless there be a valid alienation during its existence. The doctrine is well stated by Chancellor Kent (2 Com., *282), thus: "Corporations have a fee simple for the purposes of alienation, but they have a determinable fee for the purpose of enjoyment. On the dissolution of the corporation, the reverter is to the original grantor or his heirs; but the grantor will be excluded by the alienation in fee, and in that way the incorporators may defeat the possibility of a reverter." And again, he says: "According to the old settled law of the land, where there is no special statute provision to the contrary, upon the civil death of a corporation, all its real estate remaining unsold reverts back to the original grantor or his heirs." 2

Com., *307. Says Mr. Blackstone: "A body politic may be dissolved, which dissolution is the civil death of the corporation, and in this case the lands and tenements shall revert to the person, or his heirs, who granted them to the corporation; for the law doth annex a condition to every such grant, that if the corporation be dissolved, the grantor shall have the land *again, because the cause of the grant faileth. The grant is, indeed, only during the life of the corporation, which may endure forever; but when that life is determined by the dissolution of the body politic, the grantor takes it back by reversion, as in the case of every other grant for life." 1 Bl. Com., 484.

It is not denied that this was the common law rule, but it is contended that it has generally been rejected in this country as to private corporations. The text writers, Angell & Ames, Dillon, Fields, and others, and even Chancellor Kent himself, are cited to this effect. Chancellor Kent in a note (2 Com., 307) says: "The rule of the common law has, in fact, become obsolete. It has never been applied to insolvent moneyed corporations in England. The sound doctrine now is * * * that the capital and debts of banking and other moneyed corporations constitute a trust fund for the payment of creditors and stockholders." "The rule of the common law in relation to the effect of dissolution upon the property and debts of a corporation has, in fact, become obsolete and odious. * * * Indeed, at this day, it may well be doubted whether, in the view at least of a Court of Equity, it has any application to other than public and eleemosynary corporations, in which it had its origin." Angell & Ames Corp., § 779, a.

Mr. Dillon says: "Since this doctrine has, in this country, been generally rejected as to private corporations, organized for pecuniary profit, and rests upon no foundation in reason or justice, it may perhaps be safely affirmed that it would not, on full consideration, be applied to the dissolution of a municipal corporation, by an absolute and unconditional repeal of its charter, or (if that may be done) to the case where the charter of such corporations is forfeited by a judicial sentence." (Dillon Mun. Corp., § 113.) Mr. Field says on this: "If, in the case of municipal corporations, a Court of Chancery will treat the corporation's assets as a trust fund in case of the dissolution of a corporation by legislative action, and will assume the execution of the trust, or see that it is properly executed, as has been noticed, the same rule ought to prevail in cases of private corporations for pecuniary gain, and the tendency of recent opinions seems to support this view; and to sustain the doctrine that the surplus *assets, after the satisfaction of the claims of creditors, and the payment of expenses, even in the absence of statutory provisions on the subject, belong to the stockholders; that lands conveyed to such a corporation for full consideration in fee do not revert to the grantor, and the doctrine of the old common law in such cases as to reversion and forfeiture of the corporate property, if applicable at all, is not applicable to private corporations for pecuniary emolument." Field Corp., § 491.

A number of cases is cited to sustain the doctrine so laid down, the most authoritative of which, perhaps, is that of Bacon v. Robertson, 18 How., 480 [15 L. Ed. 499], in which Judge Campbell says: "Modern legislation has modified the odious rule of the common law, that upon the dissolution of a corporation its remaining real estate unsold reverts to the grantor and his heirs, and the courts, in a similar spirit, hold that where a corporation is authorized to acquire a fee simple to lands belonging to private persons for public use, and such acquisition is had, and compensation accepted, no reversionary estate remains, but the property may be used for any purpose, or may be disposed of by the corporation." That was the case of a municipal corporation dissolved by a decree of the court, and there seems to be no doubt that upon the dissolution of the charter of a private moneyed corporation, or of a municipal corporation, by an act of legislature or judicial decree, the assets of such corporation will be applied to the payment of the debts of the corporation, and the remainder be divided among the stockholders.

Mr. Field says (§ 492): "This right of creditors and stockholders is based not only upon natural justice and manifest equity, but it has recently been held that it is protected by the provisions of the constitution of the United States." The principal case referred to there is that of Curran v. Arkansas (15 How., 305 [14 L. Ed. 705]), which is a very instructive authority on this point reviewing the previous cases. Curtis, J., delivering the opinion of the court, quotes from Mumma v. Potomac Company (8 Pet., 281 [8 L. Ed. 945]), where it is said, "The obligation of these contracts survives, and the creditors may enforce their claims against any property belonging to the corporation which has not passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers, but is still held in trust for the company, *or for the stockholders thereof, at the time of its dissolution in any mode permitted by the local laws." The learned judge then proceeds: "Indeed, if it be once admitted that the property of an insolvent trading corporation, while under the management of its officers, is a trust fund in their hands for the benefit of creditors, it follows that a Court of Equity, which never allows a trust to fail for want of a trustee, would see to the execution of that trust, although by a dissolution of the corporation the legal title to its property had been changed." Id., 311.

These citations are sufficient to show what the common law rule is, and how far, and upon what principles, it has been modified. It has been seen that at common law every grant of land to a corporation was a grant for the life of the body politic. That it conferred a power of alienation, but was also coupled with a reservation of the reversion, if the land should not be aliened during the life of the corporation. A reversion is not a new estate, arising at the termination of the grant, but a remnant of the estate not granted. It is "the residue of an estate left in the grantor to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted by him." 2 Bl. Com., 175. Whenever, under this law, there was a grant in fee of land from an individual to a corporation, there was left in the grantor this residuum of the estate, subject to be divested by an alienation during the existence of the corporation.

By an act of the colonial legislature, 1712 (2 Stat., 413, § 5): "All and every part of the common law of England," where the same was not altered by the English statutes therein made of force, or "inconsistent with the particular constitution and laws of this province" (with certain other specified exceptions), was made and declared to be "in as full force and virtue within this province as the same is, or ought to be, within the said kingdom of England." In the general statutes of 1872 (p. 767, § 10) and in the general statutes of 1882 (§ 2738) the same common law was continued of force. By this legislation the common law, as it existed in 1712, not inconsistent with the constitution, usages, and customs of the then province, and not since changed by statute, is made the law of South Carolina. By that law the reversion of lands conveyed in fee to a corporation remained in *the grantor—an estate vested and transmissible to his heirs by descent.

That this has continued the law in South Carolina has been recognized in several cases. Elliott v. Morris, Harp. Eq., 281; Attorney General v. Society for the Relief of Elderly and Disabled Ministers, 10 Rich. Eq., 605. In the last case the opinion of the Court of Errors was delivered by Ch. Dunkin for all the judges. Supposing a case where a corporation would cease to exist, he says: "The real estate, if any, of the corporation would revert to the grantor."

I am now considering a question of the legal right to an estate. This estate is shown to be in the grantor upon the dissolution of a corporation holding lands. How, then, can I notice the questions of trust relied on to prevent the operation of the legal results in this case? Is there any power in a court of law to divest a vested legal estate in land in order to enforce an equity? I can find none. If the law in question is odious, as has been said, the legislature and not the courts should alter it. Until so altered it is the duty of a court of law to declare and enforce it. I admit that courts of law are called upon to apply the maxims of the common law so modified and varied as to meet the novel exigencies of modern society; but where the common law recognizes the legal right to an estate to be in a particular person, under a particular state of circumstances, and that common law has been perpetuated by repeated and the latest statutory enactments, and recognized by the dicta of some of the ablest of our modern judges, I can find nothing to justify me in attempting to change the law in order to meet the requirements of a supposed necessity or expediency.

In saying this, I do not mean to intimate an opinion that in equity the rights of creditors and stockholders, if there were any, of a defunct corporation would not be enforced whenever brought properly before a court administering equity. I agree entirely that they would be, and believe that the cases cited fully sustain the equity doctrine in favor of creditors and stockholders, both here and in England. Such a doctrine is entirely consistent with the right of the grantor to the legal estate of reverter. To enforce such trusts, equity would follow the legal estate in the *hands of the grantor after he had recovered it at law. This is what is meant by the passage cited from Curran v. Arkansas, to the effect that a Court of Equity would see to the execution of the trust, "although, by a dissolution of the corporation, the legal title to its property had been changed." What "change of legal title," affected by a dissolution, can here be meant but the reverter to the grantor?

I think, however, that this doctrine of equity would not go beyond securing the creditor and stockholders of a trading or moneyed corporation. So far as I am aware, it has never been extended further than this except in the case of a municipal corporation. There are no stockholders in a religious or charitable corporation, and here the equitable relief in such cases would seem to be confined to the case of creditors of necessity. How could equity administer the assets of a corporation like this, after it was dissolved, for the benefit of the individuals composing the congregation? No such instance has been brought to the notice of the court, and it seems to me that the authorities relied upon to maintain the doctrine are all cases of corporations connected with trades, except alone the case of a municipal corporation when it had been decreed forfeited by the courts.

Much more might be said in support of the views I have here expressed, but I think what I have already said sufficient to indicate my reasons for the opinion I have formed.

While, however, I am with the plaintiffs on this point of law, I am of opinion that it cannot avail them here, because the premises in question were duly conveyed by the Glebe Street Presbyterian Church to the Zion Presbyterian Church, by the deed of conveyance of May 10, 1866; and the charter rights of Zion Presbyterian Church were continued by their recharter on September 4, 1880, under the act of 1874. The sufficiency of the deed of alienation has been questioned, on the ground that the seal thereto was not duly proven to be the seal of the corporation. A wafer was used for a seal, but that is a sufficient seal, if so intended. Relph & Co. v. Gist, 4 McCord, 267. That it was so intended in this case is to be derived from the circumstances that the corporation authorized the deed to be made by the president; that there was no regular corporation seal, and *that this wafer was affixed to the deed, signed by the president, and tested by the words "witness the seal of the said Glebe Street Presbyterian Church," attested by the signature of its president, &c.

Says Mr. Fields: "On general principles, any mode of impression which would answer for private seals, in the absence of other statutory regulations, would be good in the case of corporation seals." § 283. "It may appoint an agent to convey by resolution not under seal." §§ 283, 285. And "the common seal of a corporation affixed to an instrument purporting to be executed by the proper agent, makes it a specialty where such an instrument is required, and has the same effect as if executed in a like case by a natural person." Ibid. It is immaterial what is used as a seal when an impression is required, "provided it is something adopted by the corporation, or by its authorized agent, and is placed upon the instrument by the proper agent, or even by his directions." Ibid., § 287. "When executed by the proper agent or officer of the corporation, and sealed, though by the impression of the common desk seal of a merchant, it will be presumed to be the seal of the corporation until rebutted by competent evidence." Ibid.

It is said in Angell & Ames on Corporations, § 218: "We see no reason, unless the act of incorporation expressly provides what the common seal shall be, why the substitute allowed for the private seal of an individual should not be allowed for the seal of a corporation." "In a note to section 288 of Mr. Fields' work it is said, a vote authorizing a committee to sell land empowers them to make the necessary deeds in the name of the corporation, and if the committee consists of several, who all sign their names, only one seal is necessary." Decker v. Freeman, 3 Greenl. [Me.] 338. Authority to make a deed would imply power to adopt a seal where no regular corporate seal has been shown to have been adopted by the body.

I therefore think the deed sufficient on this ground. But after possession for so long a time under the deed, without any disaffirmance on the part of the corporation, the act of the agent would be considered as having been affirmed and the corporation *would be bound. If the deed was good as against them, it would bind all other persons.

As to the effect of the renewal of the charter of the Zion Presbyterian Church, of Charleston, I will assign a few reasons why I have held it sufficient to continue the chartered rights of the defendants. In regard to corporations of this class, the act of 1874 delegated to the clerk full power to grant charters in the mode therein prescribed. It is conceded that, on the creation of a new corporation, upon the dissolution of an old one, the title to the lands belonging to the old corporation does not revive in the new, except as against the State. "In England it would require an act of parliament to revive the title as against the original grantor, or his heirs, but it would be at least questionable whether any statute with us could work such an entire renovation, because vested rights cannot be divested by statute." 2 Kent, *309. I think this cannot be questioned.

The point under consideration, therefore, depends upon whether there was a renovation of the Zion Presbyterian Church, of Charleston, or was it the creation of a new company after the dissolution of the old? The petition was signed by the president and secretary and eight other members of the corporation, and asked for a charter for the Zion Presbyterian Church, of Charleston, under the provisions of the act of 1874. Notice was published in the News and Courier, a gazette published in Charleston, December 9, 1878, that a petition had been filed with the clerk of the court for Charleston County for the renewal of the charter of the Zion Presbyterian Church, of Charleston, S. C., pursuant to act of assembly approved February 20, 1874. This proceeding to obtain a recharter under the act of 1874 was commenced before the expiration of the former charter. The clerk was not authorized by the act to renew, but to grant charters, yet the granting of a charter to a corporation by the same name, and with the same powers, before the expiration of the former charter would be but a renewal of the charter in effect. I think, therefore, that nothing can be gained by the contention that this is not a renewal, but a new charter. A corporation may lay down its old charter and take a new one without discontinuing the corporate life or the corporate privileges, even though the *funds be appropriated to other and different objects under the new charter. Attorney General v. Clergy Society, 10 Rich. Eq., 604.

The charter here expired before the actual issue of the new charter by the clerk. The act required the notice to be published thirty days before the time of the application, and if no objection should be made within ten days thereafter, the clerk was required to grant the charter. Under the notice given here, if no objection was made on or before January 19, 1879, the petitioners were entitled to have their charter. It was the duty of the clerk to issue the charter on January 20, 1879. It was not, in fact, issued until September 4, 1880, after the old charter had expired by its own limitation. If the clerk had done his duty under the act, the rights of the corporation would have been preserved. Are they to be defeated by his omission of duty? I think not. The new charter, in my opinion, relates back, and will be treated as taking effect from the day when the corporation was entitled to have the charter issued under the act, and it operated, therefore, to continue the corporation with all its previous powers, as in the case of a sheriff's deed, which relates back to the sale so as to protect the possession of the purchaser. McCall v. Campbell, MSS, Dec.; Kingman v. Glover, 3 Rich., 27 [45 Am. Dec. 756]; Bank v. Manufacturing Co., 3 Stroh., 192 [49 Am. Dec. 640]. Upon the same principle, the charter here should protect the corporation from the forfeitures consequent upon a dissolution under the circumstances.

There can be no doubt of the intention of the corporation to renew and continue their corporate powers by the new charter, and it is said always to be a question of intention where a corporation takes a new charter. Angell & Ames on Corporations, § 780. Nor do I think it material that the clerk added to the name of the corporation the words "of Charleston County." See Fields on Corporations, § 24. I conclude, therefore, that plaintiffs have not established a legal right to recover possession of the premises.

It remains to consider the right of the plaintiffs to the equitable relief demanded, to wit, a restraining order to confine the defendants to the use of the property, in accordance with the trusts and conditions contained in the original lease of the same to Caldwell and others. It is only upon this ground that plaintiffs seek to restrain the defendants, and not because the proposed use of the premises injure them as owners of adjacent lots and tenements.

I fail to see how the trusts of the lease attach to the deed of release. I am of opinion that the effect of the conveyance to Glebe Street Church of the fee of the land destroyed the previous estate held by them as lessees; that the two estates merged, and that the conditions annexed to the lease were extinguished. Where two estates meet in the same person, without any intermediate estate, the less is merged in the greater. 2 Bl. Com., 177; 4 Kent, 100; Mangum v. Piester, 16 S. C., 330. If the feoffor or lessor release to feoffee or lessee all conditions or all demands in the land or confirm the estate of the feoffee, without condition by either of these means, the condition is destroyed forever. Shep. Touch., 158. Though all conditions are extinguished by merger of the particular estate with the reversion at law, in equity trusts are preserved. 4 Kent, 102. But if the trust estate and the legal estate unite in the same person, the trust is extinguished. 2 Wash. Real. Prop., 470. The equitable estate is merged in the legal. Ibid. For no man can be a trustee to himself. Hill Trust., 25; Lewin Trusts, 16.

Here the plaintiffs claim that there was a trust or a condition as to the user of the land which they had an equitable right to have enforced by injunction. Such a trust or condition was annexed to the lease, but when they conveyed the fee to the lessees the trust was at an end, because the conveyance was without qualification or condition, and accompanied by the usual warranties. The recital does not qualify the deed in any particular. Its office was only to trace the history of the transaction, and to describe the relations of the parties in regard to the property and to each other, leading up to the grant, which was absolute in its terms. Deeds are to be taken most strongly against the grantors, and if the form of the conveyance is absolute, as here, nothing is to be taken as intended that is not plainly expressed in the deed.

Holding these views, I am led to the conclusion that plaintiffs have no right of action upon any of the grounds claimed. It is needless to consider any other questions made in the case, since the result would not be changed thereby.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the complaint be dismissed, and that the plaintiffs pay the costs herein.

Both the plaintiffs and defendants appeal from the foregoing decree, upon the following exceptions:

Plaintiffs' Exceptions.

1. Because his honor erred in holding as follows: "It will be noticed that plaintiffs' title to the land is controverted by the answer. This raises an issue which can only be determined by a jury trial, unless waived by the defendants. It has not been so waived. In so far, therefore, as plaintiffs seek to recover possession of the premises, they cannot have that relief at the hands of the court without a jury."

2. Because his honor erred in holding that "the premises in question were duly conveyed by the Glebe Street Presbyterian Church to the Zion Presbyterian Church by the deed of conveyance of May 10, 1866," and that the same was an alienation. And that "the charter rights of Zion Presbyterian Church were continued by their recharter on September 4, 1880, under the act of 1874."

3. Because his honor erred in holding the said deed of May 10, 1866, to be the deed of the corporation and sufficient as such.

4. Because his honor erred in holding as follows: "But after possession for so long a time under the deed, without any disavowance on the part of the corporation, the act of the agent would be considered as having been affirmed, and the corporation would be bound. If the deed was good as against them, it would bind all other persons."

5. Because his honor erred in holding that the charter granted by the clerk of the court on September 4, 1880, to the defendants, "The Zion Presbyterian Church, of Charleston, of Charleston County," did not create a new corporation, but was a renovation or a renewal or a continuance of the corporation known as "the "Zion Presbyterian Church, of Charleston," with all its previous powers and rights.

6. Because his honor erred in holding that "plaintiffs have not established a legal right to recover possession of the premises."

7. Because his honor erred in holding that the trusts of the lease from the plaintiffs to John Caldwell and others did not attach to the deed of release, but that the conditions annexed to the lease were extinguished and the trust at an end, and that the recital does not qualify the deed in any particular.

8. Because his honor erred in concluding that "plaintiffs have no right of action upon any of the grounds claimed," and in dismissing the complaint.

Defendants' Exceptions.

That the court erred in holding that "lands granted to a corporation other than a moneyed or trading company revert to the grantor on its dissolution by the expiration of its charter, unless," &c. This ancient right of reverter, it is submitted, is in this State "obsolete and odious"; or, if existing at all, exists only as to corporations purely public or eleemosynary, and churches or religious corporations are neither.

Messrs. McCrady, Sons & Bacot and C. R. Miles, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Buist & Buist, A. G. Magrath, and H. E. Young, for defendants.

July 22, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The contest in this case is in reference to a certain lot of land with a church edifice thereon, located in the city of Charleston. It is admitted that the land originally belonged to the plaintiff, and the present contest has grown out of the following facts and circumstances.

The plaintiff is, and has been for years, a body politic and corporate, under the laws of this State. In May, 1847, it conveyed the land in dispute, by indenture of lease, to John Caldwell and others, the survivor or survivors of them, and their assigns for a term of ninety-nine years, with the privilege and so on from time to time forever, the same being made upon the consideration and agreement therein set forth, that the grantees or their assigns should, within a reasonable time after the execution of said indenture, erect upon the premises granted a Presbyterian church, and that the said lots shall be used for no other purpose whatever other than for the erection of the said Presbyterian church, and that in case of any attempt on the part of the said grantees or their assigns to convert the said lots granted to any purpose whatever other than those therein declared, then and thereafter it should be lawful for the grantor to re-enter and the same to have again and re-possess, as in their first and former estate, right, and title; and further, that said grantee or assigns should apply to the legislature of the State at its next session for an act of incorporation, creating the said grantees, and such other persons as they should admit, a body politic and corporate under the name of the "Glebe Street Presbyterian Church * * * upon the creation of which, the said grantees should assign and set over the said lease unto the said 'Glebe Street Presbyterian Church.'"

In pursuance of this agreement application was made to the legislature, and by act of 1847, the free white persons who were then, or who might thereafter become, members of the Glebe Street Presbyterian Church of the city of Charleston, were duly incorporated under the name and style aforesaid, for the term of fourteen years, and thereupon the grantees aforesaid, to wit, Caldwell and others, in consideration of the agreement contained in the indenture aforesaid, did, on December —, 1847, convey and assign the said indenture of lease, and their rights thereunder to the said Glebe Street Presbyterian Church. Afterwards, to wit, in 1856, the plaintiffs, who still held the fee in said premises, for and in consideration of $2,400 paid by the said Glebe Street Presbyterian Church to the plaintiffs, by deed, setting forth the indenture, and the assignment thereof, bargained, sold, and released the said premises unto the said Glebe Street Church and their assigns forever, warranting and defending the same against all persons whatsoever.

In 1858, the Zion Presbyterian Church of Charleston, defendant, was constituted a body politic and corporate for a period of *twenty-one years. This charter expired in 1879. In 1878, however, public notice having been given of their purpose to apply for a renewal of charter, the president, secretary, and other members of said church petitioned the clerk of the court for Charleston County for a charter, under the act of 1874. This petition, though filed before the expiration of the previous charter, was not acted upon until in September, 1880, when a charter was granted.

In 1866, the Glebe Street Church, its first charter having expired in 1859, at which time it had been renewed for a period of fourteen years, conveyed by deed, dated May 10, 1866, the said premises to the said Zion Presbyterian Church, reciting therein that the congregation heretofore worshipping in the said Glebe Street Church had united with the congregation of white persons worshipping in the Zion Presbyterian Church, and that the two had agreed to form one congregation, and that all church property standing in the name of the Glebe Street Church should belong to the Zion Church, the said Zion Presbyterian Church having assumed the payment and discharge of the liens upon said land. The Zion Presbyterian Church took possession, under this deed, and continued in possession from its date until the ——— day of ———, when it contracted to sell the same to certain trustees of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, known as the Mount Zion African Methodist Episcopal Church, and to execute a conveyance thereof on the payment of the purchase money, in pursuance of which contract the said trustees were duly let into possession.

Under these circumstances the action below was commenced. First, for the recovery of the premises, but in the event that such recovery could not be had, then that the defendant be enjoined from executing a conveyance of said premises to the said African Methodist Episcopal Church, or to any one else, contrary to the alleged conditions upon which the defendants held the property. This action was founded upon the following propositions contended for by the plaintiffs: 1. That the lease by plaintiff Caldwell and others, and the subsequent conveyance by the plaintiff to the Glebe Street Church, should be construed together, and that when thus construed, the conditions in the lease should *attach to the conveyance, thereby preventing said Glebe Street Church from conveying the property to any other use than for a Presbyterian church, on pain of forfeiture and reversion to the plaintiff. 2. That the Glebe Street Presbyterian Church made no alienation during its corporate existence of the property in question, and its charter having expired in 1873, and not being a moneyed or trading corporation, said property reverted to the plaintiff, the original grantor. 3. Admitting that the deed to the Zion Church, in 1866, was properly executed, and having been executed before the expiration of the charter of the Glebe Street Church, thereby prevented a reversion of said expiration, then it is claimed that the charter of the Zion Presbyterian Church has expired without and before alienation, and on that account a reversion has taken place.

The case was heard by his honor, Judge Kershaw, without a jury, upon testimony taken before the master, and reported to the court. His honor held, first, that inasmuch as the action in one of its phases involved title to land, an issue was raised thereby which could be tried by a jury only, unless a jury trial had been waived; and there being no waiver, he could not hear that portion of the case. He, however, discussed the questions involving the title and then proceeded to the consideration of the right of plaintiff to the equitable relief demanded, to wit, a restraining order intended to confine the defendants to the use of the property, according to the trusts and conditions contained in the original lease to Caldwell and others.

On the question of the right of reversion to the plaintiff, he held that the Glebe Street Church, to whom the plaintiff had conveyed, being a corporation other than a moneyed or trading corporation, that reversion would take place to the plaintiff on the dissolution of the said Glebe Street Church by expiration of its charter, unless before that time a valid alienation of the land had been made by said Glebe Street Church corporation, holding it to be a general principle of law, that upon the expiration of the charters of all corporations, causing their dissolution, other than moneyed, trading, or municipal corporations, the property thereof reverts to the grantor, unless before the dissolution a valid alienation has been made, subject, however, to the rights of creditors and stockholders, if any.

He held, further, that a valid alienation of the property in question had been made by the Glebe Street Church during its corporate existence to the defendant, the Zion Presbyterian Church, to wit, by deed in 1866; and therefore notwithstanding the subsequent dissolution of the Glebe Street Church corporation by expiration of its charter in 1873, no reversion could be claimed, alienation having been made before that event. He held, further, that there had been no such dissolution of the Zion Presbyterian Church by expiration of its charter as to entitle the plaintiff to a reversion on that ground. And holding, further, that the original lease to Caldwell and others, which had been assigned to the Glebe Street Church, had become merged in the fee simple, which said church afterwards obtained from the plaintiff, thereby vacating and annulling the conditions of said lease, he dismissed the complaint with costs.

Both parties have appealed, the plaintiff assigning error to all of the rulings above, except the second, and the defendant contesting the second, claiming that the ancient right of reverter in this State "is obsolete and odious," or, if existing at all, it exists only as to corporations purely public and eleemosynary.

We concur with the Circuit Judge in all of his rulings, and he has so fully and ably discussed the principles upon which these rulings were based, sustaining them, as he does, by the authorities cited in the decree, that we might content ourselves with simply referring to and adopting the decree as our own, which we would do, except for the fact it would be best, perhaps, that at least the distinct points made and decided should appear in this opinion.

The action below was intended to accomplish one of two purposes, to wit, first, the recovery of the land in dispute, and, second, failing in the first, a restraining order as demanded in the complaint. The first was a case at law, involving an issue of title to real estate, and nothing more. This was a jury case, and the Circuit Judge was certainly right in holding that, in the absence of waiver, he could not try it, and he distinctly states that there was no waiver. De Walt v. Kinard, 19 S. C., 291.

*As to the second, to wit, the right of reverter in a case of this kind. While the view which we have taken as to the third ground of appeal removes this question from the case to a great extent, and therefore renders its adjudication unnecessary here, yet without committing the court to a final conclusion, we will say that we think the authorities referred to by the Circuit Judge fully sustain his decree thereon, and we need not do more, therefore, than simply cite these authorities. See 2 Kent, 282, 307; 1 Bl. Com., 484; Angell & Ames Corp., § 779n; Dill. Mun. Corp., § 113; Field, Corp., § 491; Bacon v. Robertson, 18 How., 480 [15 L. Ed. 499]; Elliott v. Morris, Harp. Eq., 281.

The judge, however, held that the plaintiffs could not avail themselves of this doctrine in this case, because the Glebe Street Church, before the expiration of its charter, had conveyed to the defendant. It is not denied that if this be true, it would defeat the reversion, but it is denied that a valid deed had been executed by the Glebe Street Church to the defendant. So that the only point in this question is, was there a valid deed executed by the Glebe Street Church in 1866 to the defendant? There is no doubt that a paper purporting to be a deed between these parties and conveying this land was executed and delivered at the time stated, the date of the execution being years before the expiration of the charter of the Glebe Street Church. The deed was drawn by a distinguished attorney of Charleston, who also witnessed it. It was recorded, was regular in form and execution in every respect, except that instead of having an established corporation seal impressed, the seal used consisted of a wafer attached. The judge held that this seal was sufficient, if so intended, citing Rolph & Co. v. Gist, 4 McCord, 267; Angell & Ames Corp., § 218; Decker v. Freeman, 3 Greenl. [Me.] 338. Whether it was so intended was a question of fact which the judge, upon the evidence, solved in favor of the deed. We think the testimony sustains his conclusion.

Next, The plaintiff contends that defendant's charter having expired since its purchase of the land, with no alienation before said expiration, that reverter has taken place on that account, and therefore their action should have been sustained. The Circuit Judge overruled this position, and we think, upon the facts, *that he was right. The defendant's original charter was obtained in 1858 for a term of twenty-one years. In 1878, the year before the expiration of this charter by its own terms, the church, through its officers and other members, gave notice of its purpose to apply to the clerk of the court, under the act of 1874, for a renewal of its charter, and filed a petition to that end. This petition, though thus early filed, was not acted upon by the clerk until 1880. Why this delay, is not stated, but it does not seem to have been the fault of the church, nor does it appear that the church had abandoned its right to the renewal of which notice had been given. The clerk, however, acted in 1880, and granted a charter. We think with the Circuit Judge, that under the circumstances, and in analogy to the execution of a sheriff's deed relating back to the sale when executed after the sale, and protecting a defendant in possession, that this charter should relate back to the notice and petition. McCall v. Campbell, MSS, Dec.; Kingman v. Glover, 3 Rich., 27 [45 Am. Dec. 756]; Bank v. Manufacturing Co., 3 Stroh., 192 [49 Am. Dec. 640]. The granting of this new charter was held by the Circuit Judge to be in effect a renewal of the old, and therefore the property of the old was still preserved and retained. See Attorney General v. Clergy Society, 10 Rich. Eq., 604; Ang. & Ames Corp., § 780.

Lastly, Did the Circuit Judge err in holding that the conditions of the lease did not attach to the subsequent deed conveying the land in fee to the Glebe Street Church? We think not. That deed was absolute on its face and in its terms. No such conditions as those appearing in the lease were incorporated in the deed. It was executed upon a further and valuable money consideration, the sum of $2,400, which was paid. It conveyed the fee, and we can see no reason why, under the doctrine of merger, the lease was not "drowned" in the higher estate the moment the Glebe Street Church received the deed and took possession thereunder. It was said in Mangum v. Piester (16 S. C., 330), sustained by Blackstone and Kent, that where two estates meet in the same person, without any intermediate estate, the less is merged in the greater. Here these facts occurred, and merger must have been the result.

*It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

23 S. C. 316

ROLLINGS v. EVANS.

[1. Homestead ¶159.]

Judgment was obtained against a married man, after which his wife died, leaving no one residing with him except an adult married son, whose wife was living apart from her husband. Levy was then made, and a homestead and chattel exemption laid off, to both of which exceptions were taken by the creditors. Pending these exceptions, the debtor again married. Held, that the defendant was "the head of a family" at the date of the levy and was therefore entitled to both homestead and chattel exemption.

[2. Homestead ¶95.]

Moreover, the debtor, at the hearing below, was entitled to his homestead as the head of a family by virtue of his second marriage before sale had, even if not such head at the time of the levy previously made.

[3. Homestead ¶66.]

The finding of the Circuit Judge, that the homestead laid off was not excessive, affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 93, 96, 97; Dec. Dig. ¶66.]

Before Kershaw, J., Sumter, October, 1884.

The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

This case was heard upon exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the return of the commissioners setting apart the homestead of the defendant.

At the October term, 1883, the plaintiff obtained his judgment; in December thereafter the defendant's wife died, leaving the defendant and an adult son, who had always resided in the family, occupying the homestead. On January 30, 1884, the plaintiff lodged and levied an execution on the land upon which was situated the family homestead. On February 12 thereafter the defendant applied for the homestead, and the same was set aside for him by commissioners duly appointed for that purpose on February 16. On May 1, 1884, the defendant married a second time, and continued to reside upon the homestead with his wife and adult son as before.

*The plaintiff excepted to the assignment of the homestead on two grounds: First. Because the defendant was not a married man, or the head of a family, at the time of the aforesaid levy of the homestead. Second. Because the assignment was excessive, in that the land assigned was worth more than one thousand dollars. I shall consider these objections in their order.

1. Was the defendant the head of a family at the time of the levy of plaintiff's execution? He was not then a married man, but a widower, residing on the homestead with an adult son, who had always resided with him as a part of his family. When the judgment of plaintiff was obtained and entered, he was the head of a family and entitled to the homestead. If he continued to be the head of a family after the death of his then wife, by reason of his son continuing to reside with him as before, he continued to be entitled to a homestead up to the time of the levy and assignment.

In the first place, I premise by saying that I cannot agree with the remark of Chief Justice Moses, in Garaty v. Du Bose (5 S. C., 500), that the maxim that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed, is to be applied to a constitutional provision like this, though the observation may have been well enough, qualified as it was. Mr. Cooley says, "There can seldom be either propriety or safety in applying this maxim to constitutions." Con. Lim., 74. I may also remark that the policy of the people of this State has been demonstrated to be a liberal one in this regard, for when the courts have limited it by construction, the constitution or the statutes have been amended to establish the right so questioned.

In the case just cited, it is said "that the exemption was intended not alone as a benefit to the head of the family, but to those whose relations to the head of the family demand, on the one hand, support and protection, and on the other require a contribution by the aid of their labor to the maintenance and conduct of the general establishment to which they belong. This would naturally be the case between parent and minor children, who, in terms, are embraced within the exemption. It would not follow that, although the head of a family might not be a parent, the one substituted as a head would lose the favor of the *provision, for it would extend to one having under his roof those so connected with him by the ties of residence and association as to become part and parcel of his household, changing their domicile with him, and having no residence but that which they enjoy under his favor. It is not necessary to constitute a family that the relation of parent and child must exist."

The definition of family, as given by Mr. Webster, is quoted there as follows: "The collective body of persons who live in one house and under one head or manager." In Bradley v. Rodelsperger (3 S. C., 226), it was held that a childless widow might be the head of a family, the court saying, "There is no ground for holding that a person without children cannot occupy the position of head of a family." In Moore v. Parker (13 S. C., 487), it is said, "An unmarried man is not the head of a family, unless made so by having children, or perhaps other members of a household, around him constituting a family." This was a remark of the Circuit Judge, which the Supreme Court affirms, saying, "The petitioner, though childless, might nevertheless have been the head of a family." This, of course could only mean that a family may consist of other persons than a wife or child, if dwelling together as members of the same household and under the protection of the same head.

It is the family relation, therefore, which constitutes the family, and the mere attainment of his majority by a child who continues under the protection and control, and resides under his roof, laboring for the father, as he did during his minority, does not, in my opinion, change the family relation between them. Says Chancellor Kent (2 Com., 190): "A father's house is always open to his children. The best feelings of our nature establish and consecrate this asylum. Under the thousand pains and perils of human life, the home of the parents is to the children a sure refuge from evil and a consolation in distress. In the intenseness, the lively touches, and unsubdued nature of parental affection, we discern the wisdom and goodness of the great Author of our being and Father of mercies." It is this principle of nature, nourished by religion, which constitutes home, the best foundation for human society, social and political; the unit of the State; the soundest basis upon which it can rest; *the strongest safeguard against anarchy, agrarianism, and revolution.

To preserve this sacred institution for the good of the State is the true object of these exemptions—to prevent the dispersion of families and the severance of those sacred ties which make the home the great conservative feature of a republican state. The framers of the constitution never could have contemplated the destruction of the family as soon as the children became of age, and the father bereft of the comfort and solace and support of the wife of his love and mother of his children, and leave him desolate and a wanderer in his old age. The principles involved in these questions are higher and more important than those affecting merely the rights of property. They cannot be safely settled by analogies derived alone from the business relations of men. They are to be construed in no narrow, technical spirit, but upon broad, liberal, and humane principles.

Hence it is that it has been decided that a homestead, once duly acquired by a man, the head of a family, is not lost by the subsequent death, marriage, and removal of all the family but himself. Kessler v. Draub, 52 Tex., 575 [36 Am. Rep. 727]. In Silloway v. Brown (12 Allen [Mass.] 34), the husband was held entitled to the homestead when the wife died and the children moved away. Doyle v. Coburn (6 Allen [Mass.] 71) and Woods v. Davis (34 Iowa, 264), are cases where the wife was divorced and given the custody of the children, yet the husband was held entitled to the homestead. In the latter case the court said: "Although a homestead estate cannot be acquired except by the head of a family, yet when once acquired and still occupied by him, it has been held not to be defeated or lost by the death or absence of his wife and children." This was under a statute which limited the exemption to a "householder" "having a family." Thomp. Homest. § 72.

It is there said that in a late case in Georgia the opinion is expressed by Jackson, J., that it was not the intention of the framers of the constitution of that State, in establishing the provision guaranteeing the homestead exemption, to break up a man's family just as soon as his wife died and his children became of age. If they had all left him, their voluntary departure would have *broken it up; if they remained with him, especially daughters, dependent upon him as much when twenty-one as when twenty, they would still be in the sense of the constitution, a legitimate and component part of his family, and he would be entitled in law to a home for himself as their head, and for them as his household. Blackwell v. Broughton, 56 Ga., 392. See, also, Taylor v. Boulware, 17 Tex., 74 [67 Am. Dec. 642].

There are conflicting decisions, and the statutes are not all alike, but the decisions cited are all more or less applicable to the case at bar. Upon the whole, therefore, I conclude that the defendant did not lose the right of homestead at the death of his wife. I have not noticed the fact that the son of the defendant who resides with him is a married man, and that his wife does not live with him, because I do not consider that this circumstance can affect the view I have taken unfavorably. If the son's wife lived with him as a part of the defendant's family, and especially if they had children, there would no longer be a doubt that the defendant would be entitled to the homestead as the head of the family. The wife may at any moment return to the house where the husband resides, and if she has children, bring them with her. In this case it does not appear that the son has no children.

II. If, however, I am in error in the view I have taken above, and the defendant was not entitled to the homestead at the time of the levy, is he now entitled? The case of Pender v. Lancaster (14 S. C., 25 [37 Am. Rep. 720]) is relied on by the plaintiff as authority to support the negative. In that case it was held that where an execution debtor marries after a levy upon his personal property, but before a sale thereof, he does not thereby become entitled to the homestead exemption. The decision there is placed upon the ground that the levy gave the plaintiff a lien or special property in the chattel levied and seized upon, which was prior in time to the accrual of the right of homestead, and according to the maxim, qui prior est in tempore, prior est de jure, the right of homestead arising subsequently could not divest the prior right of the plaintiff. The learned judge cites no authority for the view taken by the court, but rests it simply upon the ground stated.

It is stated in the opinion that there is no difference in the nature of the liens acquired by the levy of an execution of personal property, and that acquired upon real property by the entry of judgment, inasmuch as both are amenable to the rule that rights must be determined according to their respective priorities. This observation of Justice Willard is only a part of the reasoning adopted, and not a point decided, and, therefore, may, without presumption, be inquired into by a Circuit Judge. With all deference, I think there is a material difference between the effect of a levy of execution upon personal property, and an entry of judgment, creating a lien on real property.

The levy of an execution on personalty conveys a special property in the chattel seized, and transfers the possession to the sheriff. He may have an action to recover the possession, even against the owner, if he detains it after levy. The property of the owner is divested, and the sheriff may sell the chattels at any time, even after he has gone out of office, if not restrained by statute. Gibbes v. Mitchell, 2 Bay, 122. "When a sheriff levies upon personal property, it becomes his own for all legal purposes. He can maintain an action for it, even against the debtor himself, at any time till it is sold." McClintock v. Graham, 3 McCord, 243. Goods left in the hands of the defendant after levy is a continuance of the possession of the sheriff. Moss v. Moore, 3 Hill, 278. "Though it is clear that the seizing and levying of goods and chattels, by operation of law, vests the property in the sheriff, yet it is very different with respect to real estate. It shall remain the property of the defendant in the suit till actually sold." Sims v. Randall, 2 Bay, 524; see, also, Bank v. Manufacturing Company, 3 Strobb., 191 [49 Am. Dec. 640].

The remark of Judge Willard would seem to intimate an opinion that the lien of a judgment attached to land at a time when the defendant was unmarried, would prevail against the claim of a homestead where the defendant afterwards married before any steps were taken to enforce the judgment. That proposition would not now be maintained, since it has been decided otherwise in the case of Chafee & Co. v. Rainey, 21 S. C., 11. In that case the defendant was a married man when the judgment was entered, but became a widower and married again before the levy. He was held entitled to the homestead. Here there was a levy made while the defendant was still a widower, but he married again after the levy and before the sale. As has been said, a levy on lands under an execution does not transfer any right of property in the land. The title remains in the defendant just as before. The only effect of the levy was to give the sheriff a power of sale. The plaintiff acquired no new rights in regard to the land. The circumstance, therefore, of a levy having been made before the marriage in this case does not distinguish it in principle from the case last cited, where the levy was made after the second marriage of the defendant.

The exemption allowed by the constitution is from attachment, levy, or sale of the homestead. The protection is against a sale, as much as against a levy, or an attachment. If, at the time of the levy, there was no right of homestead, the levy would be good; but if, after a valid levy, there arose the circumstances which would entitle the defendant, as the head of a family, to the homestead, the sale would be invalid. The sheriff is required, before selling the real estate of any head of a family resident in this State, to cause a homestead to be set off in the manner that is prescribed by law. Gen. Stat., § 1994. It is made his duty, "before selling," to ascertain whether there be the head of a family entitled to the homestead on the property levied on. The statute then proceeds thus: "Should any officer sell any real estate in violation of the provisions of this chapter, and of section 32, article II., of the constitution of the State of South Carolina, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable in damages to the party injured for all injuries by reason of his wrongful levy or sale." § 2003.

It cannot be denied that here is a debtor, resident on the land levied, who is also the head of a family at this time; how, then, can the sheriff proceed to sell the homestead, in view of the statute cited? The court has no power to repeal or modify the statute by refusing the claim of the defendant and directing the sale to proceed. Such a sale would be unlawful and therefore void. "If a statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act, the penalty implies a prohibition, and the thing is unlawful, though there be no prohibitory words in the statute." 1 Kent, 467. The sale of the homestead of a head of a family is as much prohibited as if the statute had expressly forbidden it, and the courts cannot give validity to such a plain violation of the statute law.

I therefore conclude that the defendant is, in any aspect of the case, entitled to his homestead.

III. But the assignment in this case appears to the minds of many witnesses to be excessive. There is a great conflict of opinion on the subject, and I find myself unable to decide the question of value. For the plaintiff, six witnesses, apparently disinterested, testify that in their opinion the land and buildings assigned for homestead are worth from two to three thousand dollars, and one of them values it at three thousand five hundred dollars. The plaintiff, on oath, says he will give for the land assigned one thousand dollars and release his judgment against the defendant.

On the other hand, the defendant produces more than twenty witnesses, equally disinterested seemingly, residing in the neighborhood, who swear that the value of the property is from about seven hundred to a thousand dollars. The commissioners valued it at nine hundred dollars. The auditor, Captain Delgar, another witness, testified that it was assessed by the board of equalization at two dollars and fifty cents per acre, which is regarded as the value of lands in that neighborhood, and supposes, with buildings and improvements, it is worth from three to four dollars per acre. Col. Wm. J. Reynolds testifies that in the year 1880 the defendant offered to sell him the same land, with two hundred acres additional, for twelve hundred dollars, and he refused to buy, because he did not think it worth that amount; that he himself sold to defendant fifty acres of the land assigned as a homestead, for two dollars per acre; and he has lived within a mile of the place for fifty years, and that it is worth only nine hundred dollars. L. M. Smith, an intelligent and successful merchant and farmer, long residing in the neighborhood, testified that the defendant, in the year 1880, offered to sell him three hundred and seventy-four acres of the land, including the homestead, for twelve hundred dollars, one-half cash, and he refused to purchase, because he did not think the land worth the money.

What, then, is the duty of the court under these circumstances? *The commissioners are required by the statute to be sworn "to impartially appraise and set off by metes and bounds a homestead, not exceeding one thousand dollars in value." Upon exceptions filed to their return, as prescribed by the statute, "the court may, upon good cause being shown," order a reappraisement. If the evidence was such as to satisfy me that the homestead assigned exceeds in value the amount allowed by law, there would be good cause to set it aside. But the case presented is not that. It is a case of some uncertainty as to the value, but it is not shown that the commissioners erred in their estimate. Is that enough to justify the court in ordering a reappraisement? At first I inclined to that opinion but upon further consideration, I am forced to the conclusion that the mere difference of opinion as to the value, making a case of some doubt, is not enough to authorize me to set aside the return of the commissioners. It appears to me that in such a case the return must prevail.

In Alabama the principle is laid down that "even if the freeholders appointed to allot the debtor's homestead by the statute of that State are to be regarded as officers of the court and subject to its supervision, which the court does not decide, their action should not be disturbed except in case of fraud, corruption, or irregularities seriously affecting the rights of one or both of the parties." Thomp. Homest., § 666.

The case is analogous to that of commissioners in partition, of whom it was said by Chancellor Desaussure, in Geer v. Winds (4 Desaus., 86), that the partition of lands by the commissioners, residing on the spot, and possessing local knowledge of the property, was instituted for the benefit of the citizens. It was a species of domestic tribunal, similar in some respects to arbitration, and that their acts ought to be supported unless shown to be clearly erroneous and unjust; that the division made by the commissioners in the present case did not appear to be so erroneous as to induce the court to set it aside. Several of the witnesses certainly had stated that they thought it an unequal division; but one of them said he did not know that a better division could be made, and some of the witnesses acknowledged themselves incompetent judges; none of them were acting under the obligation of an oath when they examined the land, nor was their *attention drawn thereto particularly by any duty; whereas the commissioners were men of the highest character for general integrity, and they had a particular knowledge of the land in question. They were acting under the sanction of an oath, and made a very particular examination of the land; and Mr. Chapman swore he believed as fair a division of the land was made as could be made.

These remarks apply with equal force to the case now under consideration. The commissioners constitute a body created by law for the discharge of the particular duty which they have discharged under the solemn sanction of an oath. Their return is a finding of fact by a body charged by law with the performance of a certain duty which involves their ascertainment of the fact which they have found. Their finding, like that of a jury, must stand until it is overthrown by a preponderance of testimony. Here the preponderance is really on the side of the return. Of what avail would it be to commit the question to new commissioners? If, on a reappointment, the commissioners should vary in their finding as to the value from that found by the present commissioners, would not the same conflict of opinion be shown to set aside that return as has been brought here either to attack or sustain this return? The question is one of opinion, and can never be settled with mathematical certainty.

For these reasons, it is ordered and adjudged, that the exceptions be overruled and the return of the commissioners be confirmed: and that the plaintiff pay the costs and disbursements herein, to be adjusted by the clerk.

The plaintiff in the execution appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. That his honor erred in adjudging that the defendant was entitled to a homestead exemption, said defendant not being the head of a family, having no one dependent on him for support, and his son, who lived with him, being an adult, and having property of his own, conducting his own business, and not dependent on, or under the control of, his father.

II. That his honor erred in adjudging that the marriage of defendant, after levy made and the plaintiff had exhausted all *legal means to collect his debt while no exemption existed, entitles him to a homestead exemption.

III. That his honor erred in refusing to order a reassignment of the homestead.

Messrs. H. F. Wilson and J. T. Hay, for appellant.

Mr. Jos. H. Earle, contra.

July 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. (Omitting the statement of facts.) The appeal involves the two questions decided below, which we will consider in their order above.

First. Was the defendant the head of a family, in a homestead sense, when the property in question was levied upon by the plaintiff? The meaning of the term family, as taken from the best lexicographers, is: "The collective body of persons who live in one house, and under one head or manager, a household, including parents, children, and servants, and, as the case may be, lodgers or boarders." Webster. If this is the true meaning of the term family, and if it was used in the constitution in this sense, there certainly could be no doubt that the defendant was the head of a family at the date of the levy. Because it is admitted that his son was a part of his household, living with him in the same house, under his control and employment, he being the head and the manager.

Have we any reason to conclude that this term was used in the constitution in some curtailed and limited sense, and not in this general sense? In Garaty v. Dubose (5 S. C., 500), the court held that a bachelor, having no person dependent upon him, and none residing with him except servants and employes, is not the "head of a family" in the constitutional sense; and Chief Justice Moses, in delivering the opinion of the court, did intimate that inasmuch as the homestead exemption was in derogation of the rights of creditors at common law, it was not entitled to such liberal construction as would extend it to those who are not within the spirit and policy of the provision. Even admitting this to be true, yet he laid down no rule which would authorize *the court to resort to anything else but the general meaning of the term "family," when called upon to determine whether a certain party was the head of the family. In the case of Garaty v. Dubose the court held that Dubose was not entitled to the homestead. The facts of that case, however, will show that in excluding Dubose the court did not fall back on any limited or restricted sense of the term "family" in order to reach its conclusion, but applied the ordinary meaning to that term. Dubose was a bachelor, a farmer, with hired laborers and employes, carrying on his farming operations. But it did not appear that any one was living with him under the same roof and a part of the same household. He, then, was not entitled to a homestead under the most liberal construction of the term family, as he was in no sense the "head of a family."

Has the term "family" been limited in its general and ordinary meaning as defined in Webster by any of our cases on the subject of homestead? We have found no such case. On the contrary, the case of Bradley v. Rodelsperger (3 S. C., 227) holds expressly that this term, as used in the constitution, must be taken in its ordinary sense. And in that case the court below having held that a childless widow could not be the head of a family in the sense of the constitution, this court reversed the judgment below, and in remanding the case said: "The constitution has not given any definition of the term family, nor indicated any of its necessary ingredients; the term must, therefore, be taken in its ordinary sense. In this sense it is not essential that it should include children."

Taking the term "family," then, in its ordinary sense, which includes persons living in one house, and under one head or manager, we think the Circuit Judge was right in holding below that the defendant was the "head of a family." His son was living with him as a part of his family, and his son being a married man, no doubt entitled to have his wife and children with him, if he had any children, certainly this constituted a family, of which the defendant was the head.

But, independent of this, we think the defendant was entitled to the homestead under the principle of the case of Chafee & Co. v. Rainey, 21 S. C., 11. In that case the defendant was a married man when the judgment was entered, but became a widower and was married again when the levy was made. The homestead was resisted on the ground that a lien attached during the time the defendant was a widower, which his subsequent marriage could not divest. This court held that the question in such cases is not one of divesting liens, but is whether a state of facts constituting a right of homestead exists at the time that the sale is attempted to be enforced; in other words, whether at that time the defendant is the "head of a family," and whether the property claimed to be exempted is the family homestead. This principle may not apply to the personal property herein under the case of Pender v. Lancaster (14 S. C., 25 [37 Am. Dec. 720]), that property having been levied upon while the defendant was a widower. But the homestead in that, as well as in the real estate, we think was exempt, as held above.

On the second question the Circuit Judge upon full testimony having determined that the homestead allowed was not excessive, we see nothing in that testimony authorizing this court to overrule his finding on that subject.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

DUNSFORD v. BROWN.

[Guardian and Ward ⇐159.]

The decision of the court in Dunsford v. Brown, 19 S. C., 560, stated: and a second action by the same plaintiff against the same defendants for an accounting, as before, but now, for the first time, directly assailing in the complaint a receipt and discharge given by plaintiff to the principal defendant, held to be res judicata. Mr. Justice McGowan concurring in the result upon another ground.

Before Cothran, J., Richland, July, 1884.

The decision of this court in the former action of Dunsford v. Brown (19 S. C., 560), and the statements in the Circuit decree, fully state this case.

*329

*By agreement of counsel the following questions were submitted to his honor for decision:

First. Is the plaintiff estopped from bringing the present action by the judgment in the former case?

Second. If not, does the judgment in the former action so conclusively establish the existence of a judgment of the Probate Court discharging the defendant, Brown, as to estop the plaintiff from averring against its existence in the present action?

Third. If so, are the allegations of the complaint in the present action sufficient to attack or set aside such a judgment or order of discharge of the Probate Court, on the ground of fraud and imposition?

The Circuit decree was as follows:

The determination of this case must depend upon the true meaning and effect of the decision of the Supreme Court of a former case between the same parties, having in view the same objective points, and which is to be found in 19 S. C., 560.

The Supreme Court held this (an amendment making the allegata conform to the probata) to be erroneous—that such amendment was allowable. If the deliverance of the Supreme Court had not gone beyond this, the point under consideration now would have been plainly presented, but I am embarrassed by the fact that the Supreme Court have, to some extent at least, considered the case upon its merits, and have found that the plaintiff had no cause to complain of the conduct of his guardian, the defendant Brown. Nor would I otherwise venture to make (which I do with great deference) some observations upon the pleadings in the former case.

When the plaintiff determined to begin his suit his counsel had free access to the records of the probate office. Knowledge of these was indispensable in the preparation of his case. He must have seen his client's receipt in full of file there. It was a lion in his path. He passed on, however, without regarding it. Surely, if not seen by him, its roar was heard when the answers came in. It was unheeded still. Whether an amendment of the complaint was necessary upon the coming in of the answers, depends entirely upon the true character and effect of the trans*action of May 21 in the probate office. If that was a judgment of the Probate Court—a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter—it should have been assailed directly, not collaterally, and that by way of amending the complaint before trial. If, upon the other hand, it was merely a matter of payment, no amendment of the complaint was necessary.

To the new matter set up in the answer the plaintiff had no right to reply. The reply is only allowed under the code in two possible cases—the one to a counter claim, the other upon requirement of the defendant, upon his motion, and in the discretion of the court. Every "allegation of new matter in the answer not relating to a counter-claim is to be deemed contradicted by the adverse party, as upon a direct denial." Code, § 189. A familiar illustration may be given: Plaintiff sues upon a note (simple money demand) for $500. Defendant answers, averring payment of $200, for which he holds plaintiff's receipt; this amount is sufficiently controverted by the terms of the complaint to make the issue upon it. Defendant at the trial produces the receipt, and the plaintiff, without amending his complaint or by reply (unless the latter be demanded by the defendant and ordered by the court) would be allowed to prove, if he could, that the signature to the receipt was not genuine, a forgery, or that it had been obtained by duress. Such proof would go to cut down and destroy the defendant's defence, and is admissible under the rule of pleading cited. The objective point at which the plaintiff is aiming is the recovery of the $500—not the forgery, nor the duress. Of the former he might be entirely ignorant; of the latter, however, he would have knowledge, as well of the circumstances attending the act of duress as of the existence of the receipt for $200 with his genuine signature to it.

And so here the plaintiff must be held to have known of the existence of his receipt for $1,496.78 in full of all claims against his guardian. True, the objective point of this suit happens not to be, as in the case of the $500 note supposed, a liquidated demand, but that cannot so alter the case as to destroy the analogy. His demand is for an accounting, for making certain that which can be made as certain as if it were a liquidated sum. He is not driving at the fraud; he is demanding an accounting, *and proposes to drive through the fraud, if fraud there be, to reach by this action, as by the other already tried, the objective point, which is the accounting. If the proceedings in the probate office did not rise to the dignity of a judgment or decree of that court, it was not necessary to change the actual, substantial cause of action, in order to break down the defence of the defendant. An accounting was sought in the former action, and so also in this.

Mr. Pomeroy, after defining the term, "a cause of action," and distinguishing that from "the object of the action" (see sections 452, et seq.), with great force and clearness in section 455 warns the pleader "against the mistake of supposing that a distinct cause of action will arise from each special subordinate right included in the general primary right held by the plaintiff, or from each particular act of wrong, which, in connection with others, may make up the composite but single delict complained of." Pom. Rem. The facts which make up the plaintiff's primary right here are (1) the receipt by the guardian of the ward's estate, and (2) the liability of the guardian upon the ward's attaining his majority to pay the same to him. The defendant's delict is the neglect or refusal so to pay, alleging as a reason for not doing so, that he has in fact already done so. If this reason, on the contrary, was shown to have been "a particular act of wrong," to wit, of imposition by the guardian upon the ward, the right of the plaintiff to show this is subordinate to his general primary right to the accounting, and is not another cause of action.

It cannot be denied—it must in fact be conceded—that if the merits of this controversy have been heretofore passed upon, the litigation must cease. "Interest rei publice finis sit litium." In view of the order of reference to the master, the testimony taken, his report, the exceptions thereto heard by the Circuit Judge, his decree, the grounds of appeal to the Supreme Court, the arguments of counsel thereon, the opinion of the Supreme Court, the petition for a rehearing, and the refusal thereof, with the reasons stated, can it be successfully maintained that the merits of this case have not been considered? [Here follow *quotations from the Circuit decree of Judge Kershaw and from the opinion of this court.]

On January 24, 1884, the present action was begun; the parties to both suits are the same persons. The complaint, after setting forth the appointment of the guardian, the execution of the bond, &c., charges the defendant Brown with having received as the corpus of the plaintiff's estate the sum of $3,146.92, "besides interest which accrued thereon;" that said defendant filed annual returns in the probate office, "all of which, subsequent to the first, commenced with the balance of the preceding returns, and in such returns failed to credit the plaintiff with large sums of money received by him as interest on the funds of plaintiff's estate which had been invested, and with interest on such sums as were held by him uninvested, but charged the plaintiff with large sums which were not properly chargeable to him;" that plaintiff was raised upon a farm, with little education and no experience in business; had just attained his majority, and was greatly under the influence of his said guardian, and was thus induced to accept, in settlement of his claims against his guardian, a less sum than that to which he was actually and justly entitled, and prays that the pretended settlement and discharge be set aside, and that he have judgment for such amount as upon an accounting may be found due to him, &c.

The defendant Brown especially, the others being his sureties, denies that he received any other funds of the plaintiff except those with which he was charged in his annual returns; denies the charge of imposition and undue influence; and insists, as a defence to the action, upon the settlement of May 21, 1880, in the probate office, when he paid over the whole balance due to the plaintiff, and for which his receipt in writing was given and filed in the office of the probate judge; and, further, that all matters touching said guardianship have been heretofore made the subject of judicial investigation and determination, and that the plaintiff has no right to vex him and his sureties again in this behalf.

By comparison of the two complaints, it will be seen that, except as to the allegations in the latter assailing the bona fides *of the transaction of May 21, there is but little difference between them; the parties are the same persons and the object of each action is the same, to wit, an accounting. Besides, even in the latter complaint, under the rules of pleading which regulate the practice as well for setting aside a settlement for fraud as for surcharging and falsifying a stated account, and more especially in the case of a settled account, there is a conspicuous and fatal omission to state, with the requisite particularity, the facts and circumstances relied upon as characterizing the fraud. The authorities upon this point are innumerable and the current is unbroken. 1 Dan. Ch. P. & P., 324, and note; 2 Ibid., 1585; Kerr Fr. & M., 365; Porter v. Cain, McMull. Eq., 84; Fraser v. Hext, 2 Stroh. Eq., 250. Also McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C., 95, where the cases are collated carefully and the whole subject is exhaustively reviewed. The facts of the case under consideration and the authorities cited, with the argument based even upon contrary suppositions, must be equally conclusive of the plaintiff's case. And this the logicians call a dilemma.

Take another horn of it. If the transaction of May 21, 1880, was not a decree or judgment of the Probate Court, no amendment was necessary, and the case has been disposed of. If it was a judgment or decree, it should have been assailed as such by complaint, original or amended. That the duties of life are more than life is nowhere better exemplified than in the crowded courts of justice. Every suitor is entitled to his day in court—but only to his day. When in such serious conflict the lists are set, the forces must not be brought up in detail, singulatum, but in full array; and, to drop the metaphor, a plaintiff is not allowed to present his case by piecemeal. Time, convenience, good faith, and fair dealing forbid, and these latter should be as conspicuous in pleading as elsewhere.

The Supreme Court has so frequently discussed the matter of res adjudicata (see the cases of Hart v. Bates [17 S. C. 35], Fraser & Dill v. Charleston [19 S. C. 384], and others, too recent to be unfamiliar) that it hardly seems necessary to prolong this decree by any observations of my own upon this subject, and I forbear to do so.

There are perhaps two other points in the case to which allusion should be made briefly and in conclusion. In refusing the petition for a rehearing, the Supreme Court distinctly say, touching the discharge of Brown, the guardian, by the probate judge, that "the judgment of this court is not based upon that assumption," but "that the judgment of this" (that) "court was rested on the settlement between the parties pleaded in bar," &c. The judgment is, "that the complaint be dismissed." It has been settled by very high authority that "the decree dismissing the bill in the former suit in the Circuit Court of the United States, being absolute in its terms, was an adjudication of the controversy, and constitutes a bar to any further litigation of the same kind between the same parties. A decree of that kind, unless made because of some defect in the pleadings, or for want of jurisdiction, or because the complainant has an adequate remedy at law, or upon some other ground, which does not go to the merits, is a final determination. Where words of qualification such as 'without prejudice,' or other terms indicating a right or privilege to take further legal proceedings on the subject do not accompany the decree, it is presumed to be rendered on the merits. Accordingly it is the general practice in this country and in England when a bill in equity is dismissed without a consideration of the merits, for the court to express in its decree that the dismissal is without prejudice; the omission of the qualification in a proper case will be corrected by this court on appeal." Durant v. Essex Company, 7 Wall., 109 [19 L. Ed. 154].

It must therefore follow from this: (1) that if the complaint has been dismissed without words of qualification; (2) if it was not dismissed on account of a decree or judgment of the Probate Court which could not be collaterally attacked; but (3) on account of a settlement between the parties, which was subordinate to the general primary right of action and assailable without amendment; and (4) that the merits of that settlement have been passed upon—the bar to any further litigation of the same subject between these, the same, parties is effectual and complete.

The other point is, that the defendants may with propriety claim the protection of article IV., section 8, of the constitution: "When a judgment or decree is reversed or affirmed by the Supreme Court, every point made and distinctly stated in writing in the cause, and fairly arising upon the record of the case, shall *be considered and decided," &c. Applying this provision of the constitution to the exceptions contained in the Brief on appeal to the Supreme Court, and to the decision made by the Supreme Court, it is manifest that the matters sought by the plaintiff in this action to be drawn again into controversy, were "made and distinctly stated in writing," and have been determined, and the evidence of such determination "preserved with the records of the case."

Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the complaint be dismissed, and that the defendants have judgment against the plaintiff for their costs.

Plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor held that the accounting sought in this action could have been had in the former action between this plaintiff and the above named defendants without amendment, notwithstanding the plea of settlement, and that the decree in said cause was an adjudication of the claim set up in this action.

II. Because his honor held that plaintiff's right to set aside the alleged settlement for fraud and imposition was subordinate to his general right to an accounting.

III. Because his honor held that the same rules should govern the pleadings in this action as are applicable to an action to surcharge or falsify an account stated.

IV. Because his honor held that the complaint in this action does not "state with requisite particularity the facts and circumstances relied upon as characterizing the fraud," and that the facts alleged are insufficient to constitute a cause of action.

V. Because his honor held the judgment in the former action a bar to this action, and dismissed the complaint herein.

Mr. W. H. Lyles, for appellant.
Messrs. Abney & Abney, contra.

July 30, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action below was brought by the plaintiff, appellant, against the defendant Brown (guardian of appellant), and the other defendants, his sureties, to set aside an alleged pretended settlement, receipt, and discharge claimed by the defendant Brown, and also for an accounting by Brown for his actings and doings as said guardian. The main defence interposed was res adjudicata, growing out of a previous action in which, as averred in the answer, the matters herein were considered and adjudged, first in the Circuit Court, and on appeal by this court, where the complaint was finally dismissed.

The case was heard by his honor, Judge Cothran, who, sustaining the plea of res adjudicata, dismissed the complaint. His honor further held that, independent of the plea of res adjudicata, there was a conspicuous and fatal omission in the complaint in that the facts and circumstances of fraud relied on by the plaintiff to vacate the settlement and discharge were not stated with sufficient particularity, the judge holding that in such cases the rules of pleading and practice which obtain in surcharging and falsifying a stated account, and more especially a settled account, should apply, which he held were not observed here. The appeal questions the two rulings above.

First, as to the plea of res adjudicata. It appears that the plaintiff attained his majority on May 20, 1880. On the next day he appeared with his guardian, the defendant, in the probate judge's office for Richland County, and received the amount due him as ascertained by a previous statement of the guardian's accounts made in said office, the amount being $1,496.78, which was then paid over to him by the probate judge, with whom it had been deposited by the guardian, he, the plaintiff, giving a receipt in full payment of all claim against said guardian, which receipt was filed in the probate judge's office. In 1882 the plaintiff, without reference to this transaction in any way, commenced action against the present defendants, the guardian and his sureties, demanding an accounting, embracing in the demand not only what Brown had received since he became guardian, but also what a former guardian, one Weston, had received, and which the plaintiff claimed Brown ought to have collected from Weston. To this suit the defendants set up the defence of payment as a bar. An order of reference was made, directing the master "to take testimony upon all the matters of fact arising on the pleadings, to state the accounts between the parties, and to report the same, with all findings of fact."

Upon this reference the case was fully developed, and notwithstanding the plea in bar, all the facts in connection with the settlement in the probate judge's office, the discharge, &c., of May 21, referred to above, were brought out and reported. Judge Kershaw heard the case upon this report and the exceptions thereto. He sustained the master in holding that Brown was not liable for the amount received by Weston, but not paid over to him. He held, further, that although the transaction of May 21 had not been put in issue by the pleadings, and could not be attacked as a general rule by a collateral proceeding like that before him, yet the master having heard testimony upon this subject, he would regard that matter as embraced in the case, and to that end ordered an amendment so as to conform the pleadings to the proof, and he proceeded to pronounce judgment upon the whole case, setting aside the settlement and discharge of the probate judge and also the receipt of the plaintiff, and ordered Brown to account de novo, but, as we have said, exempting him from responsibility for the alleged errors in the accounting of his predecessor, Weston.

Upon appeal by defendant, this court held that it was error in the Circuit Judge to order and allow the amendment mentioned, or to determine the question of settlement and discharge, and upon full hearing this court dismissed the complaint. The plaintiff then filed a petition for rehearing, basing it upon several grounds, which were considered, and the petition was dismissed. 19 S. C., 560-571.

The plaintiff thereupon commenced the action below, in which the settlement and discharge claimed by defendant Brown were directly assailed and sought to be set aside, which resulted as already stated in the decree of Judge Cothran, dismissing the complaint for the reasons given.

The appellant contends that this court, finding error in the action of the Circuit Judge in the former case, in that he considered and passed judgment upon the settlement and discharge of the guardian, when said settlement and discharge were not in issue therein, in that he went behind this settlement and discharge before it had been assailed and vacated by a direct and proper proceeding, dismissed the complaint upon that ground, and upon that ground alone, thereby leaving the validity of said settlement and discharge an open question; and that such being the fact, the plea of res adjudicata ought not to have availed the defendant below in an action brought by the plaintiff this time directly to assail said settlement and discharge. It is true that this court did, in the former appeal, hold that the action below having been brought simply for an accounting, altogether ignoring a settlement had between the parties, and making no allegation of fraud or imposition therein, the settlement and receipt given was a bar to said action, and that no accounting could be claimed until said settlement was set aside by a direct proceeding to that end. And if the court had held nothing more in that appeal but this, the position of appellant would be correct.

But the court went further. On page 567 of the opinion (19 S. C.) Mr. Justice McGowan, who delivered the opinion, used the following language: "But if the action had been brought directly for the purpose of setting aside the settlement and discharge, we do not see the evidence to sustain the judgment. There can be no doubt that a settlement was made with the ward after he came of age, who received the money, gave his receipt in full, and the guardian was discharged by the probate judge. We suppose that the settlement and discharge were not prima facie invalid, and what evidence is there to impeach the transaction? The only circumstance tending in that direction is the fact that the settlement was made soon after the ward came of age, but that alone was not sufficient to overthrow it, if there was on the part of the guardian, Brown, no concealment, misrepresentation, imposition, or fraud." The opinion then goes on to discuss the law involving settlements of guardian's accounts with the ward shortly after he arrives at age, holding, finally, that there was nothing in this case to impeach the settlement.

All this was based upon the fact that notwithstanding the case might have been dismissed below on the settlement as a plea in bar, yet Judge Kershaw amended the complaint so as to bring in the question of the validity of the settlement and discharge, and passed judgment upon that question by setting aside said settlement and ordering an account de novo. The court regarding it in that way as involved in the appeal, the judgment below was reversed and the complaint dismissed upon both the grounds. We think, therefore, that Judge Cothran was right in sustaining the plea of res adjudicata below.

With these views it is unnecessary to discuss the other question raised in the appeal.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur in the result; but the court having held in the former case that the proceeding was not directly to vacate the settlement, and if it had been, the defence and evidence might have been different, I would prefer to rest the judgment on the other ground, and not hold the matter as finally adjudicated.

A draft for a sum stated, drawn by a seller against a buyer in favor of a national bank, by whom it is discounted or purchased, with the bill of lading attached, passes title to the goods therein mentioned to the bank; and the bank may recover them, upon dishonor of the draft, from a sheriff who had seized the goods as the property of the seller under attachment subsequent to the purchase by the bank.

A draft so drawn is a bill of exchange, and its purchase by a national bank is not beyond the powers conferred by acts of Congress upon national banks.

Before Cothran, J., Richland, July, 1884.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. S. Monteith, for appellants, Messrs. Clark & Muller, contra.

*August 1, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case, so far as necessary to a proper understanding of the points raised by this appeal, are substantially as follows: The defendants, Lorick & Lowrance, merchants, doing business in Columbia, ordered from Hord Bros. & Co., dealers in grain and provisions in Chicago, a lot of bran and oats. At the time of the shipment of these articles Hord Bros. & Co. drew drafts on Lorick & Lowrance for the price thereof, which were either discounted or sold to the plaintiff, upon the security of the bills of lading which, at the same time, were endorsed by Hord Bros. & Co., and delivered to plaintiff. These drafts were sent by the plaintiff, with the bills of lading attached, to its agent in Columbia, the Carolina National Bank, to be presented to the drawees for acceptance, and when so presented were not accepted. When the bran and oats reached Columbia they were seized by the defendant, Rowan, as sheriff, under a warrant of attachment sued out by the defendants, Lorick & Lowrance, on a claim which they alleged was due them by Hord Bros. & Co., growing out of some previous transactions. Thereupon this action was brought by the plaintiff to recover possession of the bran and oats.

It is not denied that the endorsement and delivery of the bills of lading to the plaintiff passed the title and right to the possession of the articles mentioned therein to the plaintiff, provided the transaction was valid and legal, and this having been done prior to the seizure under the warrant of attachment, the plaintiff would have a right to recover. It is contended, however, by the appellants that under the national banking law of the United States, the plaintiff had no authority to purchase the drafts with the bills of lading attached, and that, therefore, the transaction was ultra vires, illegal, and passed no title to the plaintiff. Accordingly the Circuit Judge was requested by the defendants to instruct the jury, "that it was for the jury to decide whether plaintiff purchased or discounted the drafts, and that if they came to the conclusion that the plaintiff purchased the drafts with the bills of lading, then the transaction was ultra vires, and the plaintiff could not recover." To the refusal of this request defendants duly excepted, and by their exceptions, the first *having been abandoned, practically raise two questions of law: 1st. Whether the purchase of the draft, with the bills of lading attached, by the plaintiff was ultra vires. 2d. If it was, does that defeat the plaintiff's right to recover?

It seems to us that as to the first question there can be no doubt. These papers, though called drafts, are in fact bills of exchange, as they fill any definition given of that species of instrument. That learned commentator, Mr. Chitty, commences his treatise on bills of exchange with these words: "A bill of exchange is defined by Mr. Justice Blackstone to be an open letter of request, or an order from one person to another, desiring him to pay on his account a sum of money therein mentioned to a third person." These papers certainly are open letters of request or orders from Hord Bros. & Co. to Lorick & Lowrance, desiring them to pay on their account the sums of money therein mentioned to a third person, as is manifest from their form, which is as follows:

"$270.00. Chicago, Dec. 3, 1883.

"At sight, N. Y. Exchange, pay to the order of Jno. J. P. Odell, cashier, two hundred and seventy 66-100 dollars, value received, and charge to account of Lorick & Lowrance, Columbia, S. C. Hord Bros. & Co."

Now, as a national bank is expressly authorized by the act of Congress to buy and sell exchange, there cannot be a doubt that the plaintiff had a right to purchase these papers, called drafts, as they were in fact bills of exchange, and hence it was wholly immaterial to inquire whether the plaintiff bought or discounted these papers. Indeed, it seems to us that any other view would, to some extent at least, defeat the very object for which a bank is established. As we understand it, one of the main purposes of these institutions is to afford the means of moving the produce of the country by facilitating exchanges, and such transactions as the one now in question are just what would most likely effect these ends. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff bank, in buying these bills of exchange, even if it did buy them, was not only not going beyond the authority vested in it by the act of Congress, but, on the contrary, was simply doing one of the things *for which it was constituted. It is apparent, therefore, that the authorities cited by the counsel for appellants, tending to show that a national bank has no authority under the act of Congress to buy promissory notes, have no application to this case, and need not therefore be considered.

Under this view, the second question raised by this appeal cannot arise, though we may say that this question also has been determined adversely to the view of the appellants by at least two cases (National Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S., 621 [25 L. Ed. 188], and National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S., 99 [26 L. Ed. 443]), decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, the tribunal invested with jurisdiction to determine finally the proper construction of an act of Congress.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

McSWEEN v. McCOWN.

[1. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇨269.]

In action assailing a deed as fraudulent, the answer denied that the deed was without consideration, and made no reference to any other deed, but it appeared in evidence that the deed described in the complaint was executed in the place of another and prior deed that had been burnt. Held, that the Circuit Judge properly refused to rule that, at the date of the deed assailed, the defendants owned the right, title, and interest in the land under a conveyance not impeached in this action.

[2. Pleading ⇨237.]

It was not error in the Circuit Judge to refuse at the trial to permit an amendment of the answer alleging matters of fact which he did not think had been proved.

Before Witherspoon, J., Darlington, October, 1884.

The plaintiff, John McSween, having obtained judgment on March 22, 1880, against Samuel O. McCown, upon a sealed note bearing date June 3, 1875, and an execution thereon being returned wholly unsatisfied, commenced this action April 27, 1882, against Samuel O. McCown, and the widow and children of Reese A. McCown, deceased. The opinion sufficiently states the case. The Circuit decree (omitting its statement) was as follows:

As fraud will never be presumed, the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff, who must sustain the allegations of fraud by satisfactory proofs. Frauds are committed in secret, and are usually hedged in and surrounded by safeguards to prevent discovery. It is, therefore, usually established by circumstantial evidence. A wide latitude of evidence is allowed that fraud may be detected and exposed. It is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove, not only that Samuel O. McCown conveyed the land in dispute to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, but, also, that Reese A. McCown, the grantee, had notice of the fraudulent intention and participated in it.

The material question is as to the intent of the parties at the time of the execution of the deed, May 2, 1868. If at that time a wrong was intended as to rights of creditors, the fraud is positive and attaches to the act at that moment. Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C., 529. The intent is to be determined by the words and acts of the parties, considered in connection with the attending circumstances. The alleged fraudulent transactions took *place between two brothers, one of whom (the grantee) is now dead. The survivor (the grantor) now volunteers to expose the fraud for the benefit of his creditors, whom he confesses he and his deceased brother intended to defraud in executing the deed sought to be declared void. The testimony is conflicting, and as the witnesses have not appeared before me, I can only endeavor to reach that conclusion that appears to me to be sustained by the testimony.

* * * * *

At the hearing, the defendants, Carrie B. McCown and her minor children, asked leave to amend their answer by alleging that Samuel O. McCown bought the land in dispute from John A. Gee, for Reese A. McCown, who in good faith paid Samuel O. McCown for the land. This proposed amendment is probably based upon the declaration of Reese A. McCown to his wife, Carrie B. McCown, and others, as well as payments made by W. K. Ryan, of Charleston, to Samuel O. McCown for Reese A. McCown.

The general rule is that declarations forming a part of the res gestæ are admissible. The plaintiff is entitled to introduce the declarations of Reese A. McCown against his interest made at any time, but this rule would be of little avail, if defendants were allowed to introduce other counter-declarations made in his favor at other and different times. Defendants are entitled to all of the declarations made at the time to which plaintiff's testimony refers, but the rule cannot in this case be further extended. Edwards v. Ford, 2 Bail., 464. Declarations to show the character of possession is an exception to the rule above stated, but this exception does not apply in this case, as defendants claim the land by virtue of a deed through Samuel O. McCown, and do not rely upon adverse possession.

The payments by Reese A. McCown through his factor Ryan to Samuel O. McCown do not appear to have exceeded the one-half of the net proceeds of cotton sold by Ryan. These payments, under the testimony, should be referred to the account of the joint cultivation of the land, rather than to the purchase of the land by Reese A. McCown.

The facts that Samuel O. McCown permitted Reese A. McCown to build on the land, and to collect insurance upon a house burnt on the disputed land, are urged as additional evidence that Reese A. McCown had paid for the land. Parties who attempt to perpetrate frauds often involve themselves in inconsistencies that cannot reasonably be accounted for. These matters occurred subsequently to the execution of the deed in dispute, and do not relieve the transaction in question of its fraudulent surroundings.

But assuming that Reese A. McCown did pay Samuel O. McCown full consideration for the land, yet the deed to the land in dispute is void as to creditors, if at the time the deed in question was executed Reese A. McCown accepted the deed for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defeating the creditors of Samuel O. McCown. Thomas & Ashby v. Jeter and Abney, 1 Hill, 380; Hipp v. Sawyer, Rich. Eq. Cas., 410.

I am satisfied from the testimony that all of the other transactions between Samuel O. McCown and Reese A. McCown, May 2, 1868, were entered into by Reese A. McCown, without consideration, with intent and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Samuel O. McCown. It is quite probable that Samuel O. McCown and Reese A. McCown originally bargained with John A. Gee to purchase the land together. Samuel O. McCown, however, alone, gave his note and took title from Gee, and by the said deed, May 2, 1868, Reese A. McCown acknowledged that Samuel O. McCown had title from Gee. The testimony, in my judgment, is not sufficient to credit Reese A. McCown with good faith in the transaction in dispute, and to isolate this from the other contemporaneous fraudulent transactions between Samuel O. McCown and Reese A. McCown.

I am therefore constrained by the testimony to conclude that Reese A. McCown, through the influence of his elder brother, Samuel O. McCown, was induced to accept the deed in dispute, without consideration, and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Samuel O. McCown.

Whilst the deed to the land in dispute must be held void as to creditors, yet it is good as between the parties. The defendants, heirs at law of Reese A. McCown, should therefore be allowed *to retain the land upon paying the costs of this action, and the debts hindered and delayed by the fraudulent deed, and upon their failure to pay the costs and said debts, the land should be sold and proceeds, after paying costs, should be applied to the payment of said debts—any surplus of said proceeds to be paid to the defendants, heirs at law of Reese A. McCown, according to their respective interests.

I find as matters of fact: 1. That the deed by Samuel O. McCown to Reese A. McCown, May 2, 1868, conveying two hundred acres of land in Darlington County, was without consideration, and was executed by Samuel O. McCown, and accepted by Reese A. McCown, with intent and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Samuel O. McCown. 2. That plaintiff has an unsatisfied execution in the sheriff's office for Darlington County, against Samuel O. McCown for $381.46, lodged March 9, 1882, upon which the sheriff returned nulla bona April 8, 1882.

I conclude as a matter of law: 1. That the deed from Samuel O. McCown to Reese A. McCown, May 2, 1868, conveying two hundred acres of land, more or less, in Darlington County, is void as to creditors of Samuel O. McCown. 2. That plaintiff's action is not barred by the statute of limitations.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the deed of conveyance aforesaid from Samuel O. McCown to Reese A. McCown, as aforesaid, and referred to in plaintiff's complaint, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be void as to the creditors of Samuel O. McCown, &c.

Messrs. Dargan & Dargan, for appellants.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles and E. K. Dargan, contra.

August 3, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On May 2, 1868, Samuel O. McCown, being then sued as surety for one Brown, on a large note to Singletary, conveyed his whole estate to his young unmarried brother, Reese A. McCown, consisting of four separate tracts of land, three in Williamsburg County, embracing some 1,396 *acres, and one in Darlington County, containing 200 acres; and stock, provisions, and farming implements on said lands. At the same time Reese A. McCown executed a will, by which all of his property was bequeathed and devised for the benefit of the wife and children of S. O. McCown, who was appointed executor, with power to take "full and unlimited control and manage to the best of his ability for the interest of the parties concerned." These papers were all executed on the same day and before the same witnesses. Similar papers had been executed a short time before, but being accidentally destroyed by fire, they were all reexecuted on the day indicated.

Reese A. McCown lived on the Darlington place (200 acres), and conducted a farm, under some arrangement, not very clearly defined with Samuel O. McCown. Reese A. McCown married in 1869, carried his wife to the said Darlington place, which he improved, and died in 1876, leaving his widow, Carrie B., and three infant children, surviving him. This, of course, operated as a revocation of the will in favor of the wife and children of Samuel O. McCown, and Reese A. McCown really died intestate. Up to the time of the death of Reese there was controversy between him and Samuel O. as to the land.

On March 22, 1880, the plaintiff obtained a judgment against Samuel O. McCown for $382.46, and the execution thereon being returned unsatisfied, he commenced this action on April 27, 1882, in behalf of himself and other creditors, alleging that the deed of the Darlington place was made by S. O. McCown to evade the payment of his debts; that no consideration passed, and that the fraudulent purpose was known to R. A. McCown, and that he combined with and aided S. O. McCown in carrying it out. It was further alleged that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the fraud until within six years previous to the commencement of the action, and the prayer was that the said deed should be set aside, and the land sold for the payment of the debts of S. O. McCown. S. O. McCown interposed no defence, but the widow and children of Reese A. McCown answering, denied that R. A. McCown had combined with S. O. McCown to aid him in evading the payment of his debts, denied that the land was conveyed without consideration, and alleged that Reese

A. purchased and paid for the same in good faith. They further interposed the statute of limitations and adverse possession, alleging that Reese A. went into possession about the beginning of 1867, claiming the land as his own, and that he or his heirs had ever since been in the open, exclusive, and continuous possession thereof.

The testimony was taken by G. W. Brown, Esq., as special referee. There was much evidence, consisting of correspondence, factor accounts, and the testimony of witnesses, all of which is in the Brief. The cause came on for trial by Judge Witherspoon. At the hearing the appellants asked leave to amend their answer by alleging that the land in question "was purchased by S. O. McCown from one John A. Gee for his brother, Reese A. McCown, and by the said S. O. McCown sold to the said Reese A." In his decree the judge held that the testimony did not sustain the proposed amendment. The Circuit Judge held as follows: "I am satisfied from the testimony that all the other transactions between Samuel O. and Reese A. McCown in May, 1868, were entered into by Reese A. McCown without consideration, with the intent and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of S. O. McCown. * * * and the testimony, in my judgment, is not sufficient to credit Reese A. with good faith in the transaction in dispute, and to isolate this from the other contemporaneous fraudulent transactions between the parties. * * * I find as matter of fact that the deed from Samuel O. McCown to Reese A. McCown May 2, 1868, conveying 200 acres of land in Darlington County, was without consideration, and was executed by Samuel O. McCown and accepted by Reese A. McCown, with the intent and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Samuel O. McCown. * * * And I conclude as matter of law that said deed is void as to the creditors of S. O. McCown, and that the plaintiff's action is not barred by the statute of limitations," &c.

From this decree the widow and children of Reese A. McCown appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his honor erred in refusing to allow, before the trial, the amendment to their pleadings proposed by the defend*ants, Carrie B. McCown, Marion H. McCown, Harriet A. McCown, and Reese A. McCown.

2. "Because his honor erred in excluding the declarations of Reese A. McCown, a deceased person, in his own favor, made during his possession of the land in question, and tending to show the character of that possession.

3. "Because his honor erred as matter of fact, 'that the deed from Samuel O. McCown to Reese A. McCown of May 2, 1868, conveying two hundred acres of land in Darlington County, was without consideration, and was executed by S. O. McCown and accepted by Reese A. with the intent and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Samuel O. McCown,' the overbearing weight of testimony adduced by the plaintiffs themselves being against such finding.

4. "Because his honor erred in concluding as matter of law, 'that the deed from S. O. McCown to R. A. McCown of May 2, 1868, conveying 200 acres of land in Darlington County, is void as to creditors of S. O. McCown.'

5. "Because his honor erred in concluding in effect, as matter of law, that the rights of the parties to this action are dependent upon the validity or invalidity of the deed bearing date May 2, 1868, and purporting to convey the land in question; whereas, it is respectfully submitted, he should have held that at the date of said paper, by a conveyance not impeached in this action, the said Reese owned the right, title, and interest of the said Samuel O. McCown in said land.

6. "Because his honor erred in concluding in effect, as matter of law, that the defendants, Carrie B., Marion H., Harriet A., and Reese A. McCown, had not acquired title to the land by adverse possession," &c.

1. As we understand it, the proceedings were aimed at the transaction by which Samuel O. McCown conveyed the Darlington land to Reese A. McCown. The papers executed on May 2, 1868, were only the evidence of that transaction, substituted by the parties themselves for similar papers before executed for the very same purpose and accidentally consumed by fire. The appellants in their answer made no reference to any other deed than that executed on May 2, 1868, and recorded on May 22, 1876, and they deny "that no consideration was paid by the said Reese A. McCown for the purchase of the land conveyed to him by the deed referred to in the complaint." The parties themselves substituted the deed of May 2, 1868; upon that as the evidence of the transaction they made their defence, and we cannot say that the judge "should have held that at the date of said paper, by a conveyance not impeached in this action, the said Reese owned the right, title, and interest of the said Samuel O. McCown in said land."

II. As to the refusal of the motion for leave to amend the answer of appellants. It seems that the motion was made at the trial. The testimony had been taken and the amendment proposed must, therefore, have been for the purpose of conforming the pleadings to the facts proved. No evidence upon the point indicated had been excluded for lack of the proposed amendment. The judge thought the special fact proposed to be alleged was not proved. The amendment would have added nothing whatever to the case of appellants. If made, it would have been only a pleading and not evidence, and could not have affected the result. Amendments are largely in the discretion of the Circuit Judge. Trumbo v. Finley, 18 S. C., 305.

III. As to the exception which complains that the Circuit Judge excluded the declarations of Reese A. McCown in his own favor during his life-time, while he was in possession of the land, and, as alleged, tending to show the character of that possession. The general rule is, that declarations of a party against himself, but not for himself, are admissible unless they were made at the time of other declarations proved against him. The party has the right to bring out all that was then said. In regard to the question of fraud or no fraud in the original transaction between S. O. and Reese A. McCown, the subsequent declarations of the latter, the grantee, in his own favor, could not possibly be regarded as a part of the res gestæ. The declarations of one in possession of land cannot be admitted for the purpose of proving title in himself, or those claiming under him. As was said in the case of Wardlaw v. Hammond, "had the declarant been living and on the stand, his answer to the questions propounded would not have been competent; how, then, is it that the declarant, because in possession, becomes a privileged witness?" 9 Rich., 463. But there are circumstances in which the declarations of a party in possession may explain the manner of his holding as to tenancy and possession, whether adverse or not, but not as to title, "as where a man's title is to depend on his acts." Hall v. James, 3 McCord, 223.

IV. As to the statute of limitations. The plaintiff recovered judgment against Samuel O. McCown on March 22, 1880, and he alleged and proved that he had no knowledge of the fraud charged until within six years previous to the commencement of the action. Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C., 526. As to adverse possession, the appellants claimed the land under the deed from Samuel O. McCown, and they must stand or fall upon that. When that failed them, we do not see how the discovery of the truth can have relation back so as to change the whole character of the possession. Reese A. McCown was put in possession by S. O. McCown under a secret trust, and therefore he could not plead adverse possession as against Samuel O. Mrs. McCown entered into possession with her husband, and must be considered to have done so on the terms and conditions on which he received it. "When there is no new entry, but the heir is in of his ancestor's possession, the possession of the heir is that of the ancestor." Reeder & Davis v. Dargan, 15 S. C., 182; Blackwell v. Ryan, 21 S. C., 123. "The question of adverse possession is inseparably connected with that of the statute of limitations, because, if there were no statute limiting the right of entry upon or of bringing the action for the recovery of real property, there would never be a necessity for scrutinizing the possession to learn whether such possession be adverse or not. Possession in law, to be sure, is prima facie evidence of legal title; but if it actually appears that the title to the property is in a person out of possession, except for the statute of limitations, the possession of such property would avail nothing." Tyler Eject., 851.

V. This brings us to the main question in the case, viz., whether the Circuit Judge committed error in his finding of fact that the deed of S. O. McCown to Reese A. McCown, conveying the Darlington tract of land in 1868, was fraudulent as against the creditors of Samuel O. McCown. In behalf of the widow and children of Reese A. McCown, it was most earnestly urged upon us that the finding of the judge below was not in accord with the intrinsic probabilities of the case, and against the overbearing weight of the testimony. The presumption is in favor of the correctness of the conclusions of the Circuit Judge, and the clear result of undisputed testimony must point to a different conclusion before it will be disturbed on appeal.

As is usual in such cases there was a volume of testimony more or less pertinent. We have read it all carefully, but we cannot, of course, discuss it in detail. Only one of the witnesses to the original transaction in 1868 was examined, Samuel O. McCown, himself, who testified positively as follows: "Was in debt at the time of execution of deed, was pressed on debt of Sarah Singletary, security debt; was being sued and Brown, the principal, was also sued. No money was paid as consideration for deed; made deed because Brown had made over his property to my brother Morgan, to evade debt. Brown was my brother-in-law. I made over my property to my brother Reese to avoid paying this security debt. Not the only deed I made to Reese. Perhaps a month previous I had made deed of same land; that deed was burned in Reese's dwelling, so he said; deed made for same purposes. I protected myself by Reese making a will. He was to hold property for me; will provided that on death of Reese, property was to go to my wife and children. (Produced the will.) It was the agreement to deposit the papers with mother for safe keeping. * * * Reese came out of the war with nothing, and I desired to help him and put him on place. I supplied part of stock and he part, and crop was equally divided after expenses were paid. This was arrangement 1866-7-8, and continued after execution of papers. Was never any other arrangement between us about the land, and it was continued until his death," &c.

The character of this witness was assailed, but we do not think with entire success. Some witnesses swore that they would not believe him on oath, but a greater number said that they would—that he was somewhat "gassy," "fond of witty sayings, and talks wildly and loosely on indifferent matters, such as crops, &c., but *when it comes to material things worthy of belief," &c. It seems to us that the testimony of Samuel O. McCown was corroborated by many of the circumstances. He was sued on the Singletary debt as stated; the will referred to as executed by Reese was produced. It was not probable that Reese, a young man just out of the war, was able at the time to pay for the land. But beyond all this, it did appear that on the very day the Darlington land was conveyed, Samuel O. McCown was engaged in the business of covering himself from his creditors, and actually transferred to the said Reese A., three other tracts of land in Williamsburg County, and all the stock, plantation tools, &c., thereon. It is admitted that all these other conveyances were fraudulent and void as made to evade the payment of the donor's debts. Under these circumstances, the object plainly being to put all his property out of the reach of his creditors, and the deed of the Darlington land being found in such bad company, it seems to us that it would require very strong proof, stronger than the case affords, to make this particular deed an exception, when all the other three were fraudulent and void. We cannot say that the finding of the Circuit Judge was unsustained by the evidence.

It is unnecessary to go into the controversy whether Reese A. ever subsequently paid for the land out of his part of the profits of the partnership in farming. Even if that were so, which we think was not made to appear, it could not alter the character of the original transaction, as made to delay and defraud the creditors of Samuel O. McCown. "A judgment confessed for the purpose of defeating other creditors, is fraudulent and void as to them, although based upon a valuable consideration." Beattie v. Pool, 13 S. C., 379.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*FROST & CO. v. WEATHERSBEE.

[1. Guaranty ⚡38.]

A letter of guaranty in the following words, to wit: "In consideration of your agreeing to advance to W. & Co. not exceeding the sum of $7,000 and interest, I hereby guarantee to you the repayment of the sums advanced and commissions as agreed," is a limited and not a continuing guaranty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. ⚡38.]

[2. Guaranty ⚡60.]

The words "commissions as agreed" in this letter of guaranty did not mean that cotton purchased by the principal debtor should be received in payment of the guaranteed debt to the exclusion of subsequent advances made by the creditor to purchase cotton.

The facts of this case show a new and independent arrangement between this creditor and W. & Co. after the guaranteed debt was full, under which the creditor advanced moneys to W. & Co. to purchase cotton, which was to be shipped to the creditor; and these two debts, one secured by the guaranty and the other by the cotton, to be shipped, remained distinct, notwithstanding their entry upon the books of the creditor as one continuous account.

[4. Payment ⚡38.]

Seable. Where cotton is shipped by a debtor to a creditor holding two demands, the proper time for the debtor to direct application of payment is when the cotton is shipped, and not when its sale is ordered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Baum v. Trantham, 42 S. C. 109, 19 S. E. 973, 46 Am. St. Rep. 697.

For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-103; Dec. Dig. ⚡38.]

[5. Factors ⚡45.]

But money having been advanced by a factor to purchase cotton, upon the security of such cotton being shipped to him, the person receiving the advances cannot direct the proceeds of cotton so shipped to be applied to another debt.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hankinson v. Hankinson, 61 S. C. 193, 204, 39 S. E. 385.

For other cases, see Factors, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. ⚡45.]

[6. Factors ⇨6.]

And the creditor, as factor, had a factor's lien upon the cotton in his possession, it having been purchased with money advanced by him, and he therefore had the right to apply the proceeds of its sale to the repayment of his advances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Factors, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. ⇨6.]

As it does not appear that any material fact or principal involved was overlooked in the decision, there is no ground for a re-argument. Petition for re-hearing therefore refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3215–3228; Dec. Dig. ⇨32.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Barnwell, March, 1884.

The Circuit decree, omitting such facts as are re-stated in the opinion, was as follows:

The defendant, A. J. Weathersbee, occupies the position of a surety. The contract of a guarantor or surety cannot be enlarged beyond its terms. The court say, in Tinsley v. Kirby, 17 S. C., 4: "A rule never to be lost sight of in construing the liability of a surety is that he is a favorite of the law, and has the right to stand on the strict terms of his obligation, where such terms are ascertained. This is a rule invariably recognized by the court, and is applicable to every variety of cases." Plaintiff's action is based upon written contracts of guaranty, and the guarantor's liability depends upon the construction of said contracts. The terms of the contracts, except as to amounts to be advanced, will be found in the paper signed by A. J. Weathersbee, February 1, 1881, as the paper subsequently signed May 26, 1881, merely furnishes a further guaranty for $1,500 more than it was at first agreed that plaintiffs should advance.

But for the expression in the guaranty, "and commissions as agreed," it seems to me that the intention of the parties could be readily discovered, and the contract would be free from ambiguity. The first paper states that the guarantor assumed the liability as surety for A. M. Weathersbee & Co., in consideration of plaintiffs agreeing to advance to the principal debtors not exceeding the sum of $7,000 and interest. This amount was increased $1,500, May 26, 1881, by the second paper referring to the limit in the original undertaking. It therefore appears that the contract expressly imposes a limitation upon the amount to be advanced with interest, and as this limitation was the consideration that induced A. J. Weathersbee to become guarantor, it must have been intended as a measure of the amount of the guarantor's liability to plaintiffs. The terms advance, accept, interest, and commissions, used in the guaranty, evidently contemplated the repayment at some future time.

I construe the terms, "and commissions as agreed," in the guaranty, to indicate that cotton was intended to be shipped plaintiffs by the principal debtor, as the medium for paying for the advances, and that the term commissions referred to some special rate of compensation agreed to be allowed plaintiffs for the sale of the cotton as factors. There was no antecedent debt due by the principal debtor to plaintiffs, as the principal debtors had just commenced business relations with plaintiffs. As three hundred bales had been mentioned as the probable amount of cotton that would be handled by the principal debtors, it would be reasonable for them to try and make special rates as to the commissions to be allowed on the sale of such a large lot of cotton. The defendant, A. J. Weathersbee, testifies that at the time he gave the guaranty he did not expect plaintiffs to advance to A. M. Weathersbee & Co. beyond the amount of the guaranty.

I am constrained to conclude and hold that under the contract of guaranty plaintiffs were limited to $8,500 advances to be made A. M. Weathersbee & Co., with interest, and that upon the payment of said sum and interest, by shipments of cotton by the principal debtors, the guarantor should be discharged. As already observed, plaintiffs' account shows payments by A. M. Weathersbee & Co. of the sum of $15,047.40. This view as to the intention of the parties is confirmed by the action of the plaintiffs. It appears by plaintiffs' account that A. M. Weathersbee & Co. commenced shipping cotton to plaintiffs on February 23, which was continued during the months of March and June. The proceeds of this cotton was applied as a credit upon A. M. Weathersbee & Co.'s account.

As already stated, on May 19 plaintiffs refused to honor a draft of A. M. Weathersbee & Co., giving them as a reason that they had drawn up to the guaranty (first guaranty), and that plaintiffs did not expect them to draw more until they had sent cotton. If the limit as to amount in the guaranty had referred to any balance due by principal debtors for advances, why should plaintiffs require additional guaranty when the principal debtors drew up to the limit in the first paper? The plaintiffs by their conduct have construed the original contract to be limited as to amount, and that the advances were to be paid out of cotton shipped them by the principal debtors.

It further appears that on August 31, 1881, one of the firm of A. M. Weathersbee & Co., applied to and obtained from plaintiffs the additional sum of $1,500 in cash, without security, to pay for goods to replenish stock and to move cotton crop. Thereafter plaintiffs continued to make advances, and A. M. Weathersbee & Co. continued to ship cotton to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs contend that this was the contraction of another debt by the firm of A. M. Weathersbee & Co., and that from August 31 the firm (principal debtors) owed them two separate and distinct debts—the one for advances secured by the guaranty, and the other for advances to *move the cotton crop. Plaintiffs therefore contend that they had the right to apply proceeds of cotton on hand November 1 to the unsecured advances made to move the crop.

The account presented by plaintiffs, however, is one entire running account, including debits and credits blended together. Plaintiffs protest against any inference being drawn from their mode of keeping books. It is the duty of the court to decide a case according to the law applicable to the case as presented. The principle of law is, that in an account current the payments shall be applied to the charges in the order of time in which they accrue. In such cases the debt consists not of the items, but of the balance found to be due after applying credits to debits. Under this principle of law I do not think plaintiffs can invoke the right of application of partial payments to this case.

But even assuming that A. M. Weathersbee & Co. contracted two separate debts, it would admit of doubt whether the money could be considered in the hands of plaintiffs until the cotton had been sold or ordered to be sold. It appears that when A. M. Weathersbee & Co., the principal debtors, on November 21 directed the sale and application of proceeds of cotton to the guaranteed advances, the cotton was then being held subject to order as to time of sale.

It was contended that the factor's lien attached to the cotton in the hands of plaintiffs to the extent of advances to move the crop. Having concluded that it was the intention of the parties at the time of the guaranty that payments by the principal debtors were to be first applied to the guaranteed advances, and that no further advances were contemplated, the factor's lien cannot be enforced in violation of such contract to the prejudice of the guarantor. I have no doubt, and it is reasonable to suppose, that plaintiffs expected the principal debtors to ship enough cotton to pay the guaranteed debts, as well as the extended credit for advances allowed the principal debtors. Unfortunately for all parties, the short crop of 1881 disappointed any such expectations, and, as already stated, the parties must now stand upon their legal rights.

It was further insisted that even if the contract of guaranty should be held to limit advances to $8,500, to be paid out of pro*ceeds of cotton, the limit of credit was waived with the knowledge and consent of all parties, so as to include advances to move the crop. One of the plaintiffs testifies that the guarantor told plaintiff at the time that he overlooked and saw that the business of the principal debtors was kept straight. It also appears from the accounts that some of the drafts paid by the plaintiffs were for the benefit of the guarantor. The guarantor testifies that he delivered cotton to the principal debtors, to be shipped plaintiffs to meet the draft of $507.50 at the Bank of Charleston. He further testifies that he looked after the business of the principal debtors to see that the amount for which he endorsed was paid, and insisted that they should ship plaintiffs cotton enough for that purpose. Waiver of the items of the contract of guaranty is not alleged in the complaint, nor does the evidence establish the guarantor's liability beyond the terms of his contract upon which he is sued.

The plaintiffs in their complaint allege that certain transactions took place between the principal debtors and the surety to protect the surety from liability as guarantor to plaintiffs. Records of a confession and conveyances from the principal debtor to the surety were introduced before the master. The plaintiffs therefore demand that the guarantor should account to them for value of property of the principal debtors received by the guarantor as indemnity. The guarantor in his answer alleges and testifies that he advanced money to the principal debtors to enable them to commence business and that he took possession of property of the principal debtors under the conveyances aforesaid in payment of bona fide indebtedness of said principal debtors.

The plaintiffs have had an opportunity before the master of interrogating the guarantor as to the character of the transactions between himself and the principal debtors above referred to. If the guarantor has received any of the property of the principal debtors to indemnify him against liability upon his contract of guaranty, he should be required to account therefore to plaintiffs. As the transactions last above referred to were between members of a family, about the time that the principal debtors were discovered to be insolvent, and as the guarantor admits he received property of the principal debtors, plaintiffs, if so advised, *should be permitted to require an accounting by the guarantor for the value of the property received by him from the principal debtors to indemnify him against liability upon his guaranty to plaintiffs.

As Matter of Fact. I. I find from the evidence that there was but one debt between plaintiffs and defendants, as represented by the account current presented by plaintiffs. II. That the amount of advances made by plaintiffs to A. M. Weathersbee & Co., with interest and commissions, secured by the contract of guaranty of A. J. Weathersbee, dated February 1 and March 26, 1881, have been paid by the principal debtors.

As Matter of Law. I. I find that the contracts of guaranty signed by A. J. Weathersbee limited the amount of advances to be made by plaintiffs to A. M. Weathersbee & Co. to eight thousand five hundred dollars, with interest and commissions on sales of cotton to be shipped by said firm to plaintiffs as factors, to pay said advances and interest. II. That the defendant, A. J. Weathersbee, is not indebted or liable to plaintiffs upon the contract of guaranty for advances made to the defendants, A. M. Weathersbee & Co.

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that plaintiffs have leave to apply to the Court of Common Pleas for Barnwell County for an order requiring the defendant, A. J. Weathersbee, to account for the value of property received from the defendants, A. M. Weathersbee & Co., to indemnify him under the contract of guaranty set forth in plaintiffs' complaint. Should plaintiffs fail to apply during the next two succeeding terms of the Court of Common Pleas for Barnwell County, after the filing of this decree, for the order herein provided, requiring the defendant, A. J. Weathersbee, to account, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that plaintiffs' complaint herein be dismissed with costs.

Messrs. Smythe & Lee, for plaintiffs.

Mr. H. M. Thompson, contra.

The written contracts of guaranty are, by their express and unequivocal terms, limited and not continuing. Rice, 131. The limitation upon the amounts to be advanced was the consideration which induced A. J. Weathersbee to become guarantor, and was the measure of the liability of the guarantor to the plaintiffs. The contract of a guarantor and surety cannot be enlarged beyond its terms. 17 S. C., 4. A material deviation from the contract by a party claiming to enforce it rescinds the contract. 16 S. C., 271; 14 Ill., 20; Chit. Cont. (10 Amer. ed.), 577. The debtor, in the first instance, has the right at the time of payment to direct its application. 1 McMull., 76; 9 S. C., 344; 20 Id., 46. As the plaintiffs at the time of payment held no other debt or claim against the principal debtors, distinct and separate from the account current, to such account alone the payments must necessarily be applicable. In the case of current accounts the successive payments or credits are to be applied to the discharge of the items of debit antecedently due in the order of time in which they stood in the account, which is not to be taken backwards, and the balance struck at the head instead of at the foot of it. Story Eq. Jur., 469 b, et seq.; 11 Rich., 466. A factor cannot separate his account into independent items and subject these items to different regimens to suit his own interests. Ibid. There can be no application of cotton or other commercial articles of uncertain or fluctuating value to an account until a sale is effected. Payment must necessarily mean money payment. An order to a factor to hold cotton suspends its conversion into money until further orders from shipper as the factor or commission merchant is only the paid agent of the consignor, and bound to follow the direction of the latter as to the consignments. Dudley, 248. The "time of payment," referred to by the court in Bell v. Bell, 20 S. C., 47, as the time for the debtor to make the appropriation, has reference to the time when the cotton is properly convertible into a circulating medium. Directions by the debtor, therefore, for application of proceeds should accompany orders to sell. The confession of judgment by A. M. Weathersbee & Co. to A. J. Weathersbee was partly to indemnify the latter against the contingent liability of his guaranty to plaintiffs, and partly to secure a debt due to himself individually. The contingency did not happen, and never can happen, if the liability of the guarantor is discharged by payment on the part of the principal debtors; hence the plaintiffs have no subrogation to any rights acquired by A. J. Weathersbee under the confession of judgment or under any compromise thereafter made in satisfaction of said judgment.

Mr. Robert Aldrich, same side.

August 12, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiffs are factors and commission merchants, doing business in Charleston, and in 1881 the defendants, A. M. Weathersbee & Co., viz., Ashley M. Weathersbee, Martin F. Weathersbee, and John A. Weathersbee, were merchants doing business at Williston, in Barnwell County, and the other defendant, Allen J. Weathersbee, the father of two and the uncle of the other member of the above firm, was, as alleged, guarantor for them to the plaintiffs. On June 29, 1882, E. H. Frost & Co. recovered judgment against A. M. Weathersbee & Co. for advances made to them, for $7,117.56, besides interest and costs, and the execution issued thereon having been returned unsatisfied, they instituted these proceedings to recover the said judgment from Allen J. Weathersbee as the guarantor of the defendants in execution and to set aside certain conveyances, assignments, confessions of judgments, &c., alleged to be fraudulent, made by the firm of A. M. Weathersbee & Co. to the said A. J. Weathersbee for the purpose of transferring all their property in fraud of their creditors, &c.

The defendant, Allen J. Weathersbee, admitted that he had guaranteed to secure the plaintiffs for advances to A. M. Weathersbee & Co., to the extent of $8,500; but he pleaded payment, insisting that, although a large part of the advances made to A. M. Weathersbee & Co. had not been paid, yet that all moneys received by the plaintiffs from them should be applied to the amounts first advanced, which were covered by his guaranty, and beyond the amount of $8,500 he was not liable as guarantor. The principal question, therefore, was whether the guaranty of A. J. W. was a continuing guaranty, intended to cover, to its extent, the eventual balance between the parties; and if not, as to the proper application of the proceeds of certain cotton purchased with money advanced by the plaintiffs for that special purpose, &c. The other defendants did not answer, but simply adopted that of A. J. Weathersbee.

The following is an outline of the principal facts. In the early part of February, 1881, A. J. Weathersbee and one or more members of the firm of A. M. Weathersbee & Co. went to the office of E. H. Frost & Co. in Charleston, for the purpose of getting advancements to run their business in Williston. The plaintiffs agreed to advance $7,000 upon condition that A. J. Weathersbee should guarantee the same, who signed the following paper:

"Charleston, S. C., February, 3, 1881.

"Messrs. E. H. Frost & Co.:

"Dear Sirs: In consideration of your agreeing to advance to Messrs. John A. Weathersbee, Ashley M. Weathersbee, and Martin F. Weathersbee, doing business at Williston, S. C., under the firm name of A. M. Weathersbee & Co., not exceeding the sum of seven thousand dollars and interest, I hereby guarantee to you the repayment of the sums advanced and commissions as agreed.

"Yours respectfully,

"A. J. Weathersbee.

"Witness:

"A. H. Gerard."

The plaintiffs on that day advanced to the firm of A. M. Weathersbee & Co. $2,000 in cash, and continued to accept their drafts until May 19, when they refused to honor another draft, because the balance on account was then as large as the guaranty, and, as they wrote, plaintiffs did not expect that they would draw any more until they sent cotton. A. M. Weathersbee & Co. replied that they were doing a larger business than anticipated and would need $1,500 more. Accordingly, on May 26, the firm delivered to plaintiffs an additional guaranty of A. J. Weathersbee for that sum, making the aggregate guaranty $8,500. The plaintiffs then continued to accept drafts until August 26, at which day the firm of A. M. W. & Co. owed the plaintiffs, balance of advances over receipts, the sum of $8,570, the full amount of the two guaranties, having sent but two bales of the new crop of cotton.

*On August 31, one of the firm went to the city and, as Mr. E. H. Frost swears, "told us he wanted $1,500 to pay for goods to replenish his stock and to carry into the country in cash, so as to have the means from both sources to move the cotton. No guaranty was spoken of for this loan, there was no question of guaranty, no need for it. The crop was made, was coming every day to market, and this money was actually needed to move and control the cotton by the sale of which the indebtedness was to be paid," &c. A. M. W. & Co. wrote to the plaintiffs, saying: "We would be glad for you to furnish us with the money to pay for cotton to be purchased, which we will forward to you as fast as we get it." In this way large advancements were made for the purpose of buying cotton, which was shipped to the plaintiffs.

At the time the shipments were made no directions were given except to hold for a better price. Nothing was said about applying the proceeds until a large amount, nearly $10,000, had been thus advanced, and a large quantity of cotton accumulated, when, on November 21, A. M. Weathersbee & Co., by direction of A. J. Weathersbee, wrote: "As our endorser, Mr. A. J. Weathersbee, is desirous of being relieved from any further liability for the amount endorsed for us, you will proceed to sell our cotton at once and apply net proceeds to credit of amount he has endorsed for us." The plaintiffs declined to make the application directed, and declined to make further advances. On December 9, one of the firm visited Frost & Co., who were so well satisfied that A. M. Weathersbee & Co. revoked their former order as to direction of the proceeds of cotton, that they actually made the further advance which they before had refused.

On December 18, A. M. Weathersbee & Co. confessed a judgment to A. J. Weathersbee for $12,000, for the purpose, as stated, of securing him against his liability as guarantor as aforesaid, $8,500, and certain notes due by the members of the firm, $3,500. On December 19, two of the partners conveyed all their real estate to A. J. Weathersbee, without stating any consideration. On December 10, the day after it was understood that E. H. Frost & Co. objected to the proceeds of cotton being applied to the guaranteed debt before the advances to purchase it were paid, A. M. Weathersbee & Co. mortgaged all their stock *and animals as additional security for the aforesaid debt of $12,000. On February 28, 1882, A. M. W. & Co. also made an absolute assignment of all their property of every nature and kind whatsoever to further secure the aforesaid debt of $12,000.

The advances made by E. H. Frost & Co. exceeded their receipts, and, as before stated, they recovered judgment for the amount of $7,117.56, and instituted these proceedings to make the guarantor liable for the same. The cause came on for trial before Judge Witherspoon, who construed the words in the first guaranty "and commissions as agreed" to indicate that it was the agreement of the parties "that cotton was to be shipped plaintiffs by the principal debtors, as the medium for paying for the advances, and that the terms 'commissions' referred to some special rate of compensation agreed to be allowed plaintiffs for the sale of the cotton as factors," &c.; and holding that the guaranty was limited to $8,500, he decided that it was paid and satisfied by the proceeds of the cotton shipped to plaintiffs, leaving unpaid the advances to purchase it, as to which both the usual lien of the factor and an alleged new arrangement as to advances for the special purpose of buying cotton were excluded by the terms of the original contract of guaranty, that the advances were to be paid by the shipment of cotton. But the judgment gave permission to the plaintiffs to ask an account by A. J. Weathersbee, the guarantor, for the value of all property received by him from the principal debtors to indemnify him against liability upon his guaranty to plaintiffs.

From this decree both the plaintiffs and the defendant, A. J. Weathersbee, appealed, the latter because the plaintiffs were allowed an account against him for the property received by him as an indemnity as guarantor, and the plaintiffs filed twenty-one exceptions, which are in the Brief, and need not be restated here.

There are really but two questions in the case: First, whether the guaranty was in its character continuing, and intended to guarantee the credit of the debtors to the amount indicated, so as to cover any "eventual balance" which might exist upon an adjustment of the accounts of creditors and debtors; or simply a security to be paid and cancelled by the first money of the debtors which, in the course of business, reached the hands of *the plaintiffs; and if the latter, second, whether the guaranteed debt of $8,500 was paid by the direction of the debtors to apply the proceeds of the cotton in the hands of the plaintiffs to the payment of the guaranteed debt, leaving unpaid their advances to purchase the same.

The first question must depend upon the agreement of the parties as to the purpose of the original guaranty. What was that agreement? It is not easy to determine precisely. It was not committed to writing, for it is plain that the guaranty was only a part of the contract. There was not even a bond or note given for the amount guaranteed. Nothing clearly appears, except what may be inferred from the nature of the transaction and the relation of the parties. It is certain that the advances were not all made at the same time like a simple loan, but were to be made as occasion required to enable A. M. Weathersbee & Co. to carry on the business of their country store at Williston, receiving advances as their necessities required and making payments as they might be able. Under such circumstances a guaranty of a particular amount is generally given, not as a limit to the business, but as continuing in its nature and intended to cover and secure "any balance" which may appear upon adjusting the advancements and payments, as in Conway v. Cunningham, 4 S. C., 351; Witte v. Wolfe, 16 Ibid., 260; and Kaphan v. Ryan, Ibid., 356. But in all these cases there was something which authorized that construction. In this case, however, we agree with the judge that nothing of the kind appears. The guaranty itself, by the words "not exceeding" the amount indicated would serve to limit the amount to be advanced as if it were a simple loan of that sum, and as a consequence, we think, was subject to discharge by any proper payments by the principal debtors under their original contract.

But we do not concur with the Circuit Judge as to the scope and extent of that original agreement. He construes the guaranty as affording the evidence that the advances were to be paid in any "cotton" that the debtors might ship to the plaintiffs, whether it was really their property, received in the course of their ordinary business, or purchased on speculation with borrowed funds. The word "cotton" does not appear in the guaranty. Nothing was said about it when the guaranty was executed, except the casual remark of A. J. Weathersbee (when he was holding out inducements to obtain the advances), that the principal debtors would probably "handle about 300 bales of cotton," and from this remark, taken in connection with the last words in the first guaranty, "and commissions as agreed," the Circuit Judge reached the conclusion that the parties then agreed "that cotton [we suppose the aforesaid 300 bales] was to be shipped, as the medium for paying the advances, and the term 'commissions' referred to some special rate of compensation agreed to be allowed plaintiffs for the sale of the cotton as factors." &c.

It seems to us that the isolated, unexplained phrase, "and commissions as agreed," will not properly bear any such very wide and expanded construction; especially when taken in connection with the fact that the guaranty then given was limited to $8,500, which, in such a large business as that indicated, would necessarily be swallowed up, and really amount to no security at all. If we assume that the agreement was to enable the parties to run their country store, we must also assume that it was to be run in the usual and ordinary way. There is not in the whole transaction an intimation that it was to be conducted in any other way, and we do not understand that it is any part of the legitimate business of a country store to speculate in cotton with money advanced for that purpose; and we are satisfied that the original agreement of guaranty did not contemplate any such condition of things, or provide that cotton so purchased should be received in payment of the guaranteed debt, to the exclusion of advances made to purchase it. This is abundantly confirmed in various ways, but especially by the declarations of A. M. Weathersbee & Co., that they had enlarged their business, and on that account were continually calling for more money after they had received the full amount guaranteed.

Having concluded that the guaranty was not continuing in the sense of securing any "eventual balance," but limited to $8,500, like a simple loan of that sum; the next question is whether that limited guaranty was paid and discharged by the direction of A. M. Weathersbee & Co. to apply to that debt the proceeds of the cotton purchased on speculation, leaving the advances made to *purchase it unsecured. We have just determined that such transaction was not within the original contract of guaranty. Was there a new and special arrangement upon the subject of purchasing cotton? On August 26 A. M. Weathersbee & Co. owed plaintiffs $8,570. This was secured by the guaranty, which was full to overflowing, and the plaintiffs had refused to make further advances. Mr. E. H. Frost swears: "On August 31 one of the firm came to the city and told us he wanted $1,500 to pay for goods to replenish his stock and to carry into the country in cash so as to have the means from both sources to move the cotton. No guaranty was spoken of for this loan, there was no question of guaranty—no need of it. The crop was made, was coming every day to market, and this money was actually needed to move and control the cotton, by the sale of which the indebtedness was to be paid, * * * in supplying these means no risk was to be run. They were advanced on the faith of the crop then coming to market, and were, of course, to be repaid from the first sales," &c. A. M. Weathersbee & Co. wrote for more money for the purpose of buying cotton. After inquiring about the cotton market and the advisability of continuing to purchase, they said: "We would be glad for you to furnish us with money to pay for same, which we will forward to you as fast as we get it."

We cannot resist the conclusion that this was a new arrangement for the purchase of cotton, over and above and outside of the original guaranty, with which A. J. Weathersbee had no concern, except, perhaps, to get credit on his guaranty for anything which A. M. Weathersbee & Co. might make clear in the business. It is perfectly certain that the plaintiffs so understood it. They so swear. They made these advancements after the original guaranty was full, and they had refused on the old arrangement to go further. It is not possible to suppose that they would have made these cotton advances for the mere purpose of receiving "cotton in payment" of their guaranteed debt, which was well secured, leaving the said advances unsecured. And we think that was also the understanding of A. M. Weathersbee & Co.; else why continue to ask for more money to buy cotton, with the promise that it should be sent forward to the plaintiffs "as soon

"as we get it;" else why confess judgment and make mortgages, assignments, &c., to secure A. J. Weathersbee against his liability as guarantor, &c.? We are constrained to conclude that as to the purchase of cotton there was a new arrangement, in which the cotton itself was to secure the advances for its purchase. There were, in fact, two distinct debts, one secured by the guaranty and the other by the cotton shipped. We do not think that a matter so important and vital should be controlled by the mere form in which the plaintiffs happened to keep their accounts.

Had A. M. Weathersbee & Co. the right to direct the proceeds of the cotton purchased with the advances made under this new arrangement, to be applied to the guaranteed debt, which had arisen under the original contract? The doctrine of the application of payments has recently been fully considered by this court in the case of Bell v. Bell (20 S. C., 34), in which it was held that "a debtor owing two debts to the same creditor has the right on making payment to direct its application. If the debtor has given no directions, the creditor may make the application at his pleasure," &c. In this case, while the advances were being made to purchase cotton, and the shipments to plaintiffs were being made, no instructions were given, except to hold for better prices. No instructions whatever were given as to the application of the proceeds until nearly ten thousand dollars had been advanced to buy cotton, and a large lot of cotton had been accumulated, when, on November 21, A. M. Weathersbee & Co., by direction of A. J. Weathersbee, wrote, directing "the cotton" sold at once and the proceeds applied to the payment of the guaranteed debt under the original agreement. This the plaintiffs at once declined, and again refused to make further advances.

It is manifest that if the plaintiffs had been aware of this view on the part of the debtors, the advances would not have been made; and whatever may be the legal rights of the parties, it is clear that this silence while the advances were being made and the cotton was going forward, operated to mislead the plaintiffs. The rule is very positive, that if the debtor wishes to control the application, he must make the direction at the time of the payment. We incline to think that in this case the time of payment was when the cotton was shipped and put into the possession and under the control of plaintiffs, and not afterwards, when the cotton was ordered to be sold. As in the case of Bell v. Bell, supra: "There is no evidence that the debtor gave any direction as to the precise application when the consignments went forward. In the absence of this the creditor had the right to make the application." But without going into that we think that the arrangement as to the purchase of cotton amounted to a contract that these advances were made upon the condition that they should be first paid out of the sales of the cotton, which effectually prevented the direction afterwards attempted to be given.

Besides, it is admitted to be the general law that a factor, who advances money in the purchase of goods, has a lien upon them to secure such advances. Judge Story, in his work on agency, says: "A factor who has possession of goods, in consequence of its being usual to advance money upon them, has a special property in them, and a general lien upon them." See Smith Merc. Law, 151, and notes; Bank v. Levy, 1 McMull., 435. The Circuit Judge fully recognized the general rule, but from the construction which he gave the original contract of guaranty, as embracing "the cotton" purchased under the new arrangement, he held "that the factor's lien cannot be enforced in violation of such contract to the prejudice of the guarantor." We have held that the original contract of guaranty did not embrace this cotton at all, and that the new arrangement, in precise unison with the principles of equity, and the factor's lien, made the cotton first liable for the advances made in its purchase. According to this view the plaintiffs, as factors in possession, had the right to apply the proceeds of sale, first to the advances made in purchasing it, and then the balance in liquidation pro tanto of the guaranteed debt. This was substantially done, in no way injuring the guarantor, A. J. Weathersbee, but, on the contrary, liquidating the debt for which he was clearly liable by the sum of $1,399.36, leaving the judgment for $7,117.56, with interest and costs, still to be paid by him as guarantor.

This view makes it unnecessary to enter into the question of account claimed against A. J. Weathersbee for the money and property alleged to have been transferred to him by *A. M. Weathersbee & Co., to indemnify him against all liability as guarantor for them as aforesaid.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and judgment entered against A. J. Weathersbee in accordance with the conclusions herein announced.

In this case a petition was filed, asking for a rehearing, alleging error in some of the conclusions of fact drawn by this court from the testimony, and more particularly alleging that the case did not show that all the cotton shipped by Weathersbee & Co. to Frost & Co. had been purchased with money advanced by Frost & Co., but, on the contrary, that defendant could show, if permitted so to do, that 185 bales of the cotton so shipped were obtained in the ordinary course of trade in payment of balances due on customer's ledger.

November 28, 1885. The following order was passed

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered this petition. After the new arrangement that the plaintiffs should advance for the purpose of buying cotton, the proceeds of all the cotton received (except what was necessary to refund the advances and pay commissions) was credited upon the guaranteed debt, so that an inquiry whether the money advanced for the purpose of buying cotton was, or was not, actually used for that purpose, was not in the case. As it does not appear that any material fact or principle involved was overlooked in the decision, there is no ground for a reargument. The petition is dismissed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, April, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

Mr. C. R. Miles, attorney general, contra.

September 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, under section 268 of the General Statutes, for the purpose of having the amount assessed upon it, as its proportion of the expenses of the railroad commission, and paid by it, under protest, to the defendant, as county treasurer of Richland County, declared to be illegally and wrongfully collected, and for the purpose of obtaining a certificate to that effect from the court, so that the same may be refunded. The case was docketed by the clerk, presumably at the instance of the plaintiff's attorney, on calendar No. 2, when, on motion of the attorney general, appearing for the defendant, the Circuit Judge granted an order that it be transferred to calendar No. 1, upon the ground that it was an action for the recovery of money, and as such triable by a jury. The act of 1882 (18 Stat., 41) declares that: "Upon calendar No. 1 shall be placed all cases and issues to be passed upon by a jury. Upon calendar No. 2 shall be placed all cases to be passed upon by the court, including all motions and rules to show cause." So that the only question raised by this appeal is whether this was a case "to be passed upon by a jury" or by the court.

The code, in the chapter entitled "Issues and the mode of trial," provides in section

269 as follows: "Issues arise upon the *pleadings when a fact or conclusion of law is maintained by the one party and controverted by the other. They are of two kinds: 1. of law; and 2. of fact." Section 270 provides that "an issue of law arises, 1, upon a demurrer to the complaint, answer, or reply, or to some part thereof." Section 271: "An issue of fact arises, 1, upon a material allegation in the complaint controverted by the answer"—the remainder of the section, not being material to the present inquiry, is omitted. Section 274 provides that "an issue of law must be tried by the court. * * *. An issue of fact, in an action for the recovery of money only, * * * must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial be waived." From these quotations from the code, we deduce the following conclusions: 1st. That an issue of fact can only arise when some material allegation (of course of fact) is made in the pleadings of one party and controverted in the pleadings of the other party. 2d. That the proper mode of raising an issue of law is by demurrer. 3d. That an issue of law must be tried by the court. 4th. That an issue of fact, in an action for the recovery of money only, must be tried by a jury, unless that mode of trial be waived.

Now, applying these conclusions to the case in hand, we think it clear that there was no issue of fact raised requiring a trial by a jury, but that the only issue presented was an issue of law which "must be tried by the court." There is not a single material allegation of fact in the complaint which is controverted by the defendant in his pleadings, styled an answer, but the sole issue presented is one of law, whether the act requiring this assessment was constitutional. It is true that, as we have seen, the proper mode of raising such an issue would be by demurrer, and the defendant has not seen fit so to style his pleading; but that cannot alter its legal effect. It does not controvert any material allegation of fact contained in the complaint, and therefore it does not raise any issue of fact. It simply controverts the legal positions taken in the complaint, and thereby raises only an issue of law, and can therefore be regarded only as a demurrer. Even if the case be regarded as an action for the recovery of money only, it would not follow that it must be tried by a jury; for, as we have seen, the code does not provide that an *action for the recovery of money only must be tried by a jury, but its language is: "An issue of fact, in an action for the recovery of money only, * * * must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial be waived." &c. Here there is no issue of fact presented by the pleadings, and there was nothing for a jury to try.

Inasmuch as the plaintiff insists upon its legal right, guaranteed by statute, of having its case, which involved no issue of fact, but only an issue of law, placed upon the proper calendar for trial by the court, we think there was error in refusing such demand.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be restored to calendar No. 2, for trial by the court.

FRASER & DILL v. CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON.

Ex parte CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON.

Ex parte RAVENEL & CO.

(April Term, 1885.)

1. The decision in Fraser & Dill v. City Council of Charleston, 19 S. C., 381, stated.

[2. Judgment ⇨ 626, 677; Receivers ⇨ 90.]
A receiver will not be ordered to institute proceedings to test the validity of judgments which have been already finally adjudged to be valid. This case distinguished from Ex parte Brown & Wife, 15 S. C., 519, and 18 Id., 87.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1193; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 626, 677; Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 164; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 90.]

[3. Judgment ¶735.]

Claims were left open by a decree and further proof required, and no exceptions were taken, and on appeal by other parties this decree was affirmed. Held, that it was res judicata that these claims had not been then established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1263, 1265; Dec. Dig. ¶735.]

[4. Executors and Administrators ¶238.]

Claims established against an estate without proper parties before the court, may be again brought in question and rejected at the instance of such parties when brought in, even though such rejection may enure to the advantage of other creditors who did not, or could not, contest these claims.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 844; Dec. Dig. ¶238.]

[5. Receivers ¶151.]

Decree of the Circuit Judge approving the master's report, that certain claims presented were not proved, affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 269-271; Dec. Dig. ¶151.]

[6. Executors and Administrators ¶260.]

A judgment against an executor, without collusion, is conclusive as to the validity of the claim upon which it is based, but the rank of the *claim, in the distribution of the assets, is determined by its condition at the death of testator. Where all the unpaid valid claims against testator were simple contract demands at his death, since reduced to judgment against the executor, it is not error to order the assets to be applied to them ratably.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 939; Dec. Dig. ¶260.]

7. Concurring finding of fact by master and Circuit Judge approved.

[This case is also cited in City Council of Charleston v. People's Nat. Bank, 23 S. C. 413, 414, without specific application.]

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, November, 1884.

For a history of this case, see the reports of the case upon previous hearings in 8 S. C., 318, 344; 11 Id., 486; 13 Id., 533; 14 Id., 214; 19 Id., 384. After its last hearing in this court the City Council filed a petition praying the Circuit Court to order the receiver of the estate of Joseph Whaley to institute proceedings to test the validity of the judgments obtained by the plaintiffs in the principal case, and others.

In the principal case it was referred to T. M. Hanckel, Esq., master, to inquire and report upon the claims of the receiver of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, and leave was given to the legatees of Joseph Whaley to except to all claims against the estate not reduced to judgment. The City Council of Charleston, assignee of these legatees, accordingly excepted.

Upon the claim of Ravenel & Co., master Hanckel reported as follows:

The first claim examined under the exceptions was the claim of Ravenel & Co. against the estate of Joseph Whaley, for loans and advances made by them in the manner stated in the evidence herewith filed. From that evidence I find that the correct amount of this claim of Ravenel & Co. is ascertained to be the sum of $6,404.13, with interest from January 1, 1873; and I find that the amount so ascertained is a valid and subsisting claim of Ravenel & Co. against the estate of Joseph Whaley.

Upon the claim of Theodore D. Jervey, No. 2, the master reported as follows:

Note of William Whaley for $2,387, dated June 1, 1874, payable ten days after date to Theodore D. Jervey, Esq., or order, with interest after maturity at the rate of one and one-quarter per cent. per month, secured by an assignment to the payee of a certain "stated claim," alleged to be due to said William

*Whaley by the estate of Joseph Whaley, for his commissions and for expenses of the last illness of Joseph Whaley, and for judge of probate's fees, and sundry other "items"; and a statement of said "stated claim" being annexed to said note and therewith filed with this report. There has not been submitted to me, nor can I find in the records of the case, any evidence whatever to show whether or not any commissions were ever earned by William Whaley as the executor of Joseph Whaley, or any sums of money ever advanced by him out of his individual means to pay the expenses of the last illness of Joseph Whaley, or the judge of probate's fees, or any other items legally due by this estate of Joseph Whaley, or the amounts of such advances; or that upon the accounting between the said William Whaley as executor and the said estate any balance has been found due the said William Whaley for such advances; such accounting being, of course, necessary to establish such claim. I therefore find that there is no evidence whether or not this claim of Theodore D. Jervey, No. 2, is a valid claim against the estate of Joseph Whaley.

Upon the claim of G. L. Buist, the master reported that the note was not produced, and all the other claims he reported to be based upon forged signatures of Joseph Whaley.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

The above stated case came before me at the fall term of the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston County in 1884. The matters were not heard together, but at the same sitting of the court. The first of the above stated causes comes up on a report of the master, and the second on a petition for an order instructing the receiver to adopt such proceedings as are proper and necessary to test the validity of certain claims presented in this case against the estate of the testator. The City Council of Charleston also filed exceptions to the master's report, as well as other parties to the proceedings. The purpose of the exceptions filed by the City Council is substantially the same as that sought to be obtained by the petition. The matters will therefore be considered together. The questions raised by the petition, report, and exceptions will more fully appear by reference to them.

There is no allegation of any facts which show any ground of invalidity in, or any matter of defence to, any of these claims *which have not already been considered by the court in this case, between the petitioners and the creditors, whose claims the court is now asked to order the receiver to contest. This petition refers only to certain creditors who have obtained judgments at law, because all others are now undergoing investigation in this court, according to the practice of the court in such cases, and are passed upon in said report. The claims of these judgment creditors after a long litigation have been established by the Circuit Court, and the judgment of the Circuit Court has been affirmed by the Supreme Court, and this has been done in this case, in which the petitioner and these judgment creditors are parties, and in which the contest was carried on directly between these parties, each represented by counsel.

The receiver, as I understand it, is an indifferent person, who is simply to hold the fund for the parties entitled to it, and has in himself the rights of both parties. As the representative or successor of the deposed executor, he cannot repudiate his acts, unless for fraud or collusion between the executor and the creditor, and which he may do, as for this purpose he will be invested with all the rights and equities of other creditors or legatees. As the representative of the other creditors and legatees, he ought not to be allowed to assail these judgments, because their rights have already been passed upon by the court, and the petitioner, as assignee of the legatees, does not now say anything in any manner impeaching them, more than has heretofore been said in this case. It is difficult to conceive what rights of the creditors and legatees can be vested in the receiver in this case, which are not vested in them directly, and which they have not the right and have not had the opportunity in this case to litigate. I do not, therefore, see any propriety in ordering the receiver to institute proceedings as prayed for in the petition.

It may be that these judgments are founded on instruments to which the name of the testator, Joseph Whaley, was forged by the executor, who had been deposed. The court has held that it is too late after the rendition of these judgments to raise this question. There is not a single suggestion throughout this long litigation that these creditors are not innocent of any fault in reference to them. Mere legatees are volunteers, and take by the testator's bounty, and it is presumed were in a much better position to know of the mismanagement of the estate, than the creditors whose means were used by the chosen representative of the testator, their ancestor.

The other questions in this case arise on the report of the master, filed November 18, 1884, and exceptions thereto. Whatever may have been the legal effect as amongst the creditors themselves, of certain orders which were made in the cause, before the amendments were made by which the City Council of Charleston was impleaded as assignee of two of the legatees, and from which no appeal was taken by any of the creditors, all the claims which had not been put into judgment were left open as unadjudicated by the decree of September 18, 1882, as between all parties to the action, and from so much of that decree there has been no appeal. I am inclined to the opinion that the decree was, as to those matters in which it is said to have been modified by the decree of Judge Kershaw, simply administrative and within his control. If, however, the said decree of September 18, 1882, was as to such matters judicial, the proper way to correct the subsequent ruling was by an appeal to the Supreme Court, and not by application to a Circuit Judge. In either view of the case, I will not go behind the order of Judge Kershaw.

Considering, therefore, that all the claims not in judgment were open for investigation before the master, I see no good reason why there should be any new trial before him, or by a jury, which is, in cases like this a matter of discretion. There is really more evidence that the claim of Ravenel & Co. is founded on a contract made by Joseph Whaley himself than there is outside of the presumptions of law in favor of even those which are in judgment. There is sufficient in the evidence before the master, as to this and all other claims reported on, to justify his conclusions, and I therefore concur in them.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the petition of the City Council above referred to be dismissed, the costs to be paid by the petitioner. It is further ordered, that the exceptions to the said report be overruled and the report confirmed. It is further ordered, that the receiver, T. W. Bacot, do proceed to *sell, as soon as practicable, the city four per cent. bonds in his hands, and that he apply the proceeds of sale and any other funds in his hands, after deducting his commissions as fixed by the previous orders in this case: First, to the payment of any taxes due the State: second, to the payment of the costs and disbursements of the master and other officers of the court: third, to the following claims established in this case:

* * * * *

Should the funds in the hands of the receiver be insufficient to pay the above claims in full, it is ordered that the receiver do pay them pro rata.

From this decree, the City Council of Charleston and the creditors whose claims were rejected appealed; and E. H. Gadsden, administrator, also appealed from so much of the decree as allowed the claim of Ravenel & Co.

Mr. George D. Bryan, for City Council.

Mr. W. St. J. Jervey, for rejected claims.

Messrs. E. McCrady, Jr., John Wingate, and J. E. Burke, for judgment creditors.

Messrs. W. H. Brawley and Langdon Cheves, for Gadsden, appellant.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for Ravenel & Co.

September 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This case has been so often before this court on previous occasions that anything like a full statement of the facts is unnecessary, as they can be gathered from the report which may be found in 19 S. C., 384, and from the reports of the master and the decree of the Circuit Judge in the "Case" as prepared for argument here.

The appeal on behalf of the City Council of Charleston seems to us to be an effort to reopen questions which have heretofore been finally adjudged, and therefore calls for no further discussion than to show that the questions raised by the appeal have already been determined. The object of these appellants is to assail the validity of the judgments recovered by the plaintiffs and others against Wm. Whaley, as executor of Joseph Whaley, in actions at law, upon the ground that the notes upon which they were recovered did not bear the genuine signature of Joseph Whaley, but that his name was forged by the executor, Wm. Whaley. As we understand it, this was the very question determined adversely to the appellants by the decree of Judge Fraser of September 18, 1882, affirmed by this court in 19 S. C., 384. The fact that in this case the appellants, by their petition, ask for an order requiring the receiver to contest the validity of these judgments, cannot alter the case. The former decision was not based upon the fact that the attack upon the judgments proceeded from the wrong source, but the question was determined upon its merits. The language of Judge Fraser—"in the absence of collusion, I must regard a judgment against an executor as conclusive against the world whenever the same matter comes in question again"—conclusively shows this; and the whole tenor of the opinion of this court affirming that decree demonstrates that this court based its decision, not upon the form of the proceeding, but upon the merits. To say the least of it, therefore, it would be entirely nugatory to grant an order authorizing or directing the receiver to litigate a question which has already been determined in this very case.

The cases of Ex parte Brown and Wife (15 S. C., 519), and Ex parte Layne (18 Id., 87), which have been cited to sustain the view contended for by the appellants are not applicable. In those cases, claims which arose subsequent to the appointment of the receiver, were in controversy, and of course, therefore, the judgments which had been recovered against the railroad company were not binding upon the receiver, while the claims in controversy here arose prior to the death of Joseph Whaley, and, of course, prior to the appointment of the receiver of his estate. The other cases cited by the appellants (with the exception of Wilson v. Kelly, 19 S. C., 160, which has been sufficiently explained in the former decision refusing a motion for a rehearing of this case), relate to questions of the rank of claims *reduced to judgment against an executor or administrator in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent estate, and have no application to the question sought to be reopened by this appeal.

Our next inquiry is as to the appeal in behalf of the simple contract creditors, together with one bond creditor, the People's Bank, who had not reduced their claims to judgment, and whose claims have been rejected, either because they were forgeries, or because there was no evidence to establish them as debts of the testator. It is quite clear that the Circuit Judge in this case was right in saying that "all the claims which had not been put into judgment were left open as unadjudicated by the decree of September 18, 1882, as between all parties to the action, and from so much of that decree there has been no appeal," for in that decree the same judge, after adjudging that the judgments recovered at law were valid claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, uses this language, manifestly referring to the claims of these appellants: "The other claims presented to the referee, G. W. Dingle, stand on a different footing, and I prefer, in the present state of the evidence, to have more light in reference to them," and he therefore ordered that all of the creditors (which, of course, included these appellants), except the judgment creditors, should be required to establish their claims within a prescribed time before the master, or be barred from any benefit or advantage of any judgment or decree in this cause. If there was any error in this, the proper time to correct it would have been by appeal from that decree; but when there has been no such appeal and no exception constituting a basis for an appeal from the final decree in the cause, and, on the contrary, the same has been affirmed by this court, it has become at least the law of this case. So that even if there was error in that decree, as we do not think there was, it cannot now avail the appellants.

It is quite certain that a judgment rendered in a cause in the absence of necessary parties has no force or effect as against such parties. Hence, even granting that the very loose and informal proof of these claims, if indeed, there was any proof at all, before the clerk or referee, Dingle, converted them into judgments or decrees in equity, inasmuch as all this occurred in the absence of parties whom this court has adjudged to be necessary *parties, they would have no validity as to such parties. And when these necessary parties were brought in, it was not only the right, but the duty, of the court to provide for the investigation of the validity of these claims, and if upon such investigation they have been shown to be no claims against the estate of the testator, they certainly cannot be allowed to participate in the distribution of the assets of the estate.

The fact that this may enure to the benefit of the judgment creditors who possibly may have been estopped from raising the question as to the validity of the claims of these appellants (though we do not deem it necessary to determine that question), cannot alter the case. The court certainly cannot order any of the assets of the estate paid to any one claiming to be a creditor of the estate until he has established his claim in a proper proceeding, wherein all necessary parties are before the court and are allowed an opportunity to contest such claim if they see fit to do so. Even if every one of the judgment creditors had, throughout this litigation, and even yet, consented that the claims of these appellants should be regarded as valid claims against the estate, this could not make them so as long as any other party to the cause, whether legatee, or assignee of legatees, insisted upon proper proof of such claims, as has been done in this case; and in the absence of such proof this court would be bound to reject them as invalid claims against the estate, even though the effect might be to increase the dividend which the judgment creditors would receive. These appellants have no claim, and do not pretend to have any, against the judgment creditors. Their claims are against the estate, and until they are established against the estate they are entitled to nothing. The claim of Theodore D. Jervy, No. 2, is supposed to stand upon a somewhat different footing from the other claims, which were rejected as forgeries. But we do not see that there is, practically, any difference. This claim was never established as a debt of the testator in any proceeding where all necessary parties were before the court, and therefore cannot be allowed as a claim against the estate.

The exception taken by the City Council that the Circuit Judge has ordered all the judgments to be paid ratably, if there is a deficiency of assets, without regard to rank, seems to have *been taken under a misapprehension of the facts. The master reported that all the judgments, except that in favor of Richard Lathers, which has been paid and is out of the case, were based upon simple contract debts, and all bearing the same rank would, of course, be paid ratably in case of a deficiency of assets, as directed by the decree. For while a judgment recovered against an executor is, in the absence of proof of collusion, conclusive as to the validity of the claim upon which it is based, as a judicial ascertainment of that fact, in a proceeding in which all proper parties are before the court, yet it has no effect in determining the rank of such claim, which, according to the well settled rule, must be determined by reference to the condition of the claim at the time of the death of the testator, or intestate, as the case may be. If it was then a mere simple contract claim, it still retains that rank, after it has been reduced to judgment, against the executor or administrator.

The appeal from so much of the decree as allows the claim of Ravenel & Co. seems to be based upon a question of fact, and in view of the concurring judgment of the master and the Circuit Judge, we see no ground which would warrant this court in interfering.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

WOOD v. REEVES.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Evidence ¶332.]

In action for foreclosure by the mortgagee against the vendee of the mortgagor, records of the Probate Court may be introduced by defendant to show that the interest of the mortgagor in this property was not subject to mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1237-1246; Dec. Dig. ¶332.]

[2. Trial ¶105.]

A will introduced in evidence without objection to the absence of proof by a subscribing witness, cannot be afterwards objected to as unproved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 260-266; Dec. Dig. ¶105.]

[3. Mortgages ¶12.]

Land directed by a will to be sold by the executors and the proceeds divided is converted into money, and the interest of a beneficiary therein cannot be mortgaged. If sold under an arrangement between the executors and the other parties in interest, the sale is binding upon all.

*A mortgage must be proved by the affidavit of one of the subscribing witnesses and the proof recorded with the mortgage; and if this be not done, its record does not affect the rights of subsequent purchasers without notice.

[5. Appeal and Error ☞ 1178.]

The Circuit Judge having inadvertently omitted to state the sum for which he gave judgment, the case was remanded for correction.

Before Pressley, J., Laurens, November, 1884.

This was an action by T. R. L. Wood against William A. Reeves and others for foreclosure of a mortgage. The opinion states the case. The Circuit Judge decreed as follows:

My judgment on the above facts is that the interest of W. A. Reeves in the estate of his father was neither an interest in land nor in tangible property of any kind. The direction that his property "be sold and divided" gave each legatee a purely money interest, which he could assign and transfer, but the record of such assignment in the register's office is not notice to the purchasers of the land, nor does it give to the holder thereof any lien upon the land which he could foreclose as a mortgage. It is in law only an irrevocable power to receive from the executors the share of W. A. Reeves in the proceeds of testator's property when sold, and notice thereof comes too late after he had received his share.

Furthermore, if said deed be a valid mortgage on property which could be mortgaged, then in that case the record of the same without the proof and the registry thereof, as required by the act of 1839, makes the record ineffectual as constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser. Before that act, it was decided in Lamar v. Raysor, 7 Rich., 509, that legal proof before recording would be presumed; but not so since that act, which requires, as prerequisite to recording, the affidavit of one of the witnesses, and that same be recorded.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that plaintiff have leave to enter judgment and issue execution against W. A. Reeves, with interest thereon from commencement of this action, and for costs of this case. Further ordered, that as to all the other defendants the complaint in this case be dismissed.

Mr. F. P. McGowan, for appellant.

*Messrs. Ball & Watts, contra.

September 9, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Some time after November 24, 1869, and prior to the year 1879, but at what particular date does not appear, Drury Reeves departed this life leaving a will, bearing date November 24, 1869, by which he disposed of his property as follows: "After all my just debts are paid, I give to my wife, Elizabeth Reeves, all my property, both real and personal, during her life, or until M. A. Reeves, my youngest son, arrives at the age of twenty-one. In the event that my wife should die before my son, M. A. Reeves, arrives at that age, then in that case the property shall remain the same undivided in the hands of my executors until that time, or until M. A. Reeves arrives at the age of twenty-one years. Then I desire my property, both real and personal, sold and equally divided among the surviving heirs according to law. 2d. I make and constitute W. A. Reeves and J. S. Reeves my executors to carry out my last will and testament."

On December 8, 1879, Wm. A. Reeves, one of the sons of the testator, being indebted to the plaintiff, in order to secure the payment of said debt executed a paper under seal, in the presence of two witnesses, whereby, after reciting the amount of said debt, he declares that, in order to secure the payment of said debt, "I hereby assign, transfer, and convey to the said T. R. L. Wood, and by these presents do assign, transfer, and convey to the said T. R. L. Wood, all my right, title, and interest in the real and personal estate of my father, Drury Reeves, deceased." This paper was recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances on the day of its date, but it did not appear that its execution had ever been proved by either of the subscribing witnesses, there being no affidavit to that effect either in the book of records or upon the original paper.

On October 31, 1881, M. A. Reeves, the youngest son of the testator, having attained the age of twenty-one years, the legatees and devisees under the will entered into agreements for the settlement of the estate, by which the real estate was sold to some of the children, a portion of it passing into the hands of the *defendant, Wm. G. Gambrell, and to each child was paid his or her equal proportion of the estate in money, and these agreements, together with a statement of the settlement of the estate, were filed in the office of the judge of probate, who, on March 14, 1882, granted an order discharging the executors from their trust.

On July 24, 1883, this action was commenced by the plaintiff to foreclose his alleged mortgage on the undivided interest of the defendant, Wm. A. Reeves, in the real estate of which his father died seized. The Circuit Judge held that the interest of Wm. A. Reeves in the estate of his father was not an interest in property that could be mortgaged, but was a mere money interest, which might be the subject of assignment, which would not affect the other executor and legatees or devisees without notice, and that the record of such a paper would not operate as constructive notice. He further held that even if the paper could be regarded as a mortgage on the interest of Wm. A. Reeves in the land, the registry thereof without the proof of the execution being recorded was ineffectual as constructive notice. He therefore dismissed the complaint as to all the defendants except Wm. A. Reeves, with leave to the plaintiff to enter judgment against Wm. A. Reeves, "with interest thereon from the commencement of this action, and for costs of this case," but omitted the amount for which he directed judgment to be entered, no doubt through inadvertence, or probably as a mere clerical error.

From this judgment the plaintiff appeals upon the following grounds: "Because his honor erred: 1. In holding that the defendants, except Wm. A. Reeves, were bona fide purchasers without notice. 2. In holding that the mortgage as recorded was not notice to third parties. 3. In holding that William A. Reeves had no interest in the land of Drury Reeves, deceased, that could be mortgaged and sold under said mortgage. 4. In not holding that the land of Drury Reeves, deceased, until sold as the will directed, descended to the heirs at law, and that a mortgage given by William A. Reeves on his undivided interest before said sale could not be prejudiced by any proceedings to which the mortgagee was not a party. 5. In holding that the estate of Drury Reeves, deceased, had been settled as the will *directed. 6. In not holding that William A. Reeves paid no part of his distributive share to the extinguishment of said mortgage debt. 7. In admitting in evidence the records of the Probate Court and testimony going to show that defendants were purchasers of the interest of William A. Reeves without notice. 8. In not finding the amount of money due the plaintiff by William A. Reeves."

We are unable to perceive the pertinency of the fifth and sixth grounds of appeal to the questions presented for our consideration, as we do not deem it important to the real issues to be determined whether the estate was settled in accordance with the terms of the will or not, and as the amount due by Wm. A. Reeves was not determined by the judgment, it will be time enough yet when that is to be ascertained to determine whether Wm. A. Reeves applied his distributive share, or any part thereof, to the plaintiff's claim. As we understand it, the appeal really presents but four questions. 1st. As to the admissibility of the evidence mentioned in the seventh ground of appeal. 2d. As to whether Wm. A. Reeves had such an interest in the estate of his father as could be the subject of mortgage. 3d. If so, was the record of the paper styled a mortgage constructive notice to third parties? 4th. As to the defect in the judgment in not fixing the amount due by Wm. A. Reeves to the plaintiff.

As to the first question, we do not see upon what ground the evidence should have been excluded. It appears from the "Case" that the only objection made was "that the defendants have put in a general denial, and cannot be allowed to put up a special affirmative defence showing settlement of the estate." We do not understand that the testimony was offered with any such view, but simply for the purpose of showing that Wm. A. Reeves had no interest in the estate which could be the subject of mortgage—that his interest was a mere money interest, which might be the subject of assignment, but not of mortgage; and in this view the testimony was clearly competent. No objection was made to the introduction of the will for want of proof by one of the subscribing witnesses, which possibly might have been supplied if made at the proper time, and it cannot now avail the appellant.

*As to the second question, we agree with the Circuit Judge that Wm. A. Reeves took under the will of his father a mere money interest, which could not be the subject of mortgage. Land directed to be sold by a will and the proceeds divided is converted into personalty, money, which certainly cannot be mortgaged. Andrews v. Loeb, 22 S. C., 274. The fact that the land in this case was sold by private arrangement amongst the parties interested, and not by the executors, cannot alter the case, for the executors were parties to, and acquiesced in, such arrangements, and neither they nor any one else can now repudiate them; certainly not to the detriment of an innocent purchaser. Even granting that the fee in the land descended to the heirs at law, to prevent it from being in abeyance, between the time of the death of the testator and the time of the sale, yet the heirs could only hold it subject to its being disposed of according to the will. No interest whatever was given to Wm. A. Reeves in the land, but only a share in the proceeds of its sale, and his attempt to mortgage what he never had was necessarily nugatory.

We also agree with the Circuit Judge as to the third question. Even if the paper in question be assumed to be a valid mortgage, yet, unless it was recorded according to law, it could not, under the express terms of the statute, and not upon the plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice, affect the rights of a subsequent purchaser without notice; for as to him it is no mortgage. Was it recorded according to law? It could not be legally recorded unless its execution was first proved by one of the subscribing witnesses according to law (Woolfolk v. The Graniteville Manufacturing Co., 22 S. C., 332); and although prior to the act of 1839 the fact of the deed being upon the records of the proper office might have been sufficient to warrant the presumption that the deed had been properly proved, yet as that act, which was incorporated in section 5, chapter XXIII., of the General Statutes of 1872, the law then in force, expressly required "the proof in every case to be recorded with the writing," it would seem to follow that a paper was not recorded according to law unless proof of its execution was recorded also. And when, as in this case, neither the original *nor the record showed any evidence that its execution had ever been proved, we think it clear that the paper cannot be regarded as recorded, and hence cannot be constructive notice to any one.

In reference to the fourth question, as we have already intimated, it is apparent that there was error in omitting to fix the amount for which the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant, Wm. A. Reeves, and therefore, upon this ground alone, the case must go back to the Circuit Court, in order that this deficiency may be supplied.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed in every respect except as above indicated, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of having the above mentioned deficiency in the judgment supplied.

McGEE v. HALL.

[Partition ⇐17.]

Where, in action for partition, the defendant alleged an absolute title in himself, and claimed to hold the land under the statute of limitations, the issues of title raised in the answer should have been placed on calendar 1 for trial by a jury, leaving the question of partition to be afterwards determined by the court. It was error to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the court could not try titles to real estate in a case of partition.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Broyles & Simpson, for appellants.
Messrs. Murray, Breazeale & Murray, contra.

September 14, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. David Hall, late of Anderson County, died in 18—, leaving a will in which, among other devises and bequests, he devised certain tracts of land situate in *said county, containing some seven hundred and eighty-four acres to his three youngest sons, to wit, Absalom J., John M., and William C. Hall, to be divided equally in value between them. "The issue of any of said sons who may be dead to take the share of the parents, and if either of them should die without issue living at his death, then his or their share in said land to go to the surviving brothers, or their issue, as above." These two tracts, it seems, were surveyed and divided between the three sons named, William C. taking three hundred and forty acres, John M. two hundred and twelve, and Absalom J. three hundred and thirteen.

Shortly after this division, to wit, on May 21, William C. was killed in battle at Jackson, Miss., intestate, unmarried, and without issue; and during the same year, to wit, in August, 1863, his brother, John M., died, intestate, unmarried, and without issue, leaving Absalom J. the sole survivor of the three brothers. The entire lands then, as it appears, went into the possession of Absalom, who sold a portion of the William C. Hall tract, to wit, about one-half in value, to one Jonathan Adams, leaving about 175 acres, the balance of the William C. Hall tract, which, on the death of William C., it was supposed had gone under the will of David to John M. Hall. On the death of John M., Absalom being indebted to one O. H. P. Fant, and supposing that upon the death of John M. he had become the sole owner of the lands in question, on June 5, 1871, mortgaged said land, including the 175 acres mentioned above, to the said Fant. Under proceedings for the foreclosure of this mortgage in December, 1879, this 175 acres was sold and purchased by one Mrs. E. C. Bell, who subsequently sold and conveyed the same to the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall.

Under this state of facts, which are all set out in the complaint, the action below was instituted in June, 1883, the plaintiffs claiming that under the will of their grandfather, David Hall, the tract of land which William C. Hall took in the division went, upon his death, one-half to each of his surviving brothers, to wit, to John M. and Absalom J., and that upon the death of John M., unmarried, and without issue, the share of John M. therein descended to his heirs at law, including the *plaintiffs, Absalom J. and some of the other defendants named in the complaint; and that Lemuel J. Hall having purchased said land from Mrs. E. E. Bell, who bought at the foreclosure sale referred to above, he had become the owner of the share of Absalom J. Hall in said tract, thereby becoming a tenant in common to the extent of the share of Absalom J. therein with the plaintiffs and the other heirs at law of the said John M. Hall. Wherefore the plaintiffs prayed judgment: 1st. That the deed of the master for the 175 acres to Mrs. E. C. Bell under the foreclosure sale, and the deed of Mrs. Bell to the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall, be declared null and void, except as to the distributive share of Absalom J. therein. 2d. That there might be an accounting and partition and division of said land among the parties entitled, or sale, if necessary. And, 3d. That if deemed necessary an issue to try the title to said land should be ordered and directed between the heirs of the said John M. Hall and the said Lemuel M. Hall. Lemuel M. Hall answered the complaint, and resisting plaintiffs' claim for partition, denied the tenancy in common, and set up as his main defence independent title to the 175 acres involved, relying for title upon the deed of Mrs. Bell and the statute of limitations.

The case came up for trial before his honor, Judge B. C. Pressley, February, 1885, when a motion for an issue at law to try the titles to said land made by plaintiffs' attorneys being refused, an order, on motion of the attorneys of the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall, was passed, ordering as follows: "That the complaint be dismissed as to said defendant, on the ground that this court, sitting in chancery, has no jurisdiction to try titles to real estate in a case in partition. And it appearing to the court from the complaint and answer of the said defendant, L. M. Hall, that the said defendant claims titles in his own right; now, on motion of Murray, Breazeale & Murray, attorneys for L. M. Hall, it is ordered that the complaint herein be dismissed as to the defendant, L. M. Hall, and that he be allowed his proper costs and charges."

The plaintiffs excepted, and have appealed upon various grounds, all alleging in substance error to the judge in refusing the motion for an issue at law and dismissing the complaint as to the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall.

*Was it error to dismiss the complaint? His honor, the Circuit Judge, construed the complaint to be a complaint in chancery for partition, and it having appeared from said complaint and the answer of the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall, that said Hall claimed title to the land in his own right, thereby raising a question of title to real estate, in the opinion of his honor, the jurisdiction of the court sitting in chancery was ousted, and upon that ground he dismissed the complaint as to the said Lemuel M. Hall. It is no doubt true that an action in the nature of an action of ejectment for the recovery of real estate cannot be tried or entertained on the equity side of the Court of Common Pleas; such a case is strictly a case at law, and must be tried on the law side, and by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived by the parties. And if the action below had been in terms an action for the recovery of the land in dispute from the defendant, L. M. Hall, there would have been no error on the part of the Circuit Judge in declining to hear it on the equity side of the court; yet even in that case we do not think that the complaint should have been dismissed. The proper order would have been to transfer the case from calendar 2 to calendar 1, in other words, from the equity calendar to the jury calendar.

But the action was in no sense an action for the recovery of real estate in the nature of an action of ejectment, or of trespass to try titles. It was strictly an action in partition, based upon the plaintiffs' construction of the will of David Hall and the rights of Lemuel M. Hall in the land, arising upon his purchase from Mrs. E. C. Bell. And the right of the plaintiffs to the partition demanded depended upon the fact whether they had properly construed said will and the sale under the foreclosure proceedings. In their view, upon the death of William C. Hall, one-half of the land which he took in the division made under the will of his father went to John M., which, upon his death, became subject to partition among his heirs at law, Absalom being one of these heirs, whose interest was sold under the foreclosure proceedings, and finally reached the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall, thereby making him a tenant in common with the other heirs to the extent of Absalom's interest. And upon this ground they claimed partition, the complaint being filed for this purpose, *and for no other, except the incidental prayers, intended to remove the obstacles in the way of the partition, to wit, the prayer for vacating the deed of the master and of Mrs. Bell, except as to the interest of Absalom, and also the prayer for an issue if deemed necessary.

The case then came before the Circuit Court as a plain and simple case for partition on the part of the plaintiffs, with a statement of the facts upon which they relied. These facts were not denied by the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall, but the legal conclusion arising therefrom, and claimed by the plaintiffs, was contested, and, in addition, said defendant set up an independent title under the statute of limitations, thereby raising a legal issue. The case, then, upon the answer, assumed the attitude of a case in chancery for partition by the plaintiffs, met by a legal defense on the part of the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall, the one subject to trial by the court, and the other to trial by a jury. In such a case, under the old practice, an issue at law would no doubt have been ordered, but under the principles in the code, and the decided cases in our State since the adoption of the code, a special issue would be unnecessary, and the court, upon the pleadings, could proceed with the trial of both the issues—that raised in the answer before a jury, and that in the complaint by the court, unless the jury trial rendered the court trial unnecessary. See Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C., 108; Smith & Co. v. Bryce, 17 Id., 544; Chapman v. Lipscomb, 18 Id., 232.

Under these authorities we think it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to dismiss the complaint as to the defendant, Lemuel M. Hall. The proper practice would have been to have transferred the issues of title raised in the answer to calendar 1 so as to be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial was waived by the parties, leaving the equity question of partition to be determined by the court, dependent upon the result of the said jury trial. And to this end the judgment below should be reversed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial as above.

Before Hudson, J., Sumter, February, 1885.

This case is fully stated in the opinion of this court. The evidence was all taken in open court, and consisted of the mortgages, the depositions of the members of the firm of E. H. Frost & Co., and the testimony of other witnesses. The Circuit decree was as follows:

At the trial of this cause, so soon as the plaintiffs' counsel had read the complaint and exhibits, the counsel for the defendants moved to dismiss the complaint because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that creditors of David Morris, without first having obtained judgment at law and exhausted their legal remedies, were invoking the aid of this court on its equity side to relieve them of the consequences of deeds of mortgage given by the said Morris to certain of his creditors, in alleged preferences fraudulent as to the plaintiffs.

It is well established that a creditor must first exhaust his remedy at law before he can invoke the aid of equity to relieve *him against a fraudulent conveyance of property by a debtor. The only exception to this rule is that contained in section 2016, chapter LXXII., of the General Statutes, which gives to a simple contract creditor, or any creditor who has no judgment, a right to assail on the equity side of the court such an assignment for the benefit of creditors as is set forth in section 2014 of said chapter, without first having reduced his claim to judgment.

Now, the term "assignment" in said section has been defined by our Supreme Court, in the late case of Wilks v. Walker (22 S. C., 108 [53 Am. Rep. 706]), to mean not only the usual formal deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors in its directly technical sense, but any other mode of conveyance or transfer of property which is intended to have the effect of an assignment, and which in truth and fact does operate as such, be the said transfers called by whatsoever name. It must, however, be equivalent or tantamount to the instrument technically called an assignment, and must make preferences prohibited in section 2014. If the instrument or instruments of conveyance in effect accomplish, and are intended to accomplish, what is inhibited in said act, they are within its purview, whether called an "assignment" eo nomine or not. The court says: "Any other view, it seems to us, would sacrifice substance to mere form, and enable insolvent debtors by evasion to effect a purpose declared by statute to be unlawful."

Now, the motion to dismiss the complaint, commonly called an oral demurrer, and which in this instance is an objection to the jurisdiction of the court for want of equity shown in the complaint, admits the truth of all the allegations of the plaintiffs. An examination of the complaint shows that it is there in substance and in strong language alleged that the defendant, David Morris, being totally insolvent, and wishing to prefer certain of his creditors to the exclusion of others, and by far the largest in amount, and intending thus to defraud them of their just demands, did make to the said preferred creditors conveyances of all his property of every description for their sole and exclusive benefit: that he did not do this by an instrument technically called an assignment, but resorted to the subterfuge of chattel mortgages of very short maturity which were accepted by said *preferred creditors with a full knowledge of the insolvency of Morris, and his inability to redeem, and with a full knowledge that all his property was thus conveyed.

Such in substance are the allegations of the complaint, and the demurrer admits their truth. It is very clear that by such a transaction an assignment for the benefit of certain creditors is made to the exclusion of the great body of his other creditors, and that the attempt is by this mode of conveyance to evade the plain terms of the act. I therefore overrule the demurrer, holding that under section 2016 of said act they are admitted to assail the transaction without waiting first to recover judgment at law, and obtain a return of nulla bona to an execution, before the possible accomplishment of which the entire stock of goods would have certainly been sold and the proceeds inevitably lost to these plaintiffs.

The defendants excepted. The answers were then read and the trial of the cause proceeded. I do not propose to review the testimony. It is sufficient to say that I find as a fact that the evidence fully sustains all the material allegations of the complaint. The defendant, David Morris, at and before he gave these mortgages on his stock of goods, &c., was clearly insolvent; hopelessly so. He knew it well, and to the defendant creditors he conveyed his entire property, consisting of his stock of goods, &c., and no realty. The mortgages were to mature at a very short day, less than a month. He knew he could not redeem, and did not intend to try to do so, but intended that a sale should take place, and before the maturity of the notes consented in writing that a sale should be made soon after maturity, and without the usual time of advertisement. He further knew that he could not effect this preference by a formal assignment, and deliberately set himself to work to evade the statute by mortgages at short time of maturity. In these transactions he has violated section 2014 of the General Statutes, and the conveyances cannot stand. The invalidity of such an assignment as is contemplated in said statute does not depend upon the fact whether or not the preferred creditor has knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the debtor; the statute declares the assignment invalid, and this is its character regardless of the bona or mala fides of the preferred creditors.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said mortgages assailed in the complaint be set aside as null and void, and that all rights assigned thereunder be vacated and annulled, and that the property seized and sold, or its value, be delivered and paid over to the receiver appointed under these proceedings, by whichever of the said mortgagees the same was so taken and sold, viz., Alexander Morris. And it is further ordered, that the plaintiffs in this action who have proved their claims have judgment therefor, and that such of the creditors of said David Morris as have not, be allowed to come forward and establish their claims before the master of this court, who shall call upon them to do so by advertising to that effect in the Sumter Watchman and Southron for the space of two weeks, and that the funds of the said estate be distributed among said creditors as the law directs. The plaintiffs proved their debts, and the same was not questioned by defendants' counsel.

It is further ordered, that it be referred to the master of this court to ascertain and report what would be a reasonable fee to be paid out of the assigned estate to the attorneys for the plaintiffs of record in this cause.

Mr. Jos. H. Earle, for appellant.

I. The only question in this case is whether or not the mortgages executed by David Morris to his co-defendants constitute an assignment for the benefit of creditors in the sense of the term used in Gen. Stat., § 2014. If there has been no such assignment made by David Morris, then it must follow that his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. For, notwithstanding the strong language used by the plaintiffs in reference to the fraudulent transfer of their debtors' property, they were not in a position to question such transfers. They came into court as simple contract creditors, and as such they have no standing, except under Gen. Stat., § 2016. A simple contract creditor cannot maintain a bill in equity against his debtor, and the grantee to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the debtor's property, even though the debtor be insolvent and without the aid of the injunction the debt may be lost. He must first proceed at law and exhaust his remedy there. 1 S. C., 186, 96; 18 Id., 526. Equity has jurisdiction of fraud, but does not collect debt. A creditor must establish his demand at law, and obtain a lien upon the property before the transfer interferes with his rights, or he has any title to claim relief in equity. Bump Fr. Conv., 533-4; Wait Fr. Conv. 80, 81; High Rec., 277; High Inj., 18, 19.

II. There was no assignment for the benefit of creditors in this case. An assignment is properly the transfer of one's whole interest in any estate; but it is now generally appropriated to the transfer of chattels, either real or personal, or of equitable interests. 2 Watk. Conv., 227. The common law definition of an assignment is the transferring and setting over to another of some right, title, or interest in things in which a third party, not a party to the assignment, has a concern and interest. 1 Bac. Abr., 329; 2 Bl. Com., 326; Burr. Ass., 3. When it is said of a merchant that he has "made an assignment," it is understood, not that he has made a transfer of some specific article, or portion of property to this or that particular creditor in payment or as security, but that he has made a general disposition of his property, and suspended his whole business in consequence. Burr. Ass., 148, f. note; 1 Paine, 188, 195; 26 Vt., 462, 473.

III. A mortgage is not an assignment within the meaning of the act. The distinction is that the latter is an absolute transfer of the debtor's property to a trustee or assignee for the purpose of being turned into money and applied to the payment of the debts of the assignor; the former is a security for a debt and involves a resulting interest to the mortgagor. An assignment is more than a security for the payment of debts; it is an absolute appropriation of property to their payment. Burr. Ass., 12; 21 N. Y., 574; 20

Id., 15; 13 Iowa, 474; 42 Penn., 441; 41 Cal., 566. It does not create a lien upon the property, which is still regarded in equity as the assignor's but under it the whole estate, legal and equitable, passes to the assignee. This distinction is pointed out in, and made the basis of, the following decisions: 4 Watts & Serg., 383, 391; 7 Id., 335;

2 Mete., 99; *13 N. H. 298; 25 Id., 155; 10 Conn., 280; 26 Vt., 686; 37 Id., 225; 10 Cal., 269; 18 Ga., 668; 27 Id., 385; 1 Rand., 306; 3 S. C., 285.

IV. Under a mortgage of personalty the right of property is absolute at law in mortgagee after condition broken. 1 Tread., Con. R., 154. But in equity the rule is: "Once a mortgage, always a mortgage." That which was intended as a security shall never be turned into an absolute conveyance. McMull. Eq., 2. Mortgagee has no right to the property until debt is due. 14 S. C., 162. Mortgagor can enforce his equity of redemption until foreclosure sale. Jones Chat. Mort., § 693. Sale under mortgage must be advertised for fifteen days, unless mortgagor consent, in writing, to a sale in some other mode or on some other notice. Gen. Stat., § 2348. "The doctrine that a mortgagee can, after breach of condition has occurred, obtain an absolute title, is utterly antagonistic to the nature of a mortgage, and had its origin in the time when a valid mortgage or encumbrance could be made only upon an actual change of possession, and prior to the establishment of the equitable powers of courts." Herm. Chat. Mort., 454. In order to get rid of the equity of redemption, the mortgagee must either sell in the manner provided in the mortgage, or in the statute, or under judicial process. Ibid., 453.

V. The case at bar is distinguished from Wilks v. Walker, 22 S. C., 108. There "the conveyance of the land to Wilks in consideration that he would pay the donor's debt to the Patterson estate, was substantially an assignment for the payment of that debt." That case was somewhat analogous to the case of Peck & Co. v. Merrill (26 Vt., 686), where the debtor made an assignment, and also several mortgages of real estate, all executed about the same time. They were treated as one instrument. The like principle was adjudicated in the following cases, viz.: 10 Wisc., 443; 8 Iowa, 96; 45 Barb., 317; 16 Md., 101; 42 Me., 445; 26 Vt., 468. But in the case at bar the instruments executed by the debtor have none of the characteristics of an "assignment." They are mortgages, pure and simple. Before the act known as the assignment act was passed, a debtor could make a preference among creditors in various ways. The mode *usually adopted, and which oftentimes resulted in great injustice to some of the parties interested, was by executing a deed of "assignment for the benefit of creditors." To remedy this evil the act of 1882 was passed. If the statute is not broad enough to afford complete protection, it should be amended by the general assembly, not by the courts. A debtor can give a preference among his creditors by executing a mortgage to one or more of them. Rice Ch., 309; 12 S. C., 154.

Messrs. Moises & Lee, contra, cited 22 S. C., 108; Gen. Stat., § 2016; 2 Speers, 183; 2 Rich., 80; Jones Chat. Mort., §§ 447, 440.

September 17, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. David Morris and Alexander Morris were partners in a mercantile business at Sumter. The firm did a large business and claimed to be prosperous. On July 1, 1884, the partnership was dissolved, and Alexander retired; David undertaking to pay the debt of E. H. Frost & Co., and giving him for a half interest his note for $2,389.64. David then carried on the business and immediately purchased a large stock of goods, costing in the neighborhood of $20,000. The face of affairs suddenly changed, and David Morris, on December 17, 1884, executed two mortgages to E. H. Frost & Co., one to secure a note to themselves for $1,383.33, and one to them as agent of the Pacific Guano Company for $946.48; and two days after, on December 19, 1884, he executed another mortgage to his brother Alexander, to secure his aforesaid note given at the dissolution for $2,389.64, and also another note for $1,899.38, said to have been cash advanced, making the aggregate sum of $4,289.02.

All these mortgages covered the stock of goods, the only tangible property of David Morris. They were taken as due a few days after their date, viz., on January 1, 1885, and not only contained a clause authorizing seizure when due, but each has endorsed on it the following consent of the mortgagor: "I hereby consent that the mortgaged property within described be sold by *public auction on Tuesday, 8th instant, either in bulk or in parcels, at the option of the mortgagees, and under their direction, and that notice of such sale be given by posting a notice thereof on the door of the store on Liberty street, and also at the court house, on one of the front doors thereof. (Signed) D. Morris." Alexander Morris, being still liable for it as a member of the late firm of D. Morris & Brother, settled the debt of E. H. Frost & Co., but took an assignment of the mortgage, so that all of the mortgages are now claimed by Alexander Morris. Under these mortgages, the whole of the stock of goods was seized and sold in bulk, and bought by Alexander Morris, who took possession of the same.

The plaintiffs, creditors of David after the dissolution, instituted these proceedings to set aside the aforesaid mortgages and sale, for injunction, &c. The complaint alleged that "the said David Morris is wholly insolvent owing to plaintiffs and other creditors in the neighborhood of $20,000, the major part of which was contracted within four months, and since he knew of his intended insolvency; that on January 2, 1885, the defendant, David Morris, procured and suffered the mortgages aforesaid to be foreclosed upon his entire stock of goods, and by connivance, understanding, and agreement with his co-defendants, caused, procured, and suffered the entire stock of goods, &c., to be sold under said mortgages, on a side street in the town of Sumter, at shortly past 9 o'clock on the morning of January 8, 1885, just six days after the seizure aforesaid, without advertisement, except by a posted notice, and before the plaintiffs, all bona fide creditors of the said Morris, had opportunity or time to protect their rights, either by contesting the validity of said mortgages or by causing the property sacrificed at said sale to bring a full and fair price; that said mortgage to Alexander Morris was without consideration, and was and is null and void, and was executed for the purpose of giving to the said Alexander Morris security for a supposed indebtedness, &c.; that the whole transaction, from the beginning to the end, to wit, from the dissolution of the firm of D. Morris & Brother to the end of the sale, which took place on the morning of the 8th instant, was a systematic scheme to cheat and defraud the entire number *of creditors, aggregating near $20,000, and with the intent to shift the property from the possession of David to that of his co-defendant, Alexander Morris, and thereby preserve the entire property without paying for the same; that the said Alexander Morris has obtained possession of the large and valuable stock of goods recently held by the said David Morris, and is selling and disposing of the same at almost any price offered for cash, and is disposing of such articles as do not pertain to a bar-room business in a reckless manner," &c. The complaint prayed judgment that said mortgages be declared illegal, fraudulent, and void; that the sale aforesaid be declared illegal and void; that David and Alexander Morris be enjoined from selling said property, and to restore what they had removed; that a receiver be appointed and all the creditors called in by publication, &c.

The cause came on for trial before Judge Hudson, who, after overruling a verbal demurrer that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, heard the evidence and decreed that "by such a transaction an assignment for the benefit of certain creditors is made to the exclusion of the great body of his other creditors, and that the attempt is by this mode of conveyance to evade the plain terms of the act. I therefore overrule the demurrer, holding that under section 2016 of said act they are admitted to assail the transaction without waiting first to recover judgment at law, before the possible accomplishment of which the entire stock of goods would have certainly been sold and the funds inevitably lost to these plaintiffs. * * * In these transactions he has violated section 2014 of the said statute, and the mortgages cannot stand. * * * The invalidity of such an assignment as is contemplated in said statute does not depend upon the fact whether or not the preferred creditor has knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the debtor. The statute declares the assignment inoperative, and that is its character regardless of the bona or mala fides of the preferred creditors," &c. He gave judgment to the plaintiffs for their debt against David Morris, declared the said mortgages null and void, and ordered that the property seized and sold be delivered to the receiver appointed, and that such of the creditors of the said *David Morris as have not, be allowed to come in and establish their claims before the master of the court, and that the funds arising from the sale of the stock of goods be distributed among all the creditors who establish their claims as the law directs, &c.

From this decree, Alexander Morris appeals to this court upon the following grounds: "I. Because the plaintiffs, as simple contract creditors of D. Morris, had no right to question the validity of the mortgages made by him. II. Because there has been no assignment by David Morris for the benefit of creditors. III. Because the mortgages in this case did not constitute such an assignment for the benefit of creditors as is set forth in section 2014 of the General Statutes of the State. IV. Because the mortgagees of said David Morris, defendants herein, did not know, and had no good reasons to believe, that said Morris was insolvent at the time of the execution of said mortgages."

This being a proceeding in which equitable relief is sought, in having the mortgages declared void, it is objected at the very threshold that it is premature, and the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the case—that, admitting the truth of all the allegations of the complaint, the creditors have no right to be heard in this court until they show that they had recovered judgment at law against the debtor and the execution thereon had been returned nulla bona before the proceedings were instituted. It is certainly true that equity has no jurisdiction where there is plain and adequate remedy at law, and it is generally required that the want of such plain and adequate remedy should be shown by a judgment and a return of nulla bona against the debtor,—that is to say, inter vivos, for it does not seem to be considered necessary in the case of a decedent debtor. There is no doubt that such judgment and return are necessary when the conveyance is assailed as merely voluntary, for in such case it cannot appear that any wrong has been done until it is shown that the debtor has not the means of paying the debt with property other than that covered by the contested conveyance. See Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C., 526.

As we understand it, however, there is no law requiring such preliminary proceedings as an indispensable prerequisite to seeking equitable relief, but it has been adopted by the courts as the *most satisfactory manner of proving that which is indispensable to such relief, viz., the fact that the party has no adequate remedy at law, that the debtor is insolvent, and, outside of the property in controversy, has not the means from which payment may be made. This is the very purpose of requiring judgment and a return of nulla bona. If that is shown by other proof or the admissions of the party, I never could see why judgment should be insisted on as an indispensable prerequisite. Why insist upon that evidence if there is other perfectly satisfactory evidence of the fact in question? especially if the circumstances are such that the delay in getting judgment may be fatal to the relief sought. For instance, in this case the allegations of the complaint, admitted by the demurrer and as the Circuit Judge says "substantially proved," were that David Morris was utterly insolvent, indeed owned no property whatever outside the stock of goods covered by the conveyances assailed. In such case it is difficult to conceive of any necessity for the useless proceeding of suing him to judgment at law, especially since the courts of law and equity are united, and the creditor can ask judgment on his demand and for equitable relief in the same action.

Could there be any other result of requiring such a preliminary proceeding than to afford by the delay an opportunity to the defendants, with their expeditious modes of procedure, to appropriate the personal property involved, and entirely emasculate and make useless the proceeding? The plaintiffs needed much the protection of equity, and they needed it promptly. In the case of Case v. Beauregard (101 U. S., 690 [25 L. Ed. 1004]), it is said by the Supreme Court of the United States: "But, after all, the judgment and fruitless execution are only evidence that his legal remedies have been exhausted or that he is without remedy at law. They are not the only possible means of proof. The necessity of resort to a Court of Equity may be made otherwise to appear. Neither law nor equity requires a meaningless form. Bona sed impossibilia non cogit lex. It has been decided that where it appears by the bill that the debtor is insolvent, and that the issuing of an execution would be of no practical utility, the issue of an execution is not a neces-

Smith*, 4 Rich. Eq., 198. But it is admitted that the authorities upon the subject are not in accord, and as we do not consider the point as necessarily involved in the decision of the case, we make no ruling upon it, but reserve our judgment.

There is no doubt that under the general law a debtor has the right to give one creditor an honest preference over others. Until lately this preference could be effected by confession of judgment, mortgage, or assignment, but it never was the law that this indulgence included the right on the part of a debtor to enter into a conspiracy with one or more of his creditors by which he secured advantages to himself at the expense of his other creditors. Bird v. Aitken, Rice Eq., 73. Influenced most probably by the abuse of this privilege, the legislature, in 1882, passed an act, now embraced in section 2014 of the General Statutes, which provides as follows: "Any assignment by an insolvent debtor of his or her property for the benefit of his or her creditors, in which any preference or priority is given to any creditor or creditors of the said debtor by the terms of the said assignment over any other creditor or creditors, * * * or in which any provision or disposition of the property so assigned is made or directed other than that the same be distributed among all creditors of the said insolvent debtor equally * * * and without preference or priority of any kind whatsoever, * * * such assignment shall be absolutely null and void and of no effect whatever." &c. While this act only deals with one of the instrumentalities by which preferences might be effected, we cannot doubt that it is a general expression of the legislature against insolvent debtors giving preferences to some creditors over others; for if objectionable when effected by an assignment, we can hardly suppose it to be less objectionable when accomplished in any other way.

It will be observed that this act does not require the creditor to have a judgment and a return of nulla bona on the execution against the debtor as a condition precedent to the enforcement of its provisions, which declare in the most general terms that an assignment of his property by an insolvent debtor giving "preference or priority of any kind whatever," shall be utterly null and void; but, on the contrary, section 2016 expressly dispenses *with such preliminary proceedings. Now, as David Morris was undoubtedly insolvent when he executed the mortgages, covering his whole property, to pay certain claims, to the exclusion of all others, it is perfectly manifest that if the transaction had taken the form of an assignment (in reference to merchandise the natural and usual form), it would have been absolutely "null and void."

It is said, however, that there was no assignment, but, on the contrary, mortgages, which the party might legally make. This may be so, if the papers were genuine mortgages, executed bona fide for the purpose of securing certain debts. But if they were put in that form as a mere device to evade the law—if the transaction was in fact a transfer of the whole property in payment of certain claims to the exclusion of all others—if the instruments in effect accomplished, and were intended to accomplish, the very purpose of an assignment under another name—should the transaction in the form assumed receive the sanction of the court and be enforced as such? It seems to us that the court cannot sustain an evasion of that kind, simply for the reason that the parties did not call it an "assignment." It is familiar doctrine that equity considers the substance and not the mere form and appearance of things. It is matter of every-day occurrence that instruments, in form absolute conveyances, are, according to the facts and circumstances and the real intention of the parties, declared to be mortgages and treated as such. This court has lately, in reference to this very provision of the law, held that "substance is not to be sacrificed to mere form, to enable insolvent debtors by evasion to effect a purpose declared by statute to be unlawful." See Wilks v. Walker, 22 S. C., 108 [53 Am. Rep. 706]. We cannot distinguish this case from that. "A deed of conveyance of real estate to a trustee in trust to hold the said premises as a security for certain creditors, who had accepted the notes of the assignors, &c., and such other creditors as should within a limited time accept the same terms, with power to sell or mortgage the property, held to be an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and not a mortgage." Stewart v. Kerison, 3 S. C., 266.

to what was the *intention and purpose of these parties. That question has been found by the Circuit Judge before whom the testimony was offered. He found as follows: "The defendant, David Morris, at and before he gave these mortgages on his stock of goods, &c., was clearly insolvent, hopelessly so. He knew it well, and to the defendant creditors he conveyed his entire property, consisting of his stock of goods, &c., and no realty. The mortgages were to mature at a very short day, less than a month. He knew he could not redeem, and did not intend to try to do so, but intended that a sale should take place, and, before the maturity of the notes, consented in writing that a sale should be made soon after maturity and without the usual time of advertisement. He further knew that he could not effect his purpose by a formal assignment, and deliberately set himself to work to evade the statute by mortgages at short time of maturity. In these transactions he has violated section 2014 of the General Statutes, and the conveyances cannot stand," &c.

We have considered the allegations of the complaint and read all the testimony carefully, and we cannot say that this finding of the Circuit Judge was error. The instruments were in the form of mortgages, but they were given at short day, less than the period allowed for recording. They had in them the Scotch clause giving permission to seize and sell without foreclosure, and on them a written consent of the debtor to sell on a given day, either in bulk or in parcels, and upon entirely insufficient notice. What was this but substantially an absolute transfer or "assignment" of the property to be delivered on a particular day, for the purpose of paying certain claims to the exclusion of all others? What but an effort to give to the brother and late partner, Alexander Morris, under the forms allowed by law, the whole property of David Morris to the entire exclusion of the debts, contracted for the very goods thus transferred? It strikes us as not a little remarkable that a prosperous mercantile firm should dissolve, the retiring brother taking a large note for his clear interest in the concern, and that within six months, and after the purchase of a very large stock of goods upon credit, the remaining brother should suddenly fail, without even the means to pay the preferred claims of the retired brother.

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McIVER. While I do not doubt that an insolvent debtor may, by a bona fide mortgage, which is intended merely as a security, prefer one creditor, yet if the mortgage is really designed, not as a security, but as a means of transferring his property to one or more of his creditors in preference of others, then it seems to me that it is, in effect, though not in form, an assignment, and comes within the mischief intended to be suppressed by section 2014 of the General Statutes. Such I understand to be the principle upon which the case of Wilks v. Walker (22 S. C., 108 [53 Am. Rep. 706]) was decided; and, therefore, I think that case controls this. The Circuit Judge found as matter of fact that the real purpose of the several mortgages brought in question in this case was to evade the assignment law, and to effect the very object which that law was designed to prevent; and this finding of fact is fully sustained by the testimony. This being the fact, it follows necessarily that this assignment of David Morris, though in the form of mortgages, which were not designed as mere securities, but as a means of transferring his whole property to one creditor in preference of others, must be held void. For this reason I concur in the conclusion reached by Judge McGOWAN, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, dissenting. The material question in this case is, whether under the facts as stated in the opinion of the majority, and as found by the Circuit Judge, the mortgages executed by the defendant, David Morris, to E. H. Frost & Co., and to the defendant, Alexander Morris, can be declared void under section 2014 of the act entitled "assignments by insolvent debtors," found in General Statutes of 1882, page 585. The Circuit Judge so held, and his ruling has been sustained by the majority of this court. In this judgment I am unable to concur for the reasons briefly given below.

Section 2014 of the assignment act is as follows: "Any assignment by an insolvent debtor of his or her property for *the benefit of his or her creditors in which any preference or priority is given to any creditor of the said debtor by the terms of the assignment over any other creditor or creditors, other than as to any debts due the public, or in which any provision or disposition of the property so assigned is made or directed, other than that the same be distributed among all creditors of the said insolvent debtor equally, in proportion to the amount of their several demands, and without preference or priority of any kind whatsoever, save only as to debts due the public, and save only as to such creditors as may accept the terms of such assignment and execute a release of their claim against the debtor, and except as hereinafter provided, such assignment shall be absolutely null and void and of no effect whatsoever."

Previous to the passage of this act a debtor, whether he was insolvent at the time or not, could secure one creditor in preference to another, and this, too, in a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, or by an independent security, provided the preference was bona fide and free from any purpose to delay, hinder, and defraud his other creditors. This principle, whether wise or not, I have regarded as well established, and by a long and unbroken current of decisions in this State; in fact, so firmly as to have become almost a rule of property. And, further, I have understood it to be settled beyond controversy that preferences could only be avoided by a direct proceeding to that end, based upon allegations of fraud, either express or implied, instituted by a debtor whose claim had been judicially established, and who was without redress, except by the aid of the property covered by the preference. Now, the question arises, how far has the assignment act of 1882 changed or modified these principles? The important sections of that act are sections 2014 and 2015. As I understand these sections, they refer entirely to preferences made in assignments by insolvent debtors for the benefit of creditors generally. They do not touch preferences other than those contained in or connected with such general assignments. As to all other preferences by mortgages, judgments, and such like instruments not connected with a general assignment, they leave the law as previously established, such preferences being vulnerable or not, as the facts of each case *might determine, either at common law or under the statutes of Elizabeth.

Before the assignment act, the law was abundant for vacating any and all fraudulent preferences. This act was not, therefore, intended to meet and destroy such preferences, but it was intended to prevent all preferences in a certain class of cases, whether fraudulent or not, to wit, in general assignments made by judgment debtors for the benefit of their creditors, and it was confined to such cases. This, as it appears to me, was the intention of the act, and this was its extent, as appears, first from its title, "assignments by insolvent debtors;" and, second, from the express terms of the two sections in which its purpose is presented, sections 2014 and 2015. Section 2014 says: "Any assignment by an insolvent debtor * * * for the benefit of creditors, in which any preference is given, * * * shall be null and void." In section 2015 it is provided that: "If any person being insolvent, within ninety days before the making of any assignment * * * for the benefit of his creditors, shall give any preference to any creditor, * * * the same shall be void."

Now, to bring a case under either of these sections, unless we go beyond the terms of the act, the facts must show (1) an assignment for the benefit of creditors, (2) executed by an insolvent debtor, and (3) a preference given to one or more creditors over others contained in the assignment, or given within ninety days previous to the execution of the assignment. Can the mortgages in contest here be properly held to be preferences by an insolvent debtor, contained in an assignment for the benefit of creditors generally, or executed within ninety days before such assignment, and therefore null and void under the act, without regard to the fact whether said mortgages are fraudulent or bona fide? There is no doubt as to the preference, and the insolvency of David Morris when he executed these mortgages is perhaps equally as apparent; but where is the assignment in which, according to the act, these preferences must either be found, or with which they must be connected within ninety days before its execution? Where is the substance to which these conditions, one or both, must attach before the act becomes operative? I do not find it *in the evidence, or in the facts as stated, and therefore I cannot see how the act can apply.

These mortgages may have been founded in fraud, they may be wholly without consideration, and may have been intended to delay, hinder, and defeat the claims of judgment creditors of David Morris, and possibly under section 2016 of the assignment act, they may have been subject to attack by creditors even before obtaining judgment; and when a proper case is presented I shall not hesitate to go to the full extent of the law in uprooting fraudulent transactions. But the question of fraud is not presented here. These mortgages have not been vacated on that ground. They have been vacated because, in the opinion of the court, section 2014 of the assignment act has been violated in their execution, not in terms, but in spirit, and the question involved is the soundness of this conclusion. It is claimed that the object of the assignment act was to prevent an insolvent debtor from giving any preferences, and that wherever and in whatever form this might be done, and whether bona fide or fraudulent, still it is void under the assignment act, and should be vacated by the courts. If this be so, the assignment act is, in substance, a bankrupt law, demanding upon insolvency a suspension of all business and a surrender of all assets, making it dangerous and useless to struggle for recovery. This might be a wise law, and one which, in the end, would be best for all. But I do not think that the legislature intended the act in question to be so far-reaching, and therefore I fail to see its application to the facts of this case.

The case of Wilks v. Walker (22 S. C., 108 [53 Am. Rep. 706]), as it seems to me, falls short of this case, and therefore does not control it.

Judgment affirmed.

23 S. C. 410

CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON v. PEOPLE'S NATIONAL BANK.

(April Term, 1885.)

[New Trial ⇐41.]

In action by a city council to recover city stock transferred under a forged assignment, and the defence being the statute of limitations, the judge charged the jury that the statute did not commence to run until discovery by the city of the invalidity of the assignments, or knowledge of facts sufficient to excite inquiry. Being then asked by a juror, "Do we understand you to say that the filing of the case of A was sufficient notice to the city, and that the statute of limitations, therefore, runs from that date?" The judge replied: "If the evidence satisfies you that the case of A was sufficient notice to the council to put them on the inquiry as to whether that was a forged paper or a genuine one, then it was a sufficient notice to fix the time at which the statute of limitations should commence to run." Held, that this response, interpreted in the light of the main charge, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. ☞41.]

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, March, 1884.

Upon the point considered and determined by this court, the opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. G. D. Bryan and A. G. Magrath, for appellant.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

September 17, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action below was brought by the plaintiffs, appellants, under the following state of facts: Joseph Whaley, late of Charleston, previous to the 13th and 19th of February, 1872, had standing in his name on the books of the treasurer of the city of Charleston certain six per cent. certificates, stock of said city. On said days these certificates were transferred to H. G. Loper, cashier of the defendant, and for the use of the defendant, by virtue of an alleged assignment from the said Joseph Whaley, which both plaintiff and defendant believed to be genuine and valid. Subsequent to said transfer, to wit, on April 23 and in May, 1872, two of these certificates were purchased in the market for the use of the city.

In the month of June, 1874, certain creditors (Fraser & Dill) of Joseph Whaley, then deceased, upon an examination of the certificates which had stood in the name of the said Joseph Whaley on the books of the city treasurer, came to the conclusion that they had been improperly transferred, and in July, 1874, they instituted action against the city for the restoration of said stock *to the estate of the said Whaley. In the progress of this action, which continued until April 17, 1879, it was developed that the signature of Joseph Whaley to the assignment under which the transfers of the stock had been made, was a forgery, and a decree was rendered against the city. In July, 1879, the city settled this decree; and on October 10, 1881, the action below was commenced, in which the plaintiff seeks to make the defendant bank liable for the certificates which the city has been compelled to make good to the estate of Whaley. Several defences were interposed; the most important, however, and the one upon which the case turned below, was the statute of limitations. The jury found for the defendant under the statute. The plaintiff has appealed.

In the appeal the dates of the different stages of the transaction may become important. They are as follows: The stock was transferred to the defendant on February 13 and 19, 1872, over nine years before the action below. The certificates received by the defendant were purchased by the city some time in May, 1872, some nine years before the action below. An examination was made of the original certificates by an attorney of Fraser & Dill in the presence of the city treasurer in June, 1874, as to the regularity and validity of the transfer, seven years before the action below. Fraser & Dill commenced action against the city in July, 1874, alleging that said stock still belonged to the estate of Whaley over seven years before the action below. A decree was obtained against the city in this action in April, 1879, on the ground of forgery in the assignments, and the city settled this decree in July, 1879, by making good the stock to the estate of Whaley two years and three months before the action below.

It was not denied below that the plaintiff had a cause of action against the defendant at some stage of this transaction, nor that the statute began to run when this right accrued. The parties, however, did not agree as to the time when said right accrued, and the charge of the judge upon this matter is the single question raised in the appeal. His honor charged that the currency of the statute in a case like this "would not begin until discovery by the city of the defect and invalidity of the assignments of the certificates, or knowledge of facts sufficient to put *the city on inquiry, which, if pursued, would result in the discovery of the condition of things complained of, and which in legal effect would be the same thing as knowledge of the fact itself." And in applying this principle to the case, he said: "If the alleged forgery in this case had been only ascertained after the decision of the case of Fraser & Dill v. The City Council of Charleston [23 S. C. 373], the statute would not bar the plaintiff's right to recover, because the six years would not have elapsed before the commencement of this action from the time when the decree in that case was pronounced. But if the discovery was made after six years before the commencement of this action, then the plaintiff's claim would be barred by the statute of limitations, and the verdict should be for the defendant. If the plaintiff had no notice before the commencement of the action of Fraser & Dill against the City Council of Charleston, the proceedings in that case gave them notice of the defect of these papers, and the right of action at that time accrued against these defendants on behalf of the plaintiffs. And if six years have elapsed from that time to the commencement of this action, the plaintiffs would be barred, and the verdict must be for the defendant."

At the conclusion of the charge a juror asked the following question: "Do we understand you to say that the filing of the case of Fraser & Dill was sufficient notice to the city, and that the statute of limitations therefore runs from that date?" To which the judge replied: "If the evidence satisfies you that the case of Fraser & Dill was sufficient notice to the council to put them on the inquiry as to whether that was a forged paper or a genuine one, then it was sufficient notice to fix the time at which the statute of limitations should commence to run." The appellant bases its claim to a reversal of the judgment below upon an alleged error contained in this response: the appeal therefore raising in the opinion of the appellant but a single question of law, growing out of said response, as appears from the opening remarks in the argument of the learned counsel of the appellant, where they say: "The form in which the verdict was given raises on this appeal a single question of law, and that is whether the instructions of the presiding judge on the question of law presented by the jury were given in a manner approved by the court, *and calculated to inform the jury correctly and distinctly of the matter submitted."

It is true that several other questions were discussed before us by the counsel on both sides: for instance, whether the right of action did not accrue to the plaintiff in February, 1872, when the illegal transfer of the stock was made, and before the plaintiff had sustained damage thereby or, if not, then in 1872, when the city purchased the stock after the transfer, or in April, 1874, when Fraser & Dill, in the presence of the city treasurer, examined the original certificates and ascertained the facts upon which their action against the city for the restoration of the stock was soon thereafter instituted. But the appeal of the plaintiff does not necessitate a deliverance from this court upon these interesting questions. Upon appellant's own statement it involves only the question mentioned above, and to that we have confined our investigations.

It seems to be conceded on all sides that whether a right of action accrued to the plaintiffs sooner or not, it certainly accrued when the plaintiff discovered the fact of forgery in the order of transfer, or became in possession of facts sufficient to have excited inquiry, and which, if pursued, would have led to this discovery. The judge so charged, and we must say this was as liberal to the plaintiff, and as strongly in its favor, as the authorities upon this subject allowed. In fact, if either party had the right to complain, under our view, strongly supported by the cases relied on by the respondent, it was the respondent, and not the plaintiff. But, as we have said, that question is not properly before us, and we therefore pass no judgment upon it.

Assuming, then, for this case that the law as laid down above by the Circuit Judge was correct, did the response of his honor to the question of the juror modify or change it in any way? or to such extent as to make it legal error, and therefore demanding from this court a reversal of judgment below? It is complained that the juror asked a definite question, fixing a precise time from which the jury desired to know whether or not the statute would begin to run, to wit, the filing of the case of Fraser & Dill v. The City Council of Charleston, and that the judge, while failing to give a definite response, yet led the jury to *believe from what he did say that the statute would begin to run from that date: and the jury, acting with that understanding, found their verdict for defendant when there was no evidence in the case showing that the city at said date had discovered the forgery, or was in possession of facts sufficient to excite inquiry on that subject. In other words, that the jury understood the judge to lay down as matter of law for their government, that the filing of the case of Fraser & Dill gave currency to the statute.

If the charge of the judge and his response to the juror, taken and construed together, could be properly interpreted as announcing as matter of law the principle complained of, and by which the jury was to find their verdict, then there would be substance in the appeal. For the judge could not have come to that conclusion without invading the province of the jury as to the facts. Because, before he could have held as matter of law that the filing of the case of Fraser & Dill discovered to the city the alleged forgery, or facts sufficient to put the city upon inquiry thereof, it would have been necessary for him to find as matter of fact that said filing was accompanied with sufficient evidence of these facts, which was a question for the jury and not for him, and which if he had passed upon would have been legal error, and therefore fatal to the judgment. But did the judge so charge? He certainly did not in his general charge, nor can his response to the question of the juror be fairly so interpreted even when considered independent of, and disconnected from, the general charge.

We cannot say what may have been the understanding of the jury, independent of what ought to have been their understanding, derived from the language used by the judge in the response made, and when that is considered, we do not see how the jury could have come to any other conclusion but that the judge declined to instruct as matter of law that the filing of the Fraser & Dill action in itself would give currency to the statute. He had already charged fully and plainly that the discovery of the fact of the forgery, or of facts sufficient to excite inquiry on the part of the City Council, was necessary, and would alone give this currency as matter of law, and he had left the fact of such discovery to the jury, where it properly belonged; and pounded in accordance with the charge, he replied, not that the filing of the Fraser & Dill case is sufficient evidence, thereby taking the question of fact involved in the interrogatory from the jury, but "if the evidence satisfies you that the case of Fraser & Dill was sufficient notice to the Council to put them on the inquiry as to whether that was a forged paper or a genuine one, then it was a sufficient notice to fix the time at which the statute of limitations should commence to run."

This, as it appears to us, clearly left to the jury the question of fact whether or not at the filing of the Fraser & Dill Case the city had information sufficient to put them upon the inquiry suggested; and it cannot be denied that there was testimony upon that subject of which the treasurer of the city at least had knowledge even before the filing of said action. Under these circumstances, we cannot say but that the jury was satisfied, as matter of fact, that the evidence brought the case under the principle laid down in the main charge, and about which there is no complaint.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

CLAFLIN & CO. v. ISEMAN.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ¶39, 99.]

An assignment for the benefit of creditors in which an interest is reserved to the assignor without provision for the payment of all his debts, is fraudulent.

Before Wallace, J., Marion, June, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The order of Judge Hudson, granting an interlocutory injunction, omitting its statement of the case, was as follows:

Under a rule to show cause, the application for a preliminary injunction was heard by me at chambers at Orangeburg, on the 16th day of May instant. The arguments for and against the application were very full and exhaustive, leaving nothing for me to do but to review some of the leading authorities relied on by the opposing counsel. This I have endeavored carefully to do before determining the motion, not desiring to act hastily in a matter involving large pecuniary interests.

The deed of assignment is assailed as being fraudulent on its face, by reason of the benefit reserved, or intended to be reserved, to the debtor in and by the aforesaid third clause of the trust.

Is it lawful for an insolvent debtor to assign his property for the benefit of such creditors alone as shall, within a given time, accept a pro rata share of the debtor's property in full payment of their respective claims, on condition that an absolute release in writing be delivered to the debtor of the entire debt, excluding from all share in said estate such as do not accept the terms of said deed, and directing the surplus, if any, to be paid to the assignor? Can a debtor lawfully pro-pound such terms to his creditors, and remove his estate entirely beyond the reach of such of his creditors as do not accept? [Here the learned judge cited and quoted from Vaughan v. Evans, 1 Hill Eq., 415; Nixon v. Douglas, 2 Id., 443 (30 Am. Dec. 368); Jacot v. Corbett, Chev. Eq., 71; and Stewart v. Kerrison, 3 S. C., 266.] I think, therefore, that I may say that it is settled law in this State that if an insolvent debtor assign his property in trust to pay such creditors only as accept under the assignment, and executes an absolute release to the debtor, and directs the surplus, if any, to be paid to himself instead of the creditors refusing to accept, such a deed is on its face fraudulent and void, under statute 13 Elizabeth.

It is true that in all the cases cited and relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel, there seems to have been some additional vice, some other obnoxious provision, in the deed of assignment besides the mere reservation of the surplus to the debtor. But upon examining the cases, it will readily be seen that the reserving clause for the benefit of the debtor in preference to the recusant creditors is the capital vice which calls forth the most earnest condemnation of the courts. In Burrill on Assignments (p. 271, § 209), also in Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances (pp. 428, 429, 430, 436), this reservation of the surplus to the debtor against the claims of non-accepting creditors, is pronounced per se fraudulent, and avoids the deed at the suit of any complaining creditor. It is a matter of no little regret among the courts of the older States that they have so far favored insolvent assignees as to sustain the compulsory release clause so universally prevalent in those deeds of assignment for the benefit of creditors, and I find that in some of the new States west of the Mississippi the courts condemn such terms in deeds of assignment, and hold such deeds void on the face. Daggan v. Bliss, 4 Col., 223, reported in 34 Am. Rep., 80.

The counsel for the defendants placed great reliance upon the case of Beck v. Burdett (1 Paige [N. Y.] 305 [19 Am. Dec. 436]), which case, it is contended, establishes the doctrine that the mere naked reservation of a contingent surplus to the debtor does not vitiate a deed of assignment. I regret not having access to that case and the notes thereto by the editor of American Decisions (vol. 19, p. 436). But it was said in the argument before me that the assignment assailed there was only a partial assignment, and hence the distinction. I did hope to be able to examine the case, but circumstances prevented. I can only say that the law of that case, as contended for by counsel for the defense, is not the law of our State, either as defined by our courts in interpreting 13 Elizabeth nor by our legislature in declaring the law in section 2014 *of General Statutes. I regard this last statute as fatal to the validity of Mr. Iseman's deed.

It is contended, however, that fraud is a question of fact, and that Iseman really intended no fraud upon his creditors; also that the reservation clause is utterly harmless, because there will certainly be no surplus after paying accepting creditors—in fact, that these will, in exhausting the estate, realize only a part of the debts due to them. In Jacot v. Corbett both these defences were interposed in behalf of Mr. Corbett, and I use this language of Chancellor Dunkin in answering them: * * * Whether a surplus will remain under such like assignments depends upon the value of the effects, the number and the amount of the debts, the number who accept or refuse, contingencies any or all of which may determine whether or not the debtor will receive a surplus. Surely, the validity of a deed will not be made to depend upon these contingencies. The law does not await the event of the administration of the estate to determine the character and effect of the stipulations of this deed, nor does it require a non-accepting creditor to await the result before he can assail it. So soon as executed, the law stamps it with fraudulent intent, discoverable on its face. It is a presumption juris de jure, conclusive and irrebuttable, that fraud is intended, and the question is not affected by any facts arising dehors the deed.

Could I consider such evidence and throw the character of this old gentleman, M. Iseman, into the scale—a man who for perhaps more than three-score and ten years has borne an irreproachable character, who has been noted for honesty and integrity in all his business transactions—I would most cheerfully acquit him of all fraudulent intent in executing this deed. But I am constrained to say that the deed he has made, however honest in fact he may have been in so doing, is one that the law will not uphold against a resisting creditor. It needs but to be attacked to be overthrown.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that until the further order of this court, the said debtor, M. Iseman, the said assignee, Junius H. Evans, and the said agent of creditors, Duncan Murehison, their servants and agents, be and they are enjoined and restrained from selling, &c.

*The decree of Judge Wallace (also omitting his statement) was as follows:

The assignor states in his answer that he intended no fraud, and honestly intended to devote his property to the payment of his debts. This statement is supported by the testimony in relation to what took place at the time of the execution of the deed. There is proof, also, that the claims of the accepting creditors will absorb the whole estate, and that there will not, therefore, be any surplus. I am sure that Mr. Iseman did not conceive that he was doing a wrongful act. His reputation for strict business integrity has been too long and too well established to be overthrown by the facts of this case. Yet, if he has done what the courts hold is conclusive evidence of an intent to hinder and delay creditors, the law holds such act as to such creditors void and of no effect. The nature of the act, too, must be determined by the act itself, and not by subsequent developments. Why, if a surplus was not contemplated, direct it to be paid back to the assignor, and not make it distributable among such of the general creditors as should not accept according to the terms of preference?

To recur. Does this reservation of a contingent right to the surplus destroy the deed? This question has been repeatedly discussed in our own courts, and always decided in the affirmative. The case of Jacot v. Corbett (Chev. Eq., 71) is full to the point. The opinion in this case was prepared by Chancellor Dunkin, concurred in by Harper, chancellor, and by Chancellors Johnson and Johnston with hesitation. In the subsequent case of Le Prince v. Guillemot (1 Rich. Eq., 219), this case of Jacot v. Corbett is quoted by Chancellor Johnston as authority for the principle, "that a reservation for the debtor's benefit was a direct fraud." * * * This case (Jacot v. Corbett) has been again and again quoted in subsequent cases where the same question was raised. Le Prince v. Guillemot, 1 Rich. Eq., 219, already referred to; Stewart v. Kerrison, 3 S. C., 266.

In the deed here, the assignor has reserved to himself that which the general creditors failed to secure by accepting under the deed. This case falls completely within the rule stated in Jacot v. Corbett, and I must hold it therefore void. I have not here adverted to those of our cases referred to in the argument of *commsel, which relate to the right of an assignor to make preferences in the order of the payment of his debts, or to make releases a condition of preference, because I do not consider these rules at issue here.

Since all of our reported cases upon assignments by debtors, the act of 1882 has been passed. This is now to be found from section 2005 to 2016, inclusive, of the General Statutes. By section 2014 all right of preference which an assigning debtor had before is taken away, save only as to debts due to the public, and save only as to such creditors as may accept the terms of such assignment, and execute a release of their claim against the debtor. This same section denounces as absolutely null and void any assignment "in which any provision or disposition of the property so assigned is made or directed other than that the same be distributed among all creditors of the said insolvent debtor equally," save, as above stated, as to debts due the public and to releasing creditors. A provision, therefore, which directs that upon certain contingencies a surplus, if any, shall revert to the assignor, is obnoxious to the denunciation of this statute.

The judgment of Jacot v. Corbett, in the case above referred to, was obtained after the assignment was made by Corbett, and on the deed being set aside by the court, the assignees were ordered to pay out of the funds in their hands under the assignment the costs of the case and Jacot's judgment.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the deed of assignment made by Manuel Iseman to Junius H. Evans, Esq., be set aside and vacated as null and void, and that the said Junius H. Evans do pay to H. B. Claflin & Co., out of the funds in his hands as assignee of Manuel Iseman, the sum of seven thousand eight hundred and ninety dollars and forty cents, with interest thereon from the date of the judgment for that sum obtained by H. B. Claflin & Co. against Manuel Iseman, together with the costs of the action in which the judgment was obtained, as well as the costs of this action.

Messrs. W. W. Sellers and Johnson & Johnson, for appellants.

*September 17, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Manuel Iseman, merchant, of Marion, S. C., became embarrassed, and on January 29, 1884, executed an assignment of all his property, real and personal, to Junius H. Evans, Esq., for the benefit of his creditors, upon the following trusts: First, to pay all the expenses necessarily incident to the execution of the trusts therein imposed; second, to pay all his creditors in equal proportions, that is, pro rata, if the amount in his hands should not be sufficient to pay those in full who should come in and signify their acceptance under the deed of assignment, within four months from the date, provided said creditors so accepting should execute a full release and acquittance of their respective debts, and receive their respective proportions from the assignee in full payment thereof; third, "he shall, after the payment of all the creditors who accept, pay over the balance to me, if any balance should remain in his hands," &c.

Junius H. Evans accepted the trusts declared by the deed, and several of the creditors, in person or by agent, met and appointed Duncan Murchison, Esq., their agent in the management of the assigned estate.

H. B. Claflin & Co., of New York, held a large demand against Iseman, contracted in 1883. They did not accept under the assignment, but sued on their claim, and on April 23, 1884, obtained a judgment for $7,890.48. Execution entered on the judgment was returned unsatisfied, and they then instituted these proceedings against Iseman, his assignee, and the agent of creditors, "to set aside the deed of assignment," and alleged "that the deed is fraudulent and void upon its face, in that it reserves to the assignor the benefit of any surplus which shall remain after the payment in full of the creditors who shall accept under the provisions of the said deed, to the exclusion of all other creditors," and that it was made and executed by the said defendant "to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors," &c.

Judge Hudson granted an order staying proceedings under the assignment until further order, and the cause coming on for hearing before Judge Wallace, he ordered and adjudged, "That the deed of assignment be set aside and vacated as null and void, and that the said Junius H. Evans do pay to H. B.

Clafin & Co., *out of the funds in his hands as assignee of Manuel Iseman, the sum of $7,890.10, with interest thereon from the date of the judgment for that sum obtained by H. B. Clafin & Co. against Manuel Iseman, together with the costs of the action in which the judgment was obtained, as well as the costs of this action," &c.

From this decree the defendants appeal to this court, upon the following grounds:

"I. Because his honor erred in holding that the assignment of M. Iseman to Junius H. Evans for the benefit of his creditors is void, from the fact that it is provided in the same that after the payment of all the creditors who accept, the assignee do pay over the balance to the assignor, if any balance should remain, as fraudulent, though there was no fraudulent intent.

"II. Because his honor erred in holding that the assignment of M. Iseman, made to Junius H. Evans for the benefit of his creditors, was null and void from the fact that he inserted in the same a third clause, as before stated.

"III. Because his honor erred in holding that the assignment is null and void, in consequence of the third clause being obnoxious to the statute of February 9, 1882, though it is admitted by the plaintiffs and decided by the court that M. Iseman had really no fraudulent intent when he executed the assignment.

"IV. Because his honor erred in holding that the assignment is null and void, from the fact that it is fraudulent on its face, and obnoxious to section 2014 of the General Statutes.

"V. Because his honor erred in ordering the assignee to pay over the funds in his hands to H. B. Clafin & Co., instead of ordering him to distribute the sum equally among creditors as equitable assets."

The order granting the injunction and the decree of the Circuit Judge are both so clear and full that it is difficult to add anything to them. All that we can do is to put in form the conclusion already announced.

Until the recent statute (1882) in regard to assignments for the benefit of creditors, the law allowed a debtor in failing circumstances to assign his estate for the benefit of his creditors, and in doing so to prescribe the order in which they should be paid, or to make preferences among them. Hill v. Rogers,

Rice Eq. 7; [Riggs v. Murray] 2 John. Ch. [N. Y.] 578. It was also, after some discussion as to the morality and policy of such allowance, finally settled that the debtor might attach the condition that the accepting creditors should execute a release in full. Nixon v. Douglas et al., 2 Hill Eq., 446 [30 Am. Dec. 368]. As it seems to us, these great privileges were allowed to the debtor always upon the fundamental condition that the assignment should bona fide include his whole estate (Le Prince v. Guillemot, 1 Rich. Eq., 187), and without reserving to himself, directly or indirectly, any part of it, until all the debts are paid.

This view is expressly sustained by the case of Jacot v. Corbett, Chev. Eq., 76. In this last named case, the assignee was directed to pay certain claims in full, and then, "out of the surplus, to all the other creditors, who would accept the same in satisfaction of their demands, and execute a release thereof to the said James Corbett, by the first January next ensuing the date thereof, forty cents in every dollar of the amount of their claims, if the same was adequate thereto; and if not, to distribute such surplus ratably and in proportion among such creditors. And after payment of the said forty cents in every dollar, then if any surplus should remain, &c., to pay over the same to the said James Corbett, his executors, administrators, or assigns," &c. After mature consideration, it was held that, as against the plaintiff, the assignment was void and of none effect. It is true that there was in the case the other matter—limiting the payment to general creditors to forty cents in the dollar (which was not reached)—but a careful perusal of the judgment, we think, will show that the vice which proved fatal was the reservation of the surplus, if any.

Chancellor Dunkin, in his Circuit decree, which was affirmed in the Appeal Court, says: "But a debtor has no right to place his property beyond the reach of his creditors under the ordinary process of the law, prescribe the terms in which they participate in his effects, and secure to himself, in case of neglect or refusal, a control over such funds, and thereby the power to make other terms. Such deed is a direct violation as well of the terms as the policy of the statute (13 and 27 Eliz.). The purpose is to hinder and delay creditors, by transferring a colorable title to a *third person, while the real ownership is still in the assignor, unless the terms prescribed are assented to. No case, I think, can be found sanctioning an assignment which sustains such control in the debtor," citing Hyslop v. Clarke, 14 Johns. [N. Y.] 462; Austin v. Bell, 20 Johns. [N. Y.] 448 [11 Am. Dec. 297]; and Mackie v. Cairns, 5 Cow. [N. Y.] 585 [15 Am. Dec. 477]; and explaining Lynah v. Lynah (Mss.), and Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. [N. Y.] 571. As we understand it, this case of Jacot v. Corbett has never been overruled, but, on the contrary, has been cited and approved. See Stewart v. Kerrison, 3 S. C., 266.

But it is strongly urged upon the court that in this case Mr. Iseman, the debtor (who, we are pleased to state, has the reputation of an honest man), did not, in signing the deed prepared for him, intend to do anything wrong; that the reservation was merely theoretical, in fact "hypothetical" and "suppositions," and that the actual fact is that the assigned estate amounts to very little over $12,000, and creditors representing $29,000 of claims have already accepted the terms of the assignment, showing conclusively that there will be no "balance" going back to the debtor under the reservation, and that therefore it will be an anomaly to declare an assignment fraudulent and void in law which was executed without fraudulent intent, and does not operate as a fraud upon any one. This view at first strongly impressed some members of the court, but upon careful consideration of the principles involved and our decided cases, we feel constrained to concur in the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge. Precisely the same view was urged in the case of Jacot v. Corbett, supra, in which it was solemnly held that the argument was not sound. Although it does seem to be a hard case, the better opinion seems to be that "the character of the transaction must be determined by the interest of the parties at the time, and not by subsequent events." At the time the assignment was executed, it was certainly thought that there might be "a balance," or, as we suppose, the reservation would not have been made.

We have not been able to examine all the cases cited by the appellants, but from those to which we have had access it seems to us that proper consideration was not always given to the distinction between a trust resulting from the circumstances and an express reservation in the deed of assignment itself. We have examined the case of Beck v. Burdett (1 Paige [N. Y.] 305), which seemed to be the case principally relied on by the appellants. We do not consider that case as at all analogous to this. That did not pretend to be a general assignment of the debtor's property for the benefit of all his creditors, with a condition requiring them to release any balance that might be unpaid; but, on the contrary, it was, in the exercise of the right which he had at that time to prefer one creditor, a partial assignment to pay certain debts in full and to return the balance if any. It was, in effect, the payment in the manner provided of these particular creditors, and, of course, if too much was paid, it should be returned. At all events, the cases cited were not South Carolina cases and we regard our own cases as controlling upon us, and in so doing we cannot avoid the conclusion that they are decisive of this case even under the old law.

But in 1882 the legislature passed an act upon the subject of assignments for the benefit of creditors, which will be found in the General Statutes, from sections 2005 to 2016, inclusive. It will be observed that section 2014 expressly takes away from the insolvent debtor the right to make preferences, which, as we have seen, existed before the act, "save only as to debts due the public, and as to such creditors as may accept under the assignment and release." The act does not in express terms directly touch the subject of a reservation to the debtor or its effect. But it is manifest that the intent was to restrict the rights of debtors in making assignments, and we cannot doubt that its operation must be to strengthen the decisions that a reservation to the debtor was unlawful. The act specially denounces preferences, and the obvious effect of a reservation is either to withdraw so much of the debtor's property from his creditors, or at least to afford him the opportunity to make new terms. For instance, under this law such a partial assignment as was dealt with in the New York case of Beck v. Burdett, supra, would be impossible. As stated by the Circuit Judge, this section denounces as absolutely null and void any assignment "in which any provision or disposition of the property so assigned is made or directed other than that *the same be distributed among all creditors of the said insolvent debtor equally," &c. A provision, therefore, which directs that, upon certain contingencies, a surplus, if any, shall revert to the assignor, is obnoxious to the denunciation of this statute.

What, then, must be the practical effect of the assignment being declared void as to the plaintiffs? Other creditors have accepted the assignment and thereby undertaken to release the remainder of their debts, upon receiving their pro rata, estimated with reference to the whole assets. Shall the plaintiffs be paid in full, thereby reducing to that extent the assets for distribution? This seems hard, but as the assignment has been declared void quoad the plaintiffs, it is as to them the same as if it had never been made; and as before the assignment Iseman had property sufficient to satisfy their judgment and execution, we do not see how that result can be avoided.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

In this case a petition for rehearing was filed, upon which the court, on November 27, 1885, endorsed the following order:

We have carefully considered this petition, and as it does not bring to our attention any material fact or important principle which was overlooked in the decision of the case, the petition must be dismissed.

CONNOR v. THE GREEN POND, WALTERBORO AND BRANCHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

[1. Statutes ⇨113.]

An act entitled "an act to incorporate the Green Pond, Walterboro and Branchville Railway Company" does not relate to more than the one subject expressed in its title (Const., art. II., § 20), even though the act contains, besides the charter, provisions authorizing the County of Colleton to subscribe in county bonds to the capital stock of this company, upon certain conditions, such as petition for election, elections, &c., and providing for a tax to pay interest on the bonds so issued.

[2. Counties ⇨196.]

The county commissioners having determined that the conditions precedent to a railroad subscription had been complied with, and having *issued to the railroad company county bonds in payment therefor, in action by taxpayers of the county to compel the cancellation of these bonds upon the ground that the conditions precedent had not been complied with, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiffs. They must show in such action, that the county commissioners acted without authority, or exceeded it.

3. Findings of fact by the Circuit Judge not disturbed.

4. Whether in a case like this the railroad company occupy the position of bona fide holders for value of the bonds issued to them, not considered.

[This case is also cited in Riley v. Charleston Union Station Co., 71 S. C. 488, 51 S. E. 485, 110 Am. St. Rep. 579, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Colleton, November, 1884.

The Circuit decree in this case, after reciting the act of incorporation and the pleadings, proceeded as follows:

The complaint showing these various matters and things upon its face, in the outset of the hearing a motion was made before me to dismiss the complaint, because it did not contain facts to constitute a cause of action. This motion I did not at the time grant, it being too grave a matter in my opinion to determine without a further investigation of the law, and without hearing further argument. I then, therefore, withheld my judgment upon that motion, and directed the plaintiffs to proceed with their testimony; to the introduction of the testimony the defendants objected. The objection was overruled and the testimony received. I have heard argument of counsel fully upon the testimony and upon the law of the case, and propose now to render my judgment.

The first question that presents itself to my mind, and which I will pass upon now, is whether, after the bonds were issued and delivered to the railroad company, the plaintiffs, as taxpayers of the County of Colleton, will be admitted to question the validity of those bonds, and have an investigation made of the regularity or irregularity of the various proceedings of the board of county commissioners. During the progress of those proceedings there is no evidence that any objection on the part of these taxpayers, or others, was interposed to any part of the proceedings of the commissioners. No protest was preferred to the election, and now, for the first time, the validity of the bonds is attacked in the present complaint.

*It is admitted by counsel on both sides that if these bonds were in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value, that these taxpayers could not assail their validity in this proceeding, or otherwise. Now, can they do so after the contract of subscription has been executed and the bonds delivered to the railroad company and the stock issued to the county? I find in Jones on Railroad Securities, to which I am referred by counsel for the plaintiffs, that the author, in section 268, holds that the taxpayer has the right in this form of proceeding and at this stage to ask for relief, and bases his authority upon two North Carolina cases, cited in his report below, one found in [State ex rel. Cox v. Blair] 76 N. C., at page 79, and the other in [Trustees University of North Carolina v. McIver] 72 Id., at page 86. These cases are not before me, and I regret that I have not the time to examine them for my own satisfaction.

I find in 24 Howard, U. S. Supreme Court Reports, in the case of Bissell et al. v. The City of Jeffersonville, that Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion of the court, holds a different doctrine. Here is what he says on page 299 [16 L. Ed. 664]: "When the contract had been ratified and affirmed, and delivered to the railroad company in exchange for the stock, it was then too late to call in question the fact determined by the common council, and a fortiori, it is too late to raise that question in a case like the present, where it is shown that the plaintiffs are innocent holders for value." Whether there has been any modification in this opinion in any subsequent judgment I don't know. Upon reason and upon principle I think that it is a sounder doctrine than that which would suffer the taxpayer, who took no steps during the progress of the subscription to assert his rights, afterwards, and after the contract has been fully executed, to come forward and ask relief in the Court of Equity.

The process of preventing a subscription to a railroad company usually consumes a considerable length of time. All the taxpayers of the county are presumed to have full notice of so important and interesting a step, and, in fact, do ordinarily have actual notice, and are usually well informed in regard thereto. At all events, it is the duty of the taxpayer to watch such proceedings with vigilance, and to take such steps as will correct error or fraud on the part of those upon whom devolves the duty *of making the subscription. If he neglects so to do, and suffers the contract to become executed, and the railroad to become the holder of the bonds in exchange for their stock, sound policy requires that a court should not at so late a day interpose to relieve it.

I hold, therefore, that these taxpayers are too late in asking the relief at the hands of this court. It was an easy matter for them to know whether a bona fide subscription of $10,000 was made; whether a bona fide petition of a majority of the freeholders had been presented, and whether the election ordered thereupon resulted in favor of subscription or no subscription. If they paid no attention to these matters and suffered the county commissioners to execute the contract, they are excluded now to ask the court to relieve them. But inasmuch as I have admitted and caused all a full hearing, and suffered these taxpayers to introduce evidence with the view to show that conditions precedent to the issue of these bonds had not been complied with, I deem it my duty to proceed and pass upon the weight of that testimony.

It is contended by the plaintiffs' counsel that it is only necessary that the plaintiff should make out a prima facie case of want of compliance with these conditions precedent, and that the proposition is then thrown upon the defendants to show fully and satisfactorily that the conditions were complied with. I do not so regard the burden of proof. He who assails the validity of a bond, or the validity of a judicial act of the board of county commissioners, whether acting as a board in the regular discharge of their duty, or a special board designated by the legislature to do and perform a certain act, takes upon himself the burden of proving the invalidity of that bond, or the error of the judgment so rendered.

In regard to the judgment of this special board, the doctrine that all things are presumed to have been rightfully done until the contrary is made to appear is rule of evidence in this case. Now, to show that the majority of freeholders did not sign a certain petition may be a very troublesome and difficult thing to do, and the fact that it is a difficult thing to prove does not relieve the plaintiff from the burden of so proving. But before they can *have an executed contract rescinded, it devolves upon them to show by proof satisfactorily their right to have it so rescinded. The evidence adduced in this case, without attempting to repeat it here, is, in my opinion, not sufficient in justifying me in reversing the judgment of a local board, the members of which have large personal knowledge of the standing of the citizens of the county, and who possess facilities far greater than this court for ascertaining such a fact.

It appears from the evidence in the case that this board of county commissioners did take testimony, and resort to the most available testimony to ascertain the genuineness of the petition, and the status in regard to property of the various signers. The county auditor was examined and gave his certificate in regard to those petitions. Other citizens were examined. The board made use also, it is presumed, of their individual knowledge of the signers. They were in no haste to form a judgment, and after due deliberation decided that the majority of the freeholders of the county had signed a petition. For me now to hold otherwise would require full and satisfactory proof of the error committed by these men.

The evidence offered by the plaintiffs consists of the books of the auditor and the testimony of twenty-five or thirty persons, whose names appear upon the list, to the effect that they did not sign, nor did they authorize any one to sign for them. It is stated by counsel for the plaintiffs that of the names of the supposed signers of the petition, that there are 1,050 whose names do not appear upon the auditor's assessment book. This statement was allowed to be used by the counsel in the argument of the cause as a fact ascertained by them after comparison of the lists with the books.

In the argument of the cause counsel for the defendant gave a cursory examination to a part of the names and alleged that they had discovered that twenty-five of these names did appear upon the books. It is a well known fact that land is not always returned in the name or names of all the various persons entitled to a freehold interest therein. I fully appreciate the difficulty that the counsel for the plaintiffs labor under in verifying this list in full. The fact that the petitions seemed to have been signed *largely in the same handwriting, is relied upon as additional evidence of a want of genuineness. Giving full weight to all the testimony adduced by the plaintiffs, I do not deem it sufficient to overthrow the judgment of the board of county commissioners.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the restraining order and injunction hitherto granted be dissolved, and the complaint be dismissed with costs.

Messrs. G. W. Trenholm and Mitchell & Smith, for appellants.

Messrs. W. P. Murphy, Edwards & Tracy, Henderson & Behre, and L. F. Youmans, contra.

September 26, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On December 23, 1882, the legislature passed an act entitled "an act to incorporate the Green Pond, Walterboro and Branchville Railway Company," in which the County of Colleton was authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of said company the sum of $60,000, in bonds of said county, upon certain conditions prescribed in the act. The conditions were as follows: 1. "That $10,000 of the capital stock of said company is first subscribed by individuals or other corporations." 2. That upon the petition in writing of a majority of the freeholders of said county, an election should be ordered by the county commissioners, at which the question of "subscription" or "no subscription" should be submitted to the qualified voters of said county. 3. That at such election "the majority of the ballots cast shall be for subscription." The act goes on to provide that the managers of such election "shall make returns, count the votes, and meet at the court house at Walterboro and declare the result of said election, which result shall be certified in writing by said managers to the chairman of the board of county commissioners." Provision is also made for the payment of said bonds by taxation.

A petition, purporting to be signed by a majority of the freeholders of the County of Colleton, was presented to the county *commissioners, asking that an election be ordered, and on May 15, 1883, that body granted an order for an election to be held on June 30, 1883, to determine the question of "subscription" or "no subscription," in which it is recited that it appeared satisfactorily to them that the condition requiring a petition for such election, signed by a majority of the freeholders of said county, had been complied with. In pursuance of this order, an election was held on June 30, 1883, and the managers appointed to conduct said election certified in writing to the chairman of the board of county commissioners on July 3, 1883, that a majority of the ballots cast at such election was in favor of subscription, whereupon the board, after reciting this fact, passed an order "that upon sufficient evidence being submitted to us by the corporators of said railroad company, that the sum of $10,000 has been subscribed, agreeably to section 5 of said act, it will then be lawful for the County of Colleton to subscribe through us to the capital stock of said company the amount of sixty thousand ($60,000) dollars, as prescribed by said act."

On August 30, 1883, this evidence was furnished to the board of county commissioners, and they then subscribed, in the name of the county, the said sum of $60,000 to the capital stock of said company and received therefor twelve hundred shares of said stock, and at the same time executed and delivered to the officers of the said railway company seven per cent. bonds of said county to the amount of $60,000, which bonds are still held by said company, a portion of the interest thereon having been paid by the county treasurer to the treasurer of the railway company.

On September 5, 1884, this action was commenced by the plaintiffs, as taxpayers of said county, in behalf of themselves and all the other taxpayers, against the railway company, the county commissioners, county treasurer, and county auditor of Colleton County, for the purpose of enjoining the railway company from disposing of the bonds, and that they be required to deliver the same to be cancelled, and for the purpose of enjoining the county auditor from assessing any tax for the payment of said bonds, and the county treasurer from paying out any taxes already assessed and collected for the purpose of paying said *bonds, and for general relief. The grounds upon which the plaintiffs base their demands are: 1. That so much of the act of the legislature above referred to as purports to confer upon the county commissioners power to issue bonds of the county is in violation of section 20, article II., of the constitution, and is therefore null and void, and consequently that the bonds would constitute no legal obligation of the county in the hands of any one. 2. That the said bonds being still in the hands of the railway company, they cannot claim the protection of bona fide purchasers for value without notice, and hence that if the bonds were issued without compliance with the prescribed conditions, they do not, while in their hands, constitute valid obligations of the county. 3. That the condition precedent to the issue of these bonds, which required a petition from a majority of the freeholders of said county before any election could be ordered, was not complied with, and the issue was therefore illegal.

The Circuit Judge held that the act was constitutional; that the railway company could claim the protection of bona fide purchasers for value without notice; and that even if they could not, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs to show a failure to comply with all the conditions prescribed in the act, and this they had not done. He therefore dissolved the temporary injunction previously granted and dismissed the complaint. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal upon several grounds set out in the record, which need not be repeated here, because, according to our view, but three questions properly arise upon this record: 1. As to the constitutionality of the act. 2. As to the burden of proof. 3. As to whether the Circuit Judge erred in his finding of fact.

Section 20, article II., of the constitution, with which the act here in question is supposed to be inconsistent, reads as follows: "Every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." As we have said in Charleston v. Oliver (16 S. C., 56), upon the authority of Mr. Justice Cooley, "there has been, and ought to be, a general disposition to give a liberal construction to constitutional provisions like this now under consideration, rather than to embarrass legislation by an unnecessary strictness of construction." Hence, when a question, under this clause of the constitution, is presented for adjudication, we are bound to take a liberal and enlarged view, and if practicable bring the legislation which is assailed as unconstitutional within the limits prescribed by the supreme law of the land.

Now, looking at the act in question in this spirit, we do not see how it conflicts with the provision of the constitution which has been quoted. The "subject" to which the act relates is the Green Pond, Walterboro, and Branchville Railway Company, and that subject is undoubtedly expressed in the title. Nor do we find that the act relates to any other subject. As is usual with acts bearing such a title, after constituting certain persons a body politic and corporate by the name which they have chosen, it goes on to declare what such corporation may do, and how it may obtain the means for effecting the desired purpose—by receiving subscriptions to its capital stock. The fact that it also provides that a certain corporation, which otherwise would not have the power to do so, may subscribe to the capital stock upon certain prescribed conditions, does not, it seems to us, bring that portion of the act in conflict with the constitution. No new subject is introduced into the act, but the subject which all the while engages the attention of the legislature is the railway, which necessarily includes any appropriate means for its construction. For, as is well said in San Antonio v. Mehaffy (96 U. S., 315 [24 L. Ed. 816]), "when an act of the legislature expresses in its title the object of the act, the title embraces and expresses any lawful means to achieve the object, thus fulfilling the constitutional injunction that every law shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in its title."

In that case the Supreme Court of the United States was called upon to decide a question identical in principle with the one now under consideration. There the legislature of Texas had passed an act entitled "an act to incorporate the San Antonio Railroad Company," the twelfth section of which authorized the city of San Antonio to subscribe for stock and issue bonds therefor, and in an action on those bonds it was contended that the act was in violation of that clause of the constitution of Texas which declared that "every law enacted by the legislature shall *contain but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title." The court held that the act was not in violation of the constitution for the reason given in the language quoted above. It is observable that in that case the same cases from the Texas court (San Antonio v. Gould, 34 Texas, 49; Giddings v. San Antonio, 47 Texas, 548 [26 Am. Rep. 321]), which are relied upon here by appellants' counsel, were also cited before the Supreme Court of the United States.

So in Supervisors v. People (25 Ill., 181), it was held that an act to incorporate a railroad company may constitutionally contain a provision authorizing counties to subscribe to its stock, or otherwise aid in the construction of the road. See, also, the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General (4 S. C., at page 442), where it was held that a provision in an act entitled "an act to provide for the appointment of a land commissioner, and to define his powers and duties" for the issue of bonds of the State to be used by the land commissioner in the purchase of lands, was not in conflict with sec. 20, art. II., of the constitution. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit Judge, that the act is not unconstitutional.

The next inquiry is as to the burden of proof. The appellants contend that inasmuch as the county commissioners had no authority to issue the bonds in question until all the conditions prescribed by the act had been complied with, that the burden of proof is upon the defendants in this proceeding. It is to be observed that this is not a proceeding to compel the county commissioners to issue the bonds in question, nor is it an action on the bonds. On the contrary, the action here is to compel the cancellation of the bonds after they have been issued, upon the ground that the conditions upon which alone they could be lawfully issued have not been complied with.

There can be no doubt that the county commissioners were, in the first instance, to determine the question as to whether the conditions precedent were complied with, and having formally determined that they were, and having acted upon such determination by issuing the bonds, it is quite clear that the plaintiffs can have no cause of action until they show a failure to comply with some or all of the prescribed conditions. For in addition *to the well settled rule that public officers are presumed to perform their duty until the contrary is shown, it is manifest that the only foundation for the plaintiffs' action is the allegation that some of the prescribed conditions have not been complied with, and until that allegation is proved the plaintiffs have no cause of action.

As is said in 1 Greenl. Evid., § 78: "To this general rule, that the burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative, there are some exceptions in which the proposition, though negative in its terms, must be proved by the party who states it. One class of these exceptions will be found to include those cases in which the plaintiff grounds his right of action upon a negative allegation, and where, of course, the establishment of this negative is an essential element in his case; as, for example, in an action for having prosecuted the plaintiff maliciously and without probable cause," the want of probable cause must be proved. So here the very ground upon which the plaintiffs base their action is that there was no petition signed by a majority of the freeholders of the county, praying that an election might be ordered; and this, though a negative allegation, must be proved by the plaintiffs, as otherwise they would have no cause of action.

If this were a proceeding to compel the county commissioners to issue the bonds, or if it were an action by any one but a bona fide holder, without notice, upon the bonds, then the cases cited by the counsel for appellants would be in point; but as that is not the nature of the proceeding, but on the contrary, its object is to set aside and annul what has been done by the county commissioners, it is incumbent on the plaintiffs to show that they have either acted without authority, or that they have exceeded the authority conferred upon them. We do not think, therefore, that there was any error upon the part of the Circuit Judge in holding that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs.

The only remaining inquiry is one of fact. Did the plaintiffs succeed in showing that all or any of the prescribed conditions to the issue of the bonds had not been complied with? Upon this issue of fact the Circuit Judge found against the plaintiffs, and we cannot say that such finding was without any evidence to support it, or was manifestly against the weight of the evidence.

*Under the view which we have taken, the question whether the railway company can claim the rights of a bona fide holder without notice, does not arise, and has not, therefore, been considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[3. Evidence ⇨186; Witnesses ⇨37.]

Entries on the docket and the common pleas journal, and the testimony of attorneys engaged, are competent evidence to establish the existence and contents of a judgment record which was proved to be lost. This case distinguished from Brown v. Coney, 12 S. C., 144.

A party who in good faith advanced money to an administrator for the use of the estate, and received as security the pledge of a bond and mortgage held by the administrator, has the right to a foreclosure of such mortgage.

But the assignee having afterwards put this bond in the hands of this administrator, who was also an attorney, for collection, and who in his own name sued the bond to judgment, and the mortgagor, without notice of the assignment, having settled the judgment by a surrender of the mortgaged land, which thereupon passed into the possession of the heirs of the estate represented by this administrator, the lands remained liable for the payment of the mortgage debt, even though the mortgagor be relieved of further liability.

[6. Pledges ⇨30.]

The bond should be credited with any payments made by the obligor, but not with payments made by the administrator upon the debt for which the assignment of this bond was collateral; the bond stood as security for the balance due on the debt thus secured.

Before Kershaw, J., Sumter, October, 1884.

The Circuit decree, after stating the conclusions of law quoted in the opinion of this court, proceeded as follows:

*439

*My reasons for the foregoing findings and conclusions are as follows:

The bond upon which the mortgage herein was founded was placed in the hands of the said Charles Mayrant by Judge Fraser, the agent of the said Mark Reynolds, the assignee thereof, for suit. He was thereby enabled to deal with Paul Rees as if he were still the true owner of the bond and mortgage. Paul Rees having no knowledge that the bond had been assigned, and no notice of any circumstance calculated to put him on his guard or to induce inquiry, acting under the belief that Mayrant was still the real owner, settled with him as such, gave up the land in discharge of the judgment obtained against him by Mayrant on the bond, and became the tenant of Mayrant and the defendants, attending to them and paying rent on the land as of the estate of W. W. Rees. Under these circumstances, Dr. Mark Reynolds and his representatives are estopped so far as Paul Rees is concerned, and are to that extent bound by the settlement made between Charles Mayrant and Paul Rees. This proposition is sustained both by principle and authority, and I need do no more than refer to a few cases to establish it. Holbrook v. Colburn, 6 Rich. Eq., 293; Maybin v. Kirby, 4 Rich. Eq., 113; 3 Lead. Cas. Eq. (Am. edit.), 373; Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C., 370.

The same authorities and principles will suffice to show that while plaintiff is estopped against setting up the mortgage against Paul Rees, the rights of the assignee remain in full force, so far as Mayrant and the defendants, his cestuis que trust, are concerned. Mayrant acted with full knowledge of the rights of the assignee, and the defendants are bound by all the equities which affected him. This is too plain to need argument or authority to support it.

The position taken on the part of the defendants that Mr. Mayrant, as administrator, had no right to bind the estate of W. W. Rees by his bond to Dr. Reynolds, appears to me to be avoided when it is shown, as it has been shown, that the debt was contracted for the purposes of the estate. The sale of the land was authorized by the court upon the hypothesis that the necessities of the estate required it, to raise money for immediate *and pressing exigencies. The evidence shows that the sales did not bring the cash. It is a just inference that Mayrant borrowed money from Reynolds on the securities obtained by the sale, to meet the same demands whose existence had induced the court to sell the land. If there was a necessity of that sort, the administrator could borrow money for the use of the estate, and assign the assets of the estate to secure the same.

Under the authority of the court, the land had been sold and converted into choses in action, payable to the administrator, and were at his disposal as assets of the estate. In regard to these, it is said in the case of Rhame v. Lewis, which is a case of great authority, and is cited by counsel for the defendants, that "the administrator's power of disposition over his intestate's choses in action remains unaffected by this legislation, and continues as his power over the assets generally before the acts has been described to have been. Any one may securely take them from him, either absolutely or conditionally, by any of the usual methods of legal or equitable transfer for value, and in good faith." The reference to legislation was that in restraint of the common law powers of the administrator over the specific goods of his intestate. 13 Rich. Eq., 299.

The learned chancellor (Ingles), who delivered the admirable opinion in that case, summed up the propositions established as to this point, as follows: "A valid alienation, by way either of sale or pledge, of choses in action belonging to the intestate estate, may be made by the administrator of his own motion, to any one who takes them bona fide and for value, not grossly inadequate, and upon such alienation, they will be discharged of all equities which attach upon them merely as assets." Ibid., 329. Nothing can be added to this admirable exposition of the law on this subject. The good faith of Dr. Reynolds in the transaction has not been questioned, and the bond of Mayrant shows on its face that it was given by Mayrant as administrator. There is literally nothing to impeach the bona fides of the transaction.

As to the grounds for overruling the objections to the evidence, they will be sufficiently apparent upon consideration. The objections to the admissibility of the evidence offered to establish the *lost records, all tended first to show the loss of the records, and next to show that such records had existed, and what they were. I could not exclude the evidence, because it tended to show those facts. The position taken that, inasmuch as a judgment cannot be proven but by the production of the record, which is admitted to be the rule, a lost judgment is incapable of being established, I apprehend is not well founded.

Since the hearing, I have been furnished by the counsel for the defendants with a reference to the case of Harrison v. Manufacturing Company (10 S. C., 296), as showing that the "judgment book" is the proper depository of a judgment, and that there was no proof that the clerk searched for that book. It is enough for my purpose to say that there was abundant evidence that the clerk's office was searched, and that no trace of the judgment in question could be found but those produced in this case. I cannot assume that there was any book in the office that was not examined in the face of that evidence. I may remark that the case last mentioned may, upon examination, fail to establish that there is any better evidence of an order or decree on the equity side of the court than the order or decree itself, signed by the judge, and filed by the clerk.

I was unable to perceive the pertinency of the objections to the evidence, based upon section 400 of the Code of Procedure. As to the amount of the mortgage debt, I consider the judgment obtained on the bond by Mayrant the best evidence thereof. Reynolds' agent having placed the bond in Mayrant's hands for suit, and the suit having been brought in the name of Mayrant, the judgment is to be regarded as obtained for the benefit of Reynolds, and is in effect Reynolds' judgment. The amount to be recovered in this case is fixed by that judgment. The land is liable for that amount, but not for the costs, as they were against Paul Rees, and were settled by the arrangement between him and Mayrant.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said mortgaged premises described in the complaint in this action, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to pay the sum due, with the interest and costs, be sold, &c.

*From this decree defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. That there ever was a final judgment in the case entitled Charles Mayrant, administrator, against Elizabeth N. Bradley and others.

2. That Charles Mayrant was the administrator of the estate of W. W. Rees.

3. That the bond of Charles Mayrant and Dr. Mark Reynolds was given for the benefit of the estate of W. W. Rees.

4. That the money received from Dr. Mark Reynolds was used for the estate of Rees.

5. That there was any judgment growing out of the case of Charles Mayrant, administrator, against Elizabeth N. Bradley et al., sufficient to give the authority claimed.

6. That the bond and mortgage of Paul Rees was a technical asset of the estate of W. W. Rees.

7. That there was any sufficient authority granted to Charles Mayrant to sell the lands described in said complaint.

8. That the said Mayrant had the power to deal with the bond and mortgage of Paul Rees as if it were a technical asset of the estate of Rees.

9. That the bond of Paul Rees having been paid by him, and he discharged from any liability thereunder, that the mortgage was not discharged as against the plaintiff.

10. That the testimony of the Hon. T. B. Fraser was competent or relevant.

11. That the testimony of W. H. Cuttino was not irrelevant and incompetent.

12. That the common pleas calendar for 1872 could be used in evidence before it was established that any final judgment had been made in the cause.

13. Because his honor erred in ignoring the testimony that, at the time Mayrant withdrew the bond and mortgage of Paul Rees from Judge Fraser, that he, Mayrant, had paid to the said Fraser more than the amount of the bond of Paul Rees on the obligation to which said bond was collateral, some of which payments are stated to have been made by Paul Rees.

14. Because his honor erred in not holding that if the powers claimed for Charles Mayrant, administrator, were duly granted, that they were specific and limited and could not be departed from.

Messrs. Moises & Lee and H. F. Wilson, for appellants.

Messrs. Jos. H. Earle and J. D. Pope, contra.

September 26, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Some time in 1864 W. W. Rees died, leaving a last will and testament, of which one Samuel J. Bradley was the qualified executor. Before fully administering the estate of his testator, Bradley died, leaving a will, of which Elizabeth Bradley was the qualified executrix. It is alleged in the complaint that one Charles Mayrant was duly appointed administrator de bonis non, cum testamento annexo, of the estate of said W. W. Rees, and that as such he filed a complaint against said Elizabeth Bradley, as executrix, as aforesaid, and the heirs at law and devisees, asking, amongst other things, for authority to sell a portion of the lands of the estate of Rees to pay debts, current expenses, taxes, &c., of said estate; that such authority was duly granted, and on January 30, 1873, in pursuance of such authority, the said Mayrant, as administrator as aforesaid, duly sold several parcels of land belonging to said estate, including the parcel described in the complaint, which was purchased by the defendant, Paul Rees, who, to secure the purchase money, executed his bond, secured by a mortgage of said parcel, to the said Mayrant, as administrator as aforesaid; that afterwards, to wit, on September 24, 1873, the said Mayrant, as administrator as aforesaid, in order to raise money for the use and benefit of said estate, borrowed from plaintiff's testator the sum of seven hundred and twenty-six dollars and forty-two cents, for which he gave his bond, secured by an assignment of the above mentioned bond and mortgage of Paul Rees; and the object of this action, to which the heirs at law of W. W. Rees, who are now in possession of the mortgaged premises, are made parties, is to obtain a foreclosure of said mortgage.

It also appeared in evidence that the bond of Paul Rees was, *at some time prior to April 15, 1876, delivered by Judge Fraser, who was then the attorney and agent of plaintiff's testator, to said Charles Mayrant, at his request, for suit, he being a practising attorney, and was by him sued in his own name, without the knowledge or consent of Mark Reynolds, the expectation of Judge Fraser being that it would be sued in the name of Reynolds as assignee. On May 15, 1876, Mayrant, as administrator as aforesaid, obtained judgment on the bond against Paul Rees, and Mayrant settled said judgment with Paul Rees by taking the land back as the property of the estate of W. W. Rees, and the said Paul Rees then rented the same from the said Mayrant while he lived, and from the defendants since his death, as of the estate of the said W. W. Rees, deceased;" but the said Paul Rees, at the time of this settlement, had no notice of the assignment of his bond and mortgage to said Mark Reynolds. It also appeared that Charles Mayrant died before the commencement of this action, and that the amount due on the bond of Mayrant to Reynolds exceeded the balance due on the bond of Paul Rees to Mayrant.

These allegations of the complaint, and the other facts above stated, were found by the Circuit Judge to be true, and he concluded as matter of law: I. That Paul Rees is fully discharged from all liability to the plaintiff on his bond aforesaid. II. That the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises for the purpose of paying the amount due on the bond of Paul Rees as ascertained by the judgment recovered against him by Mayrant, not, however, including the costs of that case. III. That plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for the costs of this action, to be paid from the proceeds of the sale of the said land, or if that should not be sufficient to pay the debt due on said mortgage, to be paid by the defendants other than Paul Rees, who should only pay his own costs.

From this judgment the defendants appeal upon numerous grounds set out in the record, which need not be repeated here, but there is no exception by any of the parties to the first conclusion of law as to the discharge of Paul Rees from any personal liability, and therefore that question is not before us for consideration.

*So far as the exceptions impute error to the Circuit Judge in his findings of fact, it will be sufficient to say that there was testimony tending to support his several findings, and that they are not contrary to the manifest weight of the evidence. On the contrary, we think they are well supported by the testimony.

As to the exceptions based upon the incompetency of the testimony offered, they may be divided into two classes: First. Those based upon the provisions of section 400 of the code. Second. Those based upon the idea that the existence and contents of a record cannot be established by parol evidence. We are unable to perceive the pertinency of the objection based upon section 400 of the code. Judge Fraser, whose testimony was objected to on this ground, was not a party to the action, and had no interest in the matter, and we are unable to perceive any ground upon which his testimony as to what occurred between himself as the attorney of plaintiff's testator and Mayrant can be regarded as incompetent.

Second. It is true that the original record of the proceedings in the case of Mayrant v. Bradley and others was not produced, but its loss was fully proved, which, under well settled rules, let in secondary evidence, which, in our judgment, was not only competent and relevant, but was amply sufficient to establish the existence of such a case and the result of it. The entries on the docket and the common pleas journal, together with the testimony of Judge Fraser and Mr. Blanding, who seem to have been the attorneys immediately charged with the case, conclusively show that there was such a case, and that it culminated in an order for the sale of a portion of the lands of the estate of W. W. Rees for the purpose of providing means to meet the wants of the estate. This case differs materially from that of Brown v. Coney (12 S. C., 146), relied on by appellants. In that case the court was asked to infer the existence of a judgment from certain fragments of a record supplemented by parol testimony. As was there said: "It is not pretended that there was any direct evidence whatever of any judgment or final order for the partition of the land in question, either by record or by parol. No such record was produced, and no witness testified that any such record had ever existed." Here, however, there was evidence, secondary it is true, but upon proof of the loss of the original, competent, that there was an order of sale.

Assuming, then, as true the facts found by the Circuit Judge, we think his conclusion of law was unquestionably correct. Here is a case in which a third person advanced his money, in perfect good faith, to the administrator of an estate for the uses of said estate, and took as security a pledge of certain assets of the estate—the bond and mortgage of Paul Rees—which, according to the case of Rhame v. Lewis (13 Rich. Eq., 329), cited by the Circuit Judge, he had a right to do under the circumstances proved; and, in the absence of anything that would defeat such right, plaintiff's testator would clearly have the right to subject the mortgaged property to the payment of the money so advanced for the use of the estate by a foreclosure of the mortgage.

It is contended, however, that the settlement made by Mayrant with Paul Rees of the judgment recovered on his bond, which said Mayrant had been enabled to make by the incautious delivery to him by the agent of plaintiff's testator of said bond, in the absence of notice to Paul Rees of the assignment of said bond and mortgage, operated as an extinguishment of the mortgage. It is true that the payment of the mortgaged debt operates as an extinguishment of the mortgage, but there was no payment of the mortgaged debt in this case. The mortgagor simply surrendered to the original mortgagee the property given to secure the payment of the debt, and although the effect of this may very possibly be, as the Circuit Judge held, to relieve the mortgagor, in the absence of notice of the assignment, from any personal liability on the mortgage debt, yet it certainly cannot have the effect of releasing the property originally given as security for such debt from liability for the payment of the debt to the party really entitled thereto.

As between Mayrant and the plaintiff's testator, the latter was unquestionably entitled, both in law and equity, to the debt secured by the bond and mortgage of Paul Rees, and any money or property received by Mayrant in satisfaction of such debt would, in his hands, or in the hands of those whom he represented, necessarily enure to the benefit of the plaintiff's testator, the person to whom the debt was really due. Reynolds having advanced money for the use of the estate of W. W. Rees, is entitled to have it refunded out of the property of the estate given to secure such advance by the legal representative of the estate.

Of course, we are not to be understood as saying that where a person lends money to the administrator of an estate, that any of the visible, tangible property of the estate may be mortgaged by the administrator to secure the payment of such debt. The distinction between the right of an administrator to pledge or alien any of such property, and his right to pledge or alien the choses in action constituting a part of the assets of the estate, is clearly pointed out in the case of Rhame v. Lewis, supra. Under the sale made by Mayrant as administrator, by the authority of the court, the legal title to the land covered by the mortgage passed out of the heirs and devisees of the said W. W. Rees into Paul Rees, and the property pledged by the administrator to secure the debt of Reynolds was not the land of the estate of W. W. Rees, but one of the assets of his estate, in the form of a chose in action, which, according to the case of Rhame v. Lewis, the administrator had a right to pledge for the uses of the estate. The land, therefore, which stood as security for the payment of the debt to Reynolds, must continue liable to the payment of that debt, in whosoever hands it may be, the rights of purchasers for valuable consideration without notice not being involved.

The appellants, in their thirteenth exception, complain that the Circuit Judge erred "in ignoring the testimony that, at the time Mayrant withdrew the bond and mortgage of Paul Rees from Judge Fraser, that he, Mayrant, had paid to the said Fraser more than the amount of the bond of Paul Rees on the obligation to which said bond was collateral, some of which payments are stated to have been made by Paul Rees." We do not understand that the testimony shows the fact to be as assumed in this exception. The precise time at which the bond of Paul Rees was delivered to Mayrant for suit by Judge Fraser does not appear, but it must have been either on or before April 15, 1876, as that is the day on which it is alleged that suit was commenced on the bond. At that date the payments endorsed on the bond of Mayrant to Reynolds did not amount even to the face of the bond of Paul Rees to Mayrant, and even the subsequent payments, one of which appears to have been made by Paul Rees and Lazarus Rees, do not appear to have been sufficient in amount to cover the amount of the bond of Paul Rees.

But, even granting the fact to be as assumed in the exception, we do not see how it would affect the case, except so far as any payments made on the bond of Mayrant to Reynolds may have been made by Paul Rees. For if Mayrant had paid to Reynolds on his bond an amount greater than the bond of Paul Rees, that would not operate as a satisfaction of the latter bond. There were several notes, besides the bond of Paul Rees, which were assigned to Reynolds as security for the payment of the bond of Mayrant; and until that bond was fully paid, Reynolds had a right to hold all of the notes and the bond of Paul Rees as collateral security for the payment of such balance, and could enforce all or any one of them so far as might be necessary for the payment of such balance. But of course any payment made by Paul Rees on the bond of Mayrant to Reynolds should operate as a credit on the mortgage debt of Paul Rees. As there seems to have been at least one such payment, in part at least, credited on the bond of Mayrant to Reynolds, we think the judgment appealed from should be reformed, so that in ascertaining the amount due on the mortgage debt credit should be given for any payments made by Paul Rees on the bond of Mayrant to the plaintiff's testator.

The appellants, in their fourteenth exception, complain that the Circuit Judge "erred in not holding that if the powers claimed for Charles Mayrant, administrator, were duly granted, that they were specific and limited and could not be departed from." This exception is couched in such general terms that we might well disregard it. What were the limitations upon the powers of the administrator, or in what respect such limitations were disregarded, are not stated; but we infer from the argument that appellants' contention is that the administrator was authorized to sell the lands for cash to relieve the pressing necessities of the estate, and that his sales on credit were unauthorized. The testimony does not show that the administrator was authorized to sell for cash only, and we are not at liberty to infer that such was the order. It may be that a sale of land for cash at that time would have been very disastrous to the interests of the estate, and it may have been much the best policy to have sold on a credit and use the proceeds in the form of choses in action to raise the money needed, as was done. Be that as it may, however, we do not see any evidence that the administrator violated the terms of the order of sale, and hence we see no foundation for this exception, even if it had been taken in proper form.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified as herein directed, and that in all other respects it be affirmed.

23 S. C. 449

TRIMMIER v. WINSMITH.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Judgment ⇨41, 46, 70.]

It is not a commendable practice for a clerk of court to take a confession of judgment in his own favor, but the debtor who makes such a confession cannot afterwards object to it on the ground that the clerk was a party in interest.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Moore v. Trimmier, 32 S. C. 511, 518, 11 S. E. 548, 552.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 87, 108; Dec. Dig. ⇨41, 46, 70.]

[2. Execution ⇨98, 99.]

The high interest called for by some of the notes for which the confession was given, and the hard and exacting contract that was the consideration of another, cannot be interposed as objections to a renewal of the execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 196; Dec. Dig. ⇨98, 99.]

[3. Execution ⇨322.]

Land being offered for sale under a senior execution, the debtor, judgment creditors, and mortgagees (the mortgage being an intermediate lien) agreed that the proceeds of the sale should be applied to these liens in the order of their date, and it was so announced at the sale; such application was consented to, all parties being present, and an order was obtained from the Circuit Judge at chambers so directing. Held, that the sheriff properly applied the proceeds of sale, after paying the senior execution, to the mortgage, and the balance being thereby rendered insufficient to satisfy the junior executions, that they were unsatisfied.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 955; Dec. Dig. ⇨322.]

[4. Execution ⇨98.]

A renewal execution should issue for the balance due upon the original, with interest from the date of the last credit on the principal debt.

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, October, 1884.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

*Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and Duncan & Sanders, for appellant.

Messrs. Bomar & Simpson, contra.

September 28, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an application to renew the balance of an execution. The defendant answered that the judgment had been paid.

It appeared that on March 13, 1879, the defendant confessed judgment before the clerk to the plaintiff for the sum of $1,659.77, upon which execution was duly issued. This judgment was made up of several items of indebtedness, one of which was a note for $500, "given for services rendered by plaintiff in staying the sale of the defendant's lands advertised to be sold by the sheriff;" and F. M. Trimmier, the plaintiff, to whom the confession was made, was the clerk of the court before whom the confession of judgment was entered up.

There were liens upon the property of the defendant in the following order: 1. Judgment of Briggs. 2. Mortgage given to F. M. Trimmier and B. H. Moore to secure them as endorsers for defendant on a note to the National Bank of Spartanburg. 3. The aforesaid confession of judgment to Trimmier. 4. Judgment of D. H. Smith; and 5. Judgment of R. E. Cleveland. On December 1, 1879, the land of defendant in Union County was sold by the sheriff under the Briggs judgment for $9,000, and at the sale it was, by direction of the parties, announced that the proceeds of sale would be applied to the liens in their order, including the mortgage named second in the order. The proceeds were so applied, the defendant expressly assenting, and the same being directed by order of Judge Wallace on the application of the defendant and B. H. Moore. By this application the senior judgment of Briggs and the mortgage were paid off in full, and a payment on the judgment of F. M. Trimmier of $1,170.70, leaving a balance still due thereon of $771.25, and for this sum Judge Pressley ordered the execution to be renewed.

the following *grounds: I. Because his honor erred in not holding that the judgment was paid. II. Because his honor erred in not holding that there was no judgment upon which to base an execution. III. Because his honor erred in holding that the judgment was not paid. IV. Because his honor erred in allowing the execution to issue for the sum of $771.25. V. Because his honor erred in allowing the execution to issue for any sum whatever.

It seems to us unusual, and not to be commended as a practice, for the clerk of the court to take and enter up a confession of judgment in his own favor as a creditor. The general rule certainly is that a judicial officer shall not render judgment upon a matter in which he has a personal interest—at least, not without the consent of the parties. (See the constitution, article IV., section 6.) But, in the case of the clerk of the court, it seems that no provision has been made for the discharge of such duty by any other officer. He is required "to sign officially all judgments." Gen. Stat., § 742. Besides, his duties in entering up such a judgment are somewhat ministerial in character. The law prescribes fully and particularly what statement must be made by the defendant under oath, in order to have a judgment by confession; and this "statement and affidavit with the judgment rendered shall thereupon become the judgment roll." Code, § 385. The defendant made the necessary statement himself, and had the judgment enrolled, and it seems to us that he cannot now object that the plaintiff, being the clerk himself, had no right to consider his application and statement and enrol the judgment.

It is true that some of the notes embodied in the judgment bore high interest, and that of $500 for services rendered in postponing a sale seems hard and exacting. But all objections of that kind should have been made when the judgment was confessed; and not having done so at that time, the defendant cannot do so now.

But, assuming that the defendant cannot object to the validity of the judgment, he further contends that it was paid by operation of law; that the sheriff had no right to apply any of the proceeds of sale to anything but executions; and if that had been done, the judgment now proposed to be renewed would have been paid in full; that the sheriff had no right to consider the "mortgage at all, especially as it was only to indemnify the mortgagees against loss as endorsers. But here again the proof was clear that the defendant consented to this application. Trimnier, the owner of the judgment, was one of the mortgagees, and all the parties, including the defendant himself, consented to such application. Indeed, at the sale the announcement was made that such application would be made, and it was also directed by the order of Judge Wallace.

We cannot say that the application was unauthorized. The mortgage was handed to the sheriff like an execution, and the parties agreed that it should be paid in its order. The lands were sold under the execution of Briggs, which was senior to the mortgage. "If the land be sold under an execution older than the mortgage, the purchaser takes it discharged of the mortgage." State v. Laval, 4 McCord, 336. As was said by Judge Butler, in the case of Cooper v. Scott (2 McMull., 155): "We think the sheriff was right in first satisfying the mortgages that were put in his hands, as they were older than the li. fa.'s in his office and operated as liens on some (all) of the property sold. The mortgagees were present, and, it seems, consented to release their lien by taking the proceeds of the property sold. It was competent for them to do so; and the sheriff, having acted as their agent, was justifiable in satisfying these claims in preference to the execution creditors," &c.

We see no error in the amount for which the execution was ordered to be renewed. It seems that the $53 complained of was the sheriff's commissions; and the order of Judge Pressley said nothing about compound interest. He simply found that so much principal and interest was now due—the true amount; but when the renewed execution is issued, it should express the balance remaining unpaid by the application in the sheriff's office, together with interest from that time, viz., December 1, 1879, until paid.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*MASSEY v. DAVENPORT.

[Wills § 461, 733.]

A will provided as follows: "I will and bequeath unto my children, herein named, after my decease and interment and the payment of all just debts, viz., M., A., E., B., and I., all my estate, real, personal, and all residue, to have, to hold, and to use for their benefit during the single life of M., A., and E., my daughters, and till my sons, B. and I., are of age. I further will and devise that as the within named sons shall become of age and the daughters marry, their respective interests in possession shall revert to the daughters remaining unmarried, so long as the said unmarried daughters shall choose to remain on the premises. I further will and devise that at the majority or marriage of all the within children named, my property shall be sold and equally divided among all my children and their bodily heirs or living issue of those deceased, if any there be." Held, that the word "or" in the last sentence was used in the sense of "and," and that partition could not be demanded while A. resided on the place and remained unmarried.

Before Fraser, J., Greenville, July, 1884.
The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Stokes & Irvine, for appellants.
Mr. W. H. Perry, contra.

September 28, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Tabitha Davenport departed this life leaving a will, which, among other things, devised as follows: "First, I will and bequeath to my children herein named, after my decease and interment and the payment of all just debts, namely, Mahala Ashmore, Amanda Davenport, Micajah Berry Davenport, Isaac Perry Davenport, and Emma Davenport, all my estate, real, personal, and all residue, to have, to hold, and to use for their benefit during the single life of Mahala Ashmore, Amanda Davenport, and Emma Davenport, my daughters, and till my sons, Micajah and Isaac, are of age. I further will and devise that as the within named sons come of age and the daughters marry, their *respective interest in possession shall revert to the daughters remaining unmarried, so long as the said unmarried daughters shall choose to remain on the premises. I further will and devise that at the majority or marriage of all the within children named, my property shall be sold and equally divided among my children and their bodily heirs," &c.

The testatrix owned no property except a tract of land, and upon it the daughter Amanda resides, being still unmarried. All the children attained their majority, and two of them, the plaintiffs, instituted this proceeding for the sale and division of the proceeds of the land alleging that the time indicated by the will for such sale and division had arrived. This was denied, and the single question was as to the construction of the will, whether it was the intention of the testatrix that the land should be sold and divided as soon as all of the children came of age, or not until the daughters were all married also. Judge Fraser held that Amanda, being still unmarried and living as a single woman upon the land, it was not as yet subject to partition, and dismissed the complaint.

The plaintiffs appeal upon the following grounds: I. Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in holding that, as Amanda Davenport is still unmarried and remains upon the land, it is not subject to partition. II. Because his honor erred in holding that, although the children are all of age, yet the land is not subject to partition now. III. That the intention of the testatrix, as expressed in her will and gathered from a proper construction of that instrument, was that said land should be sold and the proceeds divided among the children when the youngest attained the age of twenty-one years."

If there was no other provision in the will but that contained in the first paragraph, we suppose that there could be no doubt about the proper construction. It there appears that the testatrix did not mean that the land should be sold and the proceeds divided as soon as the sons came of age, for she directed that as they came of age their respective shares should "revert to the daughters remaining unmarried as long as the said unmarried daughters shall choose to remain on the premises." The words "unmarried daughters" undoubtedly embraced a single daughter.

ter. *The only seeming obstacle in the way of this obvious construction is the supplemental provision. "And I further will and devise that at the majority or marriage of all the children named, my property shall be sold and equally divided among all my children," &c.

It is contended that the use of the word "or" in this latter provision shows that it was the intention of the testatrix that the land could be sold and proceeds divided either upon the majority or marriage of all the children. Taking the whole will together, however, we do not regard this as the proper construction. It will be observed that there is only one provision in the will, that in reference to the land. The first part of the provision gives the use of the land to certain of the children of testatrix "during the single life of Mahala Ashmore and Amanda and Emma Davenport, and as the sons named should come of age and the daughters marry their shares should revert" to the daughters remaining unmarried; and then in the second part goes on to provide for the sale and division of the land.

Most naturally the intention was that the sale and division should be at the time and under the circumstances indicated in the first part—that is to say, after keeping the land unsold for the use of the daughters so long as any of them remained unmarried. But in the effort to make the different parts of the will conform, the draughtsman used the word "or" instead of "and." In order to make the direction for the sale correspond with the first and devising clause, it is necessary to consider the word "or" as employed in a conjunctive and not a disjunctive sense.

As Chancellor Johnston said, the decisions on the subject of "transposing the words 'or' and 'and' are not uniform, and do not appear generally to be governed by principle. This is wrong. Where there is nothing in the will to raise a contrary persuasion, the safest as well as the justest course is to assume that testators intend their words to be taken in their common and natural sense. * * * But where there is something to be inferred from the context of the will, something to guide us in the nature of the right about which the particular clause under consideration treats, or where there is a clear general intention which a literal construction of the particular clause would contradict or defeat.

it *would be not only unjust, but a gross violation of the true principles of decision to disregard these indices of intention and execute the will literally according to its inaccurate terms. This would be little better than entrapping the testator by mere word catching." &c. See Shands v. Rogers, 7 Rich. Eq., 425, and authorities there cited. We think there is in this will "a clear general intention," which would be defeated by a literal construction of the last paragraph of the provision concerning the land.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., York, July, 1884.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

*Mr. G. W. S. Hart, for appellants.

Mr. W. B. Wilson, contra.

September 28, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. John White, Sr., departed this life intestate in December, 1876. Letters of administration upon his estate were granted to Jonathan Moore January 10, 1877. The intestate left a number of heirs, and among them, the plaintiffs, children of a predeceased son, Alexander White, who died in August, 1865. In settling the estate of the intestate the administrator refused to allow these children a distributive share of their grandfather's estate, and on November 2, 1882, these proceedings were instituted in the Probate Court to require the same paid to them. The administrator answered, that as he was informed, his intestate, John White, in his life-time, had "made advancements in money, land, and other property to his son Alexander, the father of petitioners, exceeding in the aggregate the portion distributable to any of the other children," &c. On the trial in the Probate Court three items of advancement were claimed: First. A tract of land in Union County. Second. The gift of a note for $300; and, Third. The expenses incurred by the father in graduating his son Alexander as a doctor of medicine.

It appeared that about the year 1853 the intestate conveyed the land by deed to one Jonathan Rhyne, receiving as the consideration part cash and the remainder in the note of Rhyne, with Alexander White as surety, which said note is now in the hands of the administrator of the intestate, showing a balance unpaid. In September, 1859, Rhyne conveyed the land so purchased to Alexander White, his surety, who had become his son-in-law, taking his note for the purchase money. Upon this note Alexander made a payment, leaving still due a balance about equal to that on the note of Rhyne to the intestate, with Alexander as surety. Jonathan Rhyne was discharged in bankruptcy some time after 1865 and before the death of John White, and the note of Rhyne and Alexander White was not proved in bankruptcy. Alexander White died in 1865, and there is no evidence that the note was presented for payment in the settlement of his estate; nor does it appear in the inventory of the assets of John White's estate. The note was produced upon a reference in this case on February 13, 1883, by the defendant, Moore, and is endorsed with a single credit of $470, January 8, 1859, received from Alexander White, "said sum to be credited on J. Rhyne's note on A. White."

Alexander, the eldest son of John White, was sent by his father to a medical college and was graduated as a doctor of medicine, completing his course at about the age of 22 or 23. Anderson Meacham testified that he once heard John say that Alexander agreed that if his father would make him a doctor, he would take it as his part of his father's estate. This was before Dr. White attended the lectures.

As to the note for $300, the only proof was the statement of James Scoggins, that he once heard a conversation between John White and wife of witness, in which, among other things, he said that he had once a note on Alexander for $300, and that Alexander had come to his house and wanted him (John) to give it to him, who told him he could not do so, as he had already given him more than any of the other children, when Alexander got mad and said that he would never again go to his house while he lived. Alexander left the house, when the mother prevailed on him to call Alexander back and give him the note, which was done—that the note was more than his share, and he would have it to account for to the other children, &c.

The probate judge found as matter of fact that there was not sufficient proof of any of the alleged advances, and decreed that the petitioners were entitled to their father's share in the estate of John White. Upon appeal to the Circuit Court Judge Cothran affirmed the judgment of the Probate Court, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

1. Because his honor erred in not sustaining each of the exceptions taken to the decree of the Probate Court.

2. Because his honor erred as matter of fact in holding that the land conveyed by John White, the intestate, through one Rhyne, to the son, Alexander, was not an "advancement:"

and *as matter of law, under the facts proved, that the land so conveyed was no advancement.

3. Because his honor erred in holding that the note of Alexander White to his father, unpaid at Alexander's death in 1865, and never presented and proved against his estate, was not an advancement to the extent of the amount due thereon.

4. Because his honor erred in holding that said note was extinguished by lapse of time, when the estate descended to the heirs at law of John White; and erred in extending the presumption of payment to the date of the commencement of this action, instead of limiting it to the devolution of the estate of the intestate at his death in 1876; and erred in considering the matter of such extinguishment in the absence of any exception by the petitioners to the decree of the Probate Court, wherein said debt is considered to be subsisting, no question thereon having been made at the hearing in either the Probate or Circuit Court.

5. Because his honor erred in holding that petitioners can recover a distributive share per stirpes, through their father, Alexander White, without taking into account and charging them with the indebtedness of their father to the estate, existing in full force at the death of the intestate; and erred in considering the moral obligation to pay the debt in connection with the petitioners, instead of with their father; and erred in holding that the moral obligation to pay the debt was not to be considered after the lapse of twenty years from maturity.

6. Because his honor erred in holding that the sums expended by intestate for Alexander White in his medical education and outfit were not advancements; and erred in assuming the infancy of Alexander, at date of agreement with his father, to advance to him the extent of a medical education, no plea or proof of infancy having been interposed in the Probate Court; and erred in not holding that, even if an infant at date of agreement, his continuance after majority to avail himself of the benefit of the agreement was a complete and valid ratification of the agreement for the entire period.

7. Because his honor erred in not holding that the note for $300, surrendered to Alexander by John White, was an advancement.

*As to the note for $300, both the probate and the Circuit Judges held that the proof was too vague and unsatisfactory to establish it as an advancement, and we cannot say that such ruling was error.

As to the expenses incurred in graduating Alexander as a doctor of medicine. There was some testimony as to alleged declarations of the intestate and of Alexander to the effect that if the father would make him (Alexander) a doctor, he would ask nothing more from his father's estate. But there was no memorandum in writing to that effect, nor time or place indicated where the parties met and entered into any such agreement. The testimony as to casual declarations said to have been made many years ago, when Alexander was young and probably a minor, was considered insufficient to establish an agreement with the requisite clearness. Besides, as stated in the Circuit decree, it has been held in this State that "money expended on the education of a child, whether professional or general, is not an advancement." Cooner v. May, 3 Strob. Eq., 185.

Then as to the tract of land in Union County. It does not clearly appear whether it is the land itself or the note for the purchase money which is claimed to be an advancement. If the latter, there can hardly be a question that the probate and Circuit Judges were right in not allowing it, for several reasons. The note was really not that of Alexander, but of Rhyne, with Alexander as surety. It was required to be paid, and was, in fact, partly paid. If the land had been conveyed directly to Alexander, and he alone had given the note for the balance of the purchase money, it would have been merely a debt. "A note given by a child to a parent is presumed to be not an advancement, but a debt." Abb. Tr. Evid., 154.

Nor can the land itself be considered as an advancement. John White, the father, did not convey it to his son, Alexander, but he sold it for value to Rhyne, who, six years after, sold it to Alexander, who paid part of the purchase money and gave his note for the remainder. It may possibly be that when Rhyne sold the land to Alexander it was understood that the balance of the purchase money to Rhyne might be paid by satisfying the remainder of Rhyne's note to John White.

But Rhyne testified *that his note was to be paid, saying: "For land sold Dr. White he was to pay me, and I was to pay John White for amount due by me. I have never paid John White, nor has Dr. White ever paid me the entire amount. There is now enough due me from Dr. White on his note to pay amount owing by me to John White."

We agree with the Circuit Judge, who states, "There was some testimony as to declarations of the parties heard by witnesses, but unwritten words are, at best, but vanishing sound, * * * and when testified to after a lapse of thirty years, furnish an uncertain and unsatisfactory foundation on which to build. Hence my conclusion is, that in no sense can the land, or any of the transactions in regard to it, be justly held to be an advancement to Alexander."

But assuming that neither the bond nor the purchase money was properly an advancement by John White to his son, Alexander, it is still further insisted that the representative of Alexander (surety on Rhyne's note) certainly owed the balance of that note as a debt to his father's estate; and even if it is now too late to recover it at law, yet the debt still exists and the moral obligation to pay it still remains; and the children of Alexander are not entitled to their father's share in their grandfather's estate until that debt is accounted for upon the principle of equitable retainer announced in the case of Wilson v. Kelly, 16 S. C., 219. It is true, that case held that a discharge in bankruptcy operates like a successful plea of the statute of limitations, not as payment or extinguishment of the debt, but only as a bar to an action thereon. Hence, when a debtor has been discharged in bankruptcy, while the legal obligation to pay the debt is gone, the moral obligation remains, because the debt is still unpaid, and it constitutes a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay the debt; for if the debt were paid or otherwise extinguished, there would be no moral obligation to pay it.

We think, however, this case differs from that of Wilson v. Kelly in several important particulars. The debt of Alexander White for the land was really to Rhyne. He owed nothing to his father's estate except as surety. We are not aware that it *has ever been held that after the obligation of a mere surety has been barred by the statute of limitations or a discharge in bankruptcy there is left a moral obligation upon him, or, after his death, upon his representatives, to pay the debt; and we hesitate to make a new ruling to that effect.

But if by the subsequent purchase of the land from Rhyne, Alexander may be considered as substantially the principal in the debt to his father, it is urged even in that case that recovery of the debt is not only barred by the statute of limitations, but by lapse of time it is paid and extinguished, leaving no moral obligation remaining to pay it. The presumption of payment began to run at the time of the last credit, January 8, 1859, during the life-time of the debtor, Alexander White; and, as we suppose not being suspended either by the death of Alexander White in 1865, or that of John White in 1876, continued to run on until February 13, 1883, when the parties claimed the benefit of the note in this case, being about twenty-four years; so that it would seem that the period necessary to raise the presumption of payment had expired.

We cannot doubt that, in respect to the moral obligation to pay, there is a difference between a debt barred by positive statute and one declared paid by lapse of time. The doctrine of payment by presumption is stated in Angell on Limitations as follows: "By analogy to the statute of limitations, an artificial presumption has long been established that when payment of a bond or other specialty was not demanded for twenty years, and there has been no circumstance to show that it was still acknowledged to be in existence, the jury are to presume payment at the end of twenty years." "Payment in fact is the actual payment from the payer to the payee—payment in law is a transaction equivalent to actual payment." 2 R. & L. Law Dict., tit. Payment, 941. Or as stated by Judge Wardlaw in Stover v. Duren, 3 Strobb., 450 [51 Am. Dec. 634]: "The presumption of payment, which, in reference to debts not embraced by the statute of limitations, arises from the lapse of twenty years, is not a presumption of law—that is, a rule which the court itself may apply—but is a presumption of fact, recognized by law, from which a conclusion ought to be deduced by a jury. It is, however, one of those *strong presumptions which shift the burden of proof, which from frequent occurrence have become familiar to the courts, and which, being constantly recommended to juries from motives of policy, have acquired an artificial force and become as important as presumptions of law," &c.

Where the lapse of time is complete, the presumption of payment arises, and in that case, as we understand, it is not alone the recovery on the note that is barred, but the debt itself is paid and extinguished.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Fraser, J., Newberry, February, 1884.

This was an action by E. P. Chalmers, clerk of the court, against L. J. Jones and G. S. Mower. The opinion states the case.

*Messrs. Y. J. Pope and J. F. J. Caldwell, for appellants.

Mr. O. L. Schumpert, contra.

September 29, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. A certain tract or parcel of land situate in Newberry County was owned in the life-time of the late Chancellor Job Johnstone by the said Job Johnstone and the defendant, Lambert J. Jones. Chancellor Johnstone died intestate in 1862, and shortly thereafter proceedings were instituted by his heirs for the partition of his real estate. In this proceeding partition was also sought of the tract above mentioned between the heirs of the said Job Johnstone and the said Lambert J. Jones under which this tract was sold, as it seems in 1864, Mr. Jones being the purchaser, on the completion of which purchase, he executed to the commissioner in equity a bond, with sureties, conditioned for the payment of $700 on February 1, 1865, and $700 on February 1, 1866, with interest on each from February 1, 1864. Upon this bond was entered a credit of the share of Mr. Jones, leaving unpaid the share of the heirs of Chancellor Johnstone.

For this balance the action below was brought in 1877, and the plaintiff sought to make the entire tract specifically liable under the act of 1791. After the commencement of this action, the land was conveyed to the defendant, Mr. Mower, who was then made a party. Two defences were set up—one by Mr. Jones, to wit, that the bond was given with reference to Confederate currency, and therefore should be sealed in accordance with the law as to such contracts; the other by Mr. Mower, who, in addition to the defence of Mr. Jones, which he adopted, denied the alleged lien under the act of 1791.

The case was referred to Mr. Culbreath, as a special master, who, after full testimony, reported on the question of fact, to wit, whether the land was sold with reference to Confederate currency, that it was not so sold, finding Mr. Jones indebted in the sum of $1,761, due November 9, 1883. As to the issue of law, he held that the entire tract stood pledged, under the act of 1791, *for the payment of the purchase money. The case upon this report was heard by his honor, Judge Fraser, who sustained the special master both in his finding of fact and his conclusion of law, and he ordered that plaintiff have leave to enter judgment and issue execution for the amount stated in the report, with leave to apply for orders directing the sale of the land and the application of the proceeds to the bond, &c.

From this decree the defendants have appealed, assigning error to the judge in his finding of fact on the subject of the Confederate currency, and also in holding that the act of 1791 applied to the case—the defendant Mower claiming that in no event could the statutory lien attach to more than one-half of the land, to wit, that portion which belonged to Chancellor Johnstone. These, then, are the only questions before us, one being a question of fact, and the other a question of law. The case below being a case of equity cognizance, and therefore subject to the appellate jurisdiction of this court, both of the questions mentioned are open and must be considered.

There is little or no contest as to the facts proved in the case, to wit, the time of the sale, the circumstances attending it, the giving of the bond in suit, and the other facts connected with the transaction, and the issue involved in the question of fact upon which the case turns, is not in reference to the facts and circumstances proved so much as it is in reference to the proper inference to be drawn from these facts. There is no doubt but that the defendant executed the bond in question in which he promised to pay the "dollars" mentioned therein, but the question of fact is, what was meant by this term "dollars"? was it employed to indicate Confederate dollars, or was it used in the sense of "lawful money"? Such being the question, the rule which usually restrains this court from interfering with the findings of fact, unless the error is manifest and patent, is not applied so stringently as where the truth of the facts claimed to be proved is involved.

Now, considering this question of inference under this relaxed rule, what is the result? In general, where the intent of parties to a contract is the matter to be ascertained, the terms used in the contract, interpreted ac-ording to their ordinary and usual *meaning, afford the best, most appropriate, and reliable means of reaching such intent. In fact, this course is required in most cases involving the construction of papers by one of the long established rules of construction. If this rule was applied here in its full force, the term "dollars" being well understood to mean "lawful money" in its ordinary sense, there could be no doubt as to the proper interpretation of this contract.

Owing, however, to the peculiar financial condition of this State, and of all the Southern States, during the recent war, with reference to the currency then in use, which currency was known to be the basis of many, if not of most, of the contracts entered into during that time, it became manifest at the close of the war that great injustice would be done if such contracts were enforced under the application of the rule above referred to. One of the first acts, therefore, of our first legislative assembly after the war (the convention) was an ordinance to relax this rule in cases of contracts made during the war, by which in such cases the intent of the parties as to the currency intended might be reached, not by the strict and grammatical interpretation of the word "dollars" and such similar words, as formerly, but by the surrounding circumstances and facts attending the transaction, to wit, the character of the consideration, its value, &c.

This contract, then, having been made during the war in the purchase of a tract of land, must be considered and interpreted without regard to the ordinary meaning of the term "dollars" therein. At least that term, in its ordinary meaning, is not to control in defiance of other testimony showing a different intent. Now, it is true, as it appears, that the special master and the Circuit Judge applied this relaxed rule to the case. They discarded the ordinary meaning of the term "dollars," in the first instance, and went into a full examination of all the circumstances attending the sale, and also of the value of the land, numerous witnesses having been examined upon that question. But, notwithstanding this, they both reached the conclusion that the ordinary meaning of the term should govern, and that the parties meant good dollars, as contradistinguished from Confederate dollars.

Was this the proper inference from the admitted facts? It appears that Mr. Jones bought the land in 1864, at public sale, *the price being $81.75 per acre. He and Chancellor Johnstone bought in 1854 at $24.12 per acre, and we must assume that in 1854 the latter price was its value. Numerous witnesses were examined by the special master as to the value of the land, some of them valuing it before the war, some in 1864, during the war, and some afterwards. As is usual, these witnesses differed greatly in their valuations; those valuing it during the war, 1864, ranging from $5 to $60—out of six witnesses, the highest putting it at $12 per acre, and four others at from $50 to $60. An average from the estimate of the ten would be $26.70, a little more than Mr. Jones and Chancellor Johnstone gave for it in 1854. Under this valuation, we may safely assume that the value in good money at the sale in 1864 was about what it was when originally bought in 1854, to wit, $24.12.

Now, Mr. Jones purchased at the commissioner's sale in 1864, at $81.75, something more than three times its value as estimated by the average of the witnesses above. The master in his estimate seems to have been governed by the valuation of the commissioners in partition, made in 1862, who then returned it at about $50 per acre. Taking either estimate, it is manifest that Mr. Jones contracted to give (if the term "dollars" be strictly construed) considerably more than the true value in good money—in the one case, more than three times; and in the other, nearly twice as much. Giving this fact its legitimate influence, is it not manifest that Mr. Jones at least was not contracting with reference to good money? Can it be properly inferred that he expected or intended to bid $81.75 in good money for the land, when he must have known that in such money it was not worth one-third of that sum? This fact, accompanied with the other facts, to wit, that the sale took place during the war, when there was no other currency in use; when, according to the testimony, the contracts then made in that community were generally met by Confederate currency; when no announcement was made at the sale that in this instance gold was expected—seems to us very strong in support of an inference that Confederate currency was the basis of this contract rather than gold. And such, in our opinion, should have been the finding below.

But even upon this finding, we do not think that the bond *here should be scaled according to the act known as the "Corbin act." This act determines the value of Confederate currency in the absence of all other testimony showing a different value; but where there is other evidence showing a different value at the time and place of the contract in question, such value should govern. See Neely v. McFadden, 2 S. C., 169, recognized in Wilson v. Braddy, 16 S. C., 522. Now, there is testimony in the case that the purchasing value of Confederate money in the community where this contract was made was much greater than that indicated by the Corbin act and at the time mentioned. In the sale of two tracts of land about that time, and in the same vicinity, the difference was not more than five to one. This would scale the debt to some $16.35 per acre in gold, which, with premium on gold added, would perhaps bring the price to about what it sold before the war.

Or, if a more thorough examination was made as to the purchasing value of Confederate money at that time and place, as shown in the purchase and sale of the necessities of life, such as grain, flour, bacon, and the like articles, it would no doubt be developed that the purchasing power of the Confederate currency was even greater than that indicated by the two sales of land referred to. It would be manifestly unjust that this debt should be scaled under the Corbin act, as this would reduce the purchase money to a mere bagatelle; and yet it would also be unjust to require payment of the full amount bid in good money, as such could not have been the contract of the purchaser. A medium rule like that indicated above would, we hope, accomplish substantial justice, and we are pleased to find that it may be applied in accordance with law, on the return of the case to the court below for a new trial.

Next, did the act of 1791 give a lien upon this land, in whole or in part, for the purchase money? This act has been held in several cases to apply only to sales of real estate of intestates; or, at least, it has been held in three cases in this State, cited below, that the Court of Common Pleas derived its authority to sell lands for partition from this act, and from this act alone; and, further, that under this act it could order sales only in cases of intestacy. Blocker v. Spann, 2

Nott & McC., 593; Crompton v. Ulmer, Ibid.,

429; Witherspoon v. Dunlap, 1 McCord, 546. Now, if this be the law of this State under the act of 1791 (and we do not understand that these cases have been overruled), inasmuch as the statutory lien which the plaintiff seeks to enforce here is found in this act, and nowhere else, constituting a part of it, and applying only to the sales which that act authorizes the court to make, it follows necessarily that this lien attaches in sales of land for partition of intestates' estates only.

We do not think that the case of Pell v. Ball (1 Rich. Eq., 386) is in conflict with this. That was a case before the old Court of Equity, in which a sale for partition had been ordered below, and the estate not being an intestate estate, the question was raised as to the power of the court to order a sale in such case. The court held, Chancellor Harper delivering the opinion, that notwithstanding the fact that the English Court of Chancery had no power to direct a sale of lands for the purpose of partition, yet that our courts of chancery had assumed jurisdiction in such cases in various instances, even before the passage of the act of 1791, and he refers to the case of Dinckle v. Timrod (1 De Saus., 109) as an authority that the court exercised this power long before the act of 1791. And he says that "before this act the court certainly had equal jurisdiction in every case of tenancy, or tenancy in common, as in that of intestate estates." Saying, further: "It is not questioned but that the jurisdiction has been exercised familiarly and habitually for the greater portion of a century, and I believe there is no lawyer at the bar or judge on the bench who cannot verify the prevalence of the practice."

It is true, in seeking a foundation for the jurisdiction of the court in such cases, he went on to discuss somewhat the act of 1791, and he said: "There are some other views which it is hardly necessary to take. The court may have extended the equity of the statute of 1791 in relation to intestate estates to all other cases of joint tenancy, and tenancy in common, according to a well known practice of the English courts, as being within the mischief, or cause of the making of the act." And he remarked, further, that the words of the act of 1791, to wit, "distributive share," were not necessarily confined to intestate estates, but were capable of a construction, which would embrace tenants in common.

*It must be remembered that the court below in that case had ordered a sale, though the estate was not an intestate estate, and Chancellor Harper was seeking authority for the Chancery Court to order a sale in such case. And he concluded that it had authority, first from long practice, and second, perhaps, under the equity of the act of 1791, and possibly from an expansion of the words "distributive share" therein, so as to include joint tenants and tenants in common. But there was no distinct ruling upon these latter points, and certainly no overruling of the three cases, supra, in which the Appeal Court had held that the act of 1791 applied only to sales in cases of intestacy, so far as the Court of Common Pleas could take jurisdiction.

This being the law, the statutory lien which that act provides can only attach in sales made for partition in cases of intestacy.

The main question, then, in this case is, was the sale below ordered in a case of intestacy? There is no doubt that Chancellor Johnstone died intestate as to this land, and that it was sold under a bill filed for the purpose of partition. It is true that Mr. Jones owned one-half of the land, and therefore, before Chancellor Johnstone's interest could be distributed among his heirs at law, it had to be separated from the interest of Mr. Jones. This, no doubt, might have been done by an independent bill between Mr. Jones and the heirs, and then Chancellor Johnstone's portion might have been partitioned by sale between his heirs by another bill. Suppose this had been done, would not the statutory lien have attached to the sale thus ordered? Most certainly, because the property was intestate property, and sold under the provisions of the act of 1791.

Now, has not this been done in substance? The parties did not see proper to institute a separate action for the separation of the interests of Mr. Jones and Chancellor Johnstone, but they embraced this land in the bill which was filed for the partition of the other real estate of Chancellor Johnstone, in which his heirs alone were interested. This bill may have been defective to the extent of thus embracing a separate matter as multifarious, or as misjoinder of actions, but no objection was made, and it proceeded to judgment and sale. So far as this particular land was involved, the object of the bill was to separate the interest of *Chancellor Johnstone from that of Mr. Jones, and then to distribute that interest among the heirs of Chancellor Johnstone, and the court, by the consent of all parties, having concluded that these ends could best be accomplished by the sale of the entire tract, so ordered, Mr. Jones getting his part by a credit on the bond which he gave as purchaser, and the remainder of the bond standing for the heirs at law.

Now, we have seen that it is the sale of intestate property only, upon which a lien attaches to the property sold for the purchase money under the act of 1791. Here the only portion of the property sold as intestate property was the half that belonged to Chancellor Johnstone. This was sold for the purpose of distribution among his heirs. True, to reach this interest, the half belonging to Mr. Jones was also sold at the same time, no one objecting; but Mr. Jones's half was not intestate property; and while under the terms of the act the lien must attach to the half interest of Chancellor Johnstone, yet we cannot see how it could attach to that of Mr. Jones. There may be difficulty in applying this doctrine to the land in question, but that matter is not before us.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to be enforced in accordance with the views herein above, with the privilege on the part of both plaintiff and defendant to introduce testimony (if so advised) as to the purchasing power of Confederate money at and about the time and place of the sale of the land in question here.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur in the result. Upon the point sent back, the inquiry should be, what was the relative value of Confederate money to national currency at the time and place of sale? Such relative value to be ascertained "by the application of the act of 1869, aided, controlled, or qualified by the evidence as to such value." See Parker v. Wilson, 5 S. C., 493.

Messrs. Meetze & Muller and W. T. Gary, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. L. F. Youmans and B. W. Bettis, Jr., contra.

October 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On January 16, 1874, Rufus M. Shealey executed a deed, whereby he conveyed a certain parcel of land, containing about four acres, situate in the County of Lexington, near the town of Leesville, to S. Bouknight, D. C. Shealey, S. F. Hendrix, J. S. Derrick, S. L. Black, J. W. Hair, and J. C. Bodie, who were appointed a committee to erect a Lutheran church at Leesville, "provided the said committee shall erect a building for a congregation to worship in as a Lutheran church; and after said building is erected and a society formed, the right shall then vest in the Lutheran church, that is, to the council or vestry, as the case may be, to them and their successors in office forever, for the benefit of said Lutheran congregation *at Leesville, as it is intended to convey this lot for a church and academy, and also one acre of the same, at the northwest end, for the erection of a teacher's or professor's house, if required for that purpose, and as agreed upon by the vestry or wardens of said congregation."

It is conceded that these conditions have been complied with by the erection of a church building, the formation of a society by the congregation worshipping as a Lutheran church, and that the plaintiffs, who were duly elected to the several offices of pastor, elders, and deacons, form the church council of the said church known as "Luther Chapel," and as such "are vested with the care, management, and control of said Lutheran church and congregation, in the nature of trustees in all matters, both temporal and spiritual, and have especial care and control of all the property of said society."

It seems that the Rev. Mr. Busby, in addition to his duties as pastor of said church, was engaged in teaching a school in the town of Leesville, and that in the latter part of the year 1878, or first of 1879, a school-house was built on the lot above mentioned, in which a school was carried on very successfully by Mr. Busby as teacher until November, 1880, when the building was destroyed by fire, and another school-house was built on the same spot, and the school again carried on with success by Mr. Busby as teacher until June, 1883. Both of these school houses were paid for by funds subscribed by citizens of the town of Leesville and vicinity, including Lutherans as well as others, a large portion being furnished by the town council of said town. It also appears that trustees were appointed for said school, but exactly how they were appointed does not very distinctly appear.

On October 29, 1881, on the petition of sundry persons, some of whom were members of the Lutheran church and others not, a charter was obtained from the clerk of the court for Lexington County, incorporating certain persons, then acting as trustees of the school, under the name and style of "The Trustees of Leesville English and Classical Institute of Lexington County," for the purpose "of organizing, governing, and conducting an English and classical institute in the County of Lexington, in the State of South Carolina," in which charter the board of trustees *were authorized to fill any vacancy that might occur in their board by death, resignation, or otherwise. The petition for this charter was prepared by Mr. Busby at the request of the trustees. It does not appear that the trustees had much, if anything, to do with the management of the school until August, 1882, which seems to have been carried on entirely by Mr. Busby, he relying upon the tuition fees for his compensation; but the patronage having largely increased, it became necessary to have an assistant, and in August, 1882, an arrangement was made between the trustees and Mr. Busby, whereby they were to take the tuition fees and guarantee to him a salary of $600 and his assistant $450, only a portion of the trustees, however, assuming the payment of these salaries.

This arrangement seems to have worked satisfactorily to all parties until about March 1, 1883, when a difficulty arose which induced Mr. Busby to tender his resignation, which the trustees declined to accept. On the contrary, the arrangement previously entered into was cancelled, the school was turned over to Mr. Busby and his assistant, giving them full control and charge of the same, and the accounts for tuition were given up by the trustees to Busby and his assistant, they being required to refund to the trustees the amount paid by them on said salaries, which was done, and on March 1, 1883, a majority of the board formally resigned their office as trustees. From that time until the close of the scholastic year in June, 1883, the trustees do not appear to have in any way interfered with the school or its management. When the school closed in June, Mr. Busby announced that the school would be reopened in the following September, and very soon afterwards left on a visit to Virginia.

During his absence, the defendants claim that the board of trustees was reorganized by filling the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of a majority of the trustees, whereby the defendants in this action, except the Messrs. Watson, none of whom are Lutherans, became the trustees of the school. On July 14, 1883, the defendants, without authority from the officers of the Lutheran church, took possession of the school-house, took off the locks, put on new ones, and posted a notice on the building, warning all persons that "this house has this day been closed by order of the *board of trustees of Leesville English and Classical Institute, and all parties whomsoever are warned not to enter it without obtaining permission to do so from said board of trustees," which notice was signed by the defendant, D. D. D. Mitchell, as chairman, and the defendant, Joab Edwards, as secretary of said board. Soon afterwards said board appointed the defendants, Rev. J. E. Watson and E. O. Watson teachers, who were carrying on a public school in said school-house at the time this action was commenced, the said board claiming to have accepted the resignation of Mr. Busby, which in March previous had been tendered and declined.

In December, 1883, the plaintiffs filed their complaint, in which they demanded judgment: 1st. For the possession of said school-house; 2d. For damages; 3d. That the defendants be enjoined from the further use and occupation of said school-house, and from in any manner interfering therewith; 4th. For general relief. Judge Kershaw, to whom the application for a temporary injunction was made, held that "the trusts of the deed require the property should be held for the benefit of the said Lutheran congregation 'for a church and academy,' and it was not in the power of the council of the said church, in whom the property vested, to divert it from the purpose of the trust as expressed in the deed, and convert the same into a school, to be held and conducted by another body, not for the Lutheran church, but the public of Leesville, and in opposition to the authorities of said church." He therefore granted an injunction as asked for until the further order of the court.

The case came on for trial before Judge Pressley, and on May 8, 1884, he rendered a decree in which he found as matter of fact "that there was an understanding or implied contract between the town council of Leesville and the officers of the Lutheran church that the town council should have the right to build their school-house on the church lot; * * * that such contract gave them the right to the house, even though the title to the lot may remain in the church; that the members of the Lutheran congregation knew of the action of its officers, and took no legal measures to prevent its consummation, nor did they even give notice of any opposition to it; * * * that it was implied in that *contract that the Rev. Levi E. Busby was to be the teacher of the said school, and that the trustees have not the right to remove him except for good cause." He therefore rendered judgment, that the school-house is the property of the trustees of the Leesville school; that the injunction granted by Judge Kershaw be dissolved; that the trustees of the school be permitted to take and retain possession of the said school-house; and that the Rev. Levi E. Busby be restored to his former position as teacher until good cause be shown for his removal.

From this judgment both parties appeal; the plaintiffs alleging various errors in the findings of fact by the Circuit Judge, and of law in not finding that it was not in the power of the church council to divert the property from the purposes of the trusts as declared in the deed from Shealey above mentioned; and the defendants alleging error in the finding of fact that it was implied in the contract between the town council of Leesville and the officers of the Lutheran church that the Rev. Levi E. Busby was to be the teacher of said school, and in the conclusion of law that the trustees had no right to remove him except for good cause.

We concur with Judge Kershaw in the view which he took of this case. The property conveyed by the deed of Shealey was to be held in trust for the Lutheran church at Leesville, not only for the purpose of a church, but also for an academy. The deed declares this purpose in explicit language: "It is intended to convey this lot for a church and academy." There is no discretion vested in the church council as to whether or not the property should be used for both of these purposes, but, on the contrary, there was just as much obligation that the property should be used for an academy for the benefit of the Lutheran church as that it should be used for a church. The only discretion conferred upon the church council or vestry was as to the appropriation of one acre at the northwest end of the lot for the erection of a teacher's or professor's house. The deed, after using the language last above quoted, proceeds as follows: "And also one acre of the same at the northwest end for the erection of a teacher's or professor's house, if required for that purpose, and as agreed upon by the vestry or wardens of said congregation." This language plainly shows that it was only the last mentioned purpose *that was left to the discretion of the church council, but that the requirement that the property conveyed should be used for the erection of a church and academy for the benefit of the Lutheran congregation at Leesville, was imperative. This being so, it follows necessarily that the church council had no more authority to transfer to others, alien to the Lutheran faith, any portion of the property for the establishment of an academy or school, than they would have had to transfer any portion of it for the establishment of a church to be owned and controlled by those who were of a different faith from that of the Lutherans.

Under this view of the case it becomes unnecessary to inquire, except so far as the question of estoppel is concerned, whether the conclusion of fact reached by the Circuit Judge, "that there was an understanding or implied contract between the town council of Leesville and the officers of the Lutheran church, that the town council should have a right to build their school-house on the church lot," upon which his judgment mainly rests, can be maintained; for even if the church council had undertaken to convey such right to the town council in the most formal manner, they would have had no authority so to do.

It is contended, however, that the Lutheran church, represented by their officers, the plaintiffs in this case, are estopped from setting up the claim which they now make because "the members of the Lutheran congregation knew of the action of its officers and took no legal measures to prevent its consummation, nor did they even give notice of any opposition to it." The "action of its officers" here alluded to is that from which the Circuit Judge inferred that there was such an implied contract with the town council as that above referred to. There certainly is no evidence of any express agreement between the church council and the town council like that mentioned; on the contrary, the testimony shows that whenever any member of the church council was applied to for the purpose, such application was met with a decided refusal, as is shown by the testimony of Busby, Rawls, S. P. Derrick, and Hiltwanger; and it is not pretended that either the church council or the Lutheran congregation took any action as organized bodies even looking to any surrender of their rights.

*What we understand to be relied upon for the purpose of raising the estoppel is the fact that subscriptions were solicited and obtained from others than Lutherans, especially from the town council of Leesville, for the purpose of aiding in building the first school-house and rebuilding it after the fire, and the further fact that others than Lutherans were made members of the board of trustees, who applied for and obtained a charter for the school. As to the subscriptions, it does not appear that they were made or induced by any express understanding that the subscribers were thereby to acquire any right of property in the building, and the most that can be said is that some subscribed under the impression that they would thereby acquire such right; but, on the contrary, it appears from the testimony on the part of the plaintiffs that these subscriptions were asked for as donations or voluntary contributions.

To raise an estoppel it should have been made to appear that the owners of the property knew at the time that these subscriptions were made, not as voluntary donations, but with a view to acquire an interest in the property; for we can very well understand that the Lutheran congregation, having a flourishing school, taught by their pastor, might have supposed, in the absence of any information to the contrary, that the community generally would be willing to contribute means to provide a building for the school, which was non-sectarian in character, and in the prosperity and efficiency of which the public generally would be interested. For certainly it was a very great advantage to the town of Leesville and its vicinity to have such a school as that carried on by Mr. Busby was represented to be, even though it should be exclusively owned and controlled by Lutherans. It may be that the town council had no legal right to appropriate funds derived from taxation in aid of a school owned and controlled by a particular religious sect, and that may be one circumstance indicating that the town council supposed that they were thereby acquiring a right in the property, but we do not regard it sufficient to show conclusively that the Lutheran congregation were aware that such was the purpose of the subscription, especially when no such purpose was declared at the time the subscription was made; and, on the contrary, the testimony *shows that all these subscriptions were taken just as subscriptions are usually taken in a community to aid in building a church or academy.

The other fact relied upon to raise the estoppel, to wit, the appointment of others than Lutherans as members of the board of trustees and the application by them for a charter, was not sufficient, in our judgment, to call for any action on the part of the Lutheran church. Exactly how these trustees were appointed does not very distinctly appear, but the testimony shows that until August, 1882, they took little or no part in the management of the school, and even after that, and until the close of the school in June, 1883, the Rev. Mr. Busby seems to have had the entire control and management of the school. As long as this was the case there was nothing to excite the apprehensions of the Lutheran congregation, or to call for any action on their part. They might very well have been willing to have the support and influence of others brought to their aid as trustees of their school, as well as to have the benefits of a charter, especially as these others had, as they supposed, made liberal voluntary contributions in aid of their school, which had proved an ornament to the town and of great value to the community generally. But in all this there was nothing to estop the Lutheran church from asserting their rights when they subsequently found that by the unauthorized action of the defendants in July, 1883, their property was seized, their rights not only ignored, but denied, and their school passed into the hands of those alien to their faith, and they excluded from any control or management thereof.

We think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to be restored to the possession of the school-house in question, with the right to the control and management of said school.

Of course, under the view which we have taken of the case, the question presented by the defendants' appeal cannot arise, and need not be considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

[1. Action ⚭22.]

At a sale for partition of an intestate's estate, A purchased a tract of land, and a few days afterwards B purchased an adjoining tract of the same estate. A then sold to C, who, finding that B was in possession of, and claimed under his deed, a strip of land which C claimed to be covered by the deed to A and by A's deed to him, instituted an action, stating these facts in his complaint, and demanded judgment that the mistake in B's deed be corrected, that the boundary line be properly designated, and that B be required to surrender to C the possession of the disputed strip of land. Held, that this was a plain action at law for the recovery of real property, and that the court below erred in treating it as a case in chancery.

[2. Equity ⚭43.]

The principle that the Court of Equity has the right to put a purchaser into possession of land sold under its orders, does not apply where dispute arises between one purchaser and the vendee of another purchaser, at the same sale, as to the boundaries of their respective purchases.

[3. Equity ⚭47.]

Nor could the plaintiff, holding the older deed, invoke the interposition of a Court of Equity upon the ground that there was a mistake in the deed made to defendant by the officer of the court: he has a plain and adequate remedy at law, to wit, an action for the recovery of the land.

This was an action by Sarah E. Glover and Joseph Dewees against W. W. Farr, Edward P. Farr, and C. J. C. Hutson, commenced prior to March, 1880. One of the exceptions upon which the case came to this court was in these words: "Because his honor held that the court had jurisdiction further in the cause." Mr. William Elliott, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. William Heyward at one time owned a plantation situate in Beaufort County, and composed in part, with other tracts, of two tracts, one known as Bellefield and the other as Goodhope. In 185— he sold Goodhope to one Mrs. McNeil, and subsequent to this he sold Bellefield to one James Bolan, who, after his purchase of Bellefield, bought Goodhope from Mrs. McNeil. These two tracts were coterminous at one point, Goodhope bounding Bellefield on the north. James Bolan died in August, 1865, seized and possessed of considerable real estate composed of six tracts, Bellefield and Goodhope being two of the six, and leaving of force a last will and testament, by which he devised his real estate to his grandchildren, appointing certain parties therein named his executors, only one of whom, Thomas S. Behn, qualified, who, in 1866, filed a bill in the then Court of Equity for the partition of this real estate between the parties entitled under the will of his testator.

In this proceeding the commissioners in partition having returned that said real estate could not be advantageously divided, and having recommended a sale, an order of sale was obtained in 18— directing said sale to be made by Charles J. C. Hutson, referee. The commissioners had returned that the lands consisted of six tracts, containing in the aggregate 6,347 acres, to wit: Old House and Preference, 895 acres; Bellefield, 1,460 acres; Goodhope, 1,215 acres; Sealy Hill, 653; Tallahassee, 1,450 acres; and Tar Kihu, 664 acres, as ascertained from plats thereof, which they had inspected, and which plats, it seems, had been made in a survey directed by the executor, who gave instructions as to the lines, said executor informing the surveyor that the original plats of these several tracts "had been taken by the Yankees during the war," and therefore could not be used. As to the line between Bellefield and Goodhope, the surveyor stated that he had been informed by the executor that a certain canal was the line between the two, the centre of which he regarded as the line, which he followed until he struck a double canal, when he ran the line between them until one of these gave out, when he continued the line until it intersected with Howard's line, which was the termination of the line between Bellefield and *Goodhope. The plats thus made were turned over to the executor.

On hearing the return, the Circuit Judge ordered the lands to be sold in whole tracts, or parcels, at public auction, or by private contract, on such terms and at such times as the referee, with consent of counsel, should determine. In pursuance of this order, the referee advertised the lands, by their respective names, as containing the number of acres mentioned, but with no mention of the plats or recent surveys; and in his report of sales made to the court, he stated that he had sold at public auction, on the first Monday in December, 1877, the tract called Bellefield, containing 1,461 acres, to Mrs. Sarah E. Glover, for the sum of $1,200; that having obtained no satisfactory bid for Goodhope, containing 1,215 acres, he had since sold said tract, to wit, on January 13, 1879, at private sale, to William W. Farr, for $600.

In the conveyance from the referee to Mrs. Glover of Bellefield, the tract was described as containing 1,461 acres, bounded north by lands of William C. Howard and estate of James Bolan, east by lands of the estate of James Bolan, south and west by lands of Joseph Glover; no mention being made of the survey and plat above referred to. The plat, however, as it appears, was delivered with this deed to an agent of Mrs. Glover. This deed was executed and delivered on January 10, 1879, three days before the sale of Goodhope to Farr, which was executed on January 13, 1879, and in which the premises were described as bounded north by the Honey Hill road, east by lands of the estate of C. C. Dupont, south by lands of the estate of James Bolan, and west by lands of W. C. Howard, containing 1,215 acres, and known as Goodhope; all of which will more fully appear by reference to a plat of the same attached, and made by Oliver P. Law, surveyor, on February 3, 1871.

Mr. Hutson, the referee, testified that he "sold Bellefield to Mrs. Glover, the plaintiff; sold it according to the description in the deed. * * * Mrs. Glover was not at the sale; was represented by her agent. That he had plats of all the places sold, which had been given to him by Mr. Behn, the executor. As he made title, he turned over the plats.

Had the plats at *the court house in a roll. Sold at Beaufort court house, and does not remember if purchaser looked at plat; thinks no one did; may have done so. Advertised by acreage of plats. Sold by name of Bellefield." Mrs. Glover retained possession of Bellefield for some five years, when she sold to the plaintiff Dewees, executing a conveyance to him in the terms and with the boundaries as conveyed to her. Farr took possession of Goodhope immediately after his purchase, and has continued in possession ever since.

Some two years after Dewees bought from Mrs. Glover, finding that Farr was in possession of a certain portion of land which he claimed was within the original boundary of Bellefield, he instituted the action below, claiming that Mrs. Glover had purchased Bellefield according to its original boundary, without regard to the subsequent survey and plat, of which she knew nothing, and that in the same way Mrs. Glover had conveyed to him; that it was a mistake in the referee to convey Goodhope to Farr by the plat which covered a portion of Bellefield after the sale of Bellefield to Mrs. Glover, and he prayed that this mistake should be corrected (the original suit for partition being still upon the docket), so that the proper boundaries of the two tracts should be given in the deeds, and that in accordance therewith the defendants should be required and decreed to surrender to the plaintiff Dewees so much of Bellefield as he, the said W. W. Farr, claims to hold under his title from the referee, &c.

The defendants answered, denying that Bellefield was sold to Mrs. Glover simply by its name and without notice and regard to the plat thereof. They denied, further, that any mistake had been made by the referee in the deed of Goodhope to W. W. Farr; and they claimed that Goodhope was purchased according to the plat, which covered the land in dispute, and that plaintiff's deed did not cover said land. They therefore prayed that the complaint be dismissed, and that defendants have judgment for their costs.

The case was referred to Mr. Charles E. Bell, who, after taking full testimony, all of which is reported, found as conclusions of fact: "1. That referee Hutson did not make a mistake in the boundaries to Goodhope, as given in his deed of the same to *defendant, William W. Farr. 2. That the lands in dispute are not part of Bellefield, sold by referee Hutson to Sarah E. Glover. 3. That the lands in dispute are part of the plantation Goodhope, sold by referee Hutson to defendant, W. W. Farr. 4. That defendants, William W. Farr and Edward P. Farr, are not, nor is either of them, in possession of any lands belonging to Bellefield, within the ascertained limits thereof." And as his conclusion of law, he recommended "that the complaint be dismissed, but without prejudice to the legal rights, if any, of the plaintiffs."

When the case came to be heard on this report by his honor, Judge Pressley, a question was raised as to the jurisdiction of the court. Upon this question, the judge said: "I am satisfied that this court, having sold Bellefield to plaintiffs and Goodhope to one of the defendants, has jurisdiction to put such purchaser into peaceable possession of the land he bought." He further said: "On the law points, I am well satisfied that the court, in selling the lands of Bolan for partition, intended to sell the plantations known as Bellefield and Goodhope separately. That nothing in the proceedings of the court gave notice to bidders that the boundaries were to be changed, or had in any manner been affected by the act of the surveyor, who, without knowing the boundaries, made plats of the separate plantations and fixed their acreage unadvisedly."

He further found that so much of the north canal in dispute, between its junction with the Bellefield back-water and the point below Rolling Dam where it intersected with the canal from Goodhope back-water, was a part of Bellefield; that so much of the land as had been worked as Buzzard Roost, on the Bellefield place north of this canal, should be assigned to Bellefield. But inasmuch as there was doubt in the testimony whether there was also a Goodhope Buzzard Roost, of which, in the opinion of the judge, there was no reliable testimony as to its boundary, he felt compelled to send the case back, for further testimony on that point.

And he adjudged and decreed, "that so much of the conveyances of Bellefield and Goodhope made by the referee under former decree of this court as sets forth the boundaries between *them, or the number of acres, or refers to the erroneous plats then delivered by the referee, together with the said plats, be, and are hereby, annulled, set aside, and declared void, so that said conveyances shall be held and stand good only as conveyances respectively of the plantations Bellefield and Goodhope." Further, "That the north canal in dispute from its junction with Bellefield back-water down to a point below Rolling Dam where it is intersected by the canal from Goodhope back-water be, and it is hereby, assigned to Bellefield as the sole property of its owner." And further, "that the question of the boundary line north of said canal, between Bellefield and Goodhope, be recommitted to referee for further testimony, and especially on this point, that he take testimony and report whether the Scriven or Howard deeds and plats called for Bellefield (Pumpkin Hill) or Goodhope on its eastern line; and if both be called for, then how much of either to be fixed by the surveyor. The said referee shall also cause said surveyor to examine the water system of Goodhope reserve, and to delineate on their plats heretofore made all ancient canals, if any whereby the land in dispute could have been flowed from said reserve. And if any of the laborers who worked Goodhope whilst it was the separate property of Mrs. McNeil can be found, let the referee take their testimony as to the boundary up to which they worked. The testimony already reported is to stand good without further report thereon by the referee. He is to report only on the additional testimony to be taken as herein stated."

From this decree the case is before us on appeal by the defendants. Several questions have been raised in the appeal, but from the view which we have taken of the case, the only one which it is proper to decide now is that involving the jurisdiction of the court. The case below seems to have been regarded by the plaintiffs, and so held by the Circuit Judge, to be a case in chancery, the plaintiffs founding their action upon an alleged mistake in the deed, from the referee, of Goodhope to the defendant, W. W. Farr, which mistake they sought to have corrected, and therefore to have surrendered to them the land in dispute, which, as they alleged, by the suggested mistake had been incorporated in said Goodhope deed; and the Circuit Judge sustaining *the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that the Court of Equity "having sold Bellefield to the plaintiffs and Goodhope to one of the defendants, it had jurisdiction to put the purchasers into peaceable possession."

We will consider first the question of jurisdiction as held by the Circuit Judge. It appears that the real estate of James Bolan was ordered to be sold in separate tracts, and that they were thus sold, Bellefield and Goodhope, by their respective names. Bellefield was sold to Mrs. Glover at public sale some days before the sale of Goodhope to the defendant, W. W. Farr. The deed of Bellefield was executed to Mrs. Glover at once, calling for adjoining lands as boundaries, and Mrs. Glover was in legal possession of all that her deed covered before the sale of Goodhope to Farr. After the sale of Bellefield to Mrs. Glover Goodhope was sold at private sale to Farr, who received a deed with plat, which embraced the land in dispute. It does not appear, however, at what time the defendant, Farr, took actual possession of this particular portion. But, in any event, it was after the sale to Mrs. Glover and after Mrs. Glover was in legal possession if her deed embraced it, and also after the two sales had been reported, confirmed, and ended by the court.

This is not a case, then, where the land of one who is a party to a proceeding is sold by order of the court, and he refuses to yield possession, thereby necessitating the aid of the court to eject him in behalf of the purchaser. But it is a case where two tracts of land have been sold at separate times and to separate purchasers, neither being in possession at the time, and where, after the purchase, and after the execution of their respective deeds, one takes actual possession of a portion of land claimed by the other, each founding his claim on his deed. In such a case it is clear that the right of the parties would depend upon the deeds. If both deeds embraced the land (which would involve a question of location), the oldest would govern; but if only one embraced it, then that would control. This, however, would not be a case in chancery for the equity side of the court, but it would be an ordinary case of law for the recovery of real estate, the litigants founding their respective claims on the deeds which they held.

*If either the executor or the heirs at law of James Bolan, or his devisees, or any other person being a party to the partition suit in which these lands were ordered to be sold, had been in possession when the sale took place, and after said sale had refused possession to the purchaser, then the principle under which the Circuit Judge acted would have been applicable. But in a contest like that before the court, which has arisen since the sale between the purchasers, and upon facts occurring since, we fail to see its pertinency. Besides, years have elapsed since Mrs. Glover bought from the referee, she has since sold to the plaintiff, Dewees, and the action below is really an action between Dewees and W. W. Farr, in which Dewees claims a portion of land that Farr is cultivating. It is admitted that both parties claim from a common source. The questions are, were the two tracts sold according to original boundaries—one or both? Do both deeds cover the land in dispute? If so, which is the oldest? These are questions for a jury, and not for chancery. And unless a jury trial was waived, of which there is no evidence, we do not see how the court below could assume jurisdiction on its equity side.

The complaint, however, alleges a mistake in the deed to the defendant, Farr, and invokes equity jurisdiction for the correction of this mistake. It would be competent for the court to exercise jurisdiction in a case involving a mistake, where the mistake occurred between the parties to the instrument sought to be corrected. It will be observed, however, in this case that the plaintiffs do not seek to correct the deed to Mrs. Glover under which the plaintiff, Dewees, claims.

No error is alleged in that deed. On the contrary, it is claimed that this deed is right, and that it embraces the land in dispute, as it conveys Bellefield, which, according to its original boundaries, contained the land in dispute. Nor does the defendant, W. W. Farr, seek to correct any mistake in his deed as between him and his grantor. But the plaintiffs seek to correct a mistake between the referee and the defendant, W. W. Farr, in a business matter to which they, the plaintiffs, were not parties, and had no connection therewith, except that they, too, some days previous to the sale of Goodhope to said defendants, had bought Bellefield from said referee.

*We do not see upon what ground equity can take cognizance of such a mistake at the instance of the plaintiffs, even if the mistake was apparent. Certainly the plaintiffs could not invoke equitable interposition, unless they have been injured by the mistake. Do the facts alleged in the complaint show any injury to the plaintiffs growing out of the alleged mistake? The plaintiffs claim that they bought original Bellefield, and that the disputed land lies within its original boundary; that the deed to Mrs. Glover, which was executed and delivered before the deed to the defendant, Farr, covers this land. If this be true, why correct the mistake in the subsequent deed to Farr of Goodhope? Is not the title to Mrs. Glover perfect without the correction sought? Her deed is the oldest, admittedly, and is from the same party under whom Farr claims. And if the facts alleged as the basis of the action can be sustained, we see no difficulty in plaintiffs' way. Have they not a plain and adequate remedy at law in an action for the recovery of real estate? It would seem so, and consequently there is nothing in the case of an equitable feature authorizing equity jurisdiction.

But does this demand a dismissal of the complaint? We think not. The case in all of its features, except the prayer, is a case at law. The main facts alleged in the case, when stripped of their surroundings, amount to nothing more than that the plaintiff, Dewees, is the legal owner of the land in dispute, and that the defendants are in possession thereof, refusing to surrender. These are the facts necessary to be alleged in an action for the recovery of land. And the action, with the exception of the prayer for relief, is, in fact and substance, an action for the recovery of the land in dispute, but the prayer for relief is no part of the action. The character of an action is not determined by the relief demanded; it depends upon the facts alleged.

The error below has been in disregarding the facts and being governed by the relief prayed. The questions whether Bellefield and Goodhope were sold with their original boundaries—one or both—and if so, whether the land in dispute was within the one or the other: and, if within the boundary of Bellefield, whether the deed to Mrs. Glover was the oldest deed, are all questions of fact involved in the greater question of title.

And being questions of fact involving title to real estate, they were questions for a jury, and should have been tried by a jury. The mistake made below, both by the parties and the court, as we apprehend, was in regarding the case as an equity case, and having it heard as such, when it should have been heard and tried as a law case and by a jury. This mistake can be corrected by remanding the case for a jury trial, and to this end—

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to calendar 1 of the court below for a jury trial, unless a jury be waived, with the privilege on the part of the plaintiff to amend by striking the name of Mrs. Sarah E. Glover from the record, if so advised: and, if both sides consent, that the testimony taken and reported in the case by the referee be submitted to the jury, with such other competent testimony as may be offered.

In this case there was a petition by plaintiffs for a rehearing upon the ground that appellants had waived a trial by jury by submitting, without objection, to a trial by the court, and that they were not entitled to a jury trial, because a reference had been ordered.

November 28, 1885. The following order was passed

PER CURIAM. The real issue made by the pleadings in this case was title to the land in dispute, which was a question for the jury. True, the parties had a right to waive a jury trial, and had this been done, and had the issue been tried by the judge, there would have been no error, as the case would still have been a law case, tried, however, by the court by consent of the parties. But this was not the question tried below; on the contrary, the main question tried was whether the deed of defendant should be reformed in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and the parties put into possession as the reformed deed might demand. This was converting the law case made in the pleadings into a chancery case, not properly in the pleadings, which this court thought was error. In this view it made no difference as to the result, whether or not a jury was waived. The petition is dismissed.

*BIEMANN v. WHITE.

(April Term, 1885.)

[Vendor and Purchaser ⇨ 232.]

Where a party purchases a strip of land separated by a ditch from the main tract of his vendor, pays the purchase money, takes possession, and cultivates it as his own, but receives no title deed, his possession is sufficient notice to a subsequent purchaser actually ignorant of this equitable title.

Before Kershaw, J., Oconee, November, 1883.

This was an action by H. D. A. Biemann against W. B. White for the recovery of a strip of land lying between the old run of Conneross Creek and a ditch cut for said creek. It was commenced September 16, 1881. By consent the issues were heard by the court. In rendering the judgment stated in the opinion, the Circuit Judge said:

As between the parties to this alleged agreement, there can be no question, upon proper proof of the agreement, that the defendant could set up and maintain such defence and have his equitable title perfected. This is equally true as between the defendant and any purchaser from Robert Mathewson, with notice of the equitable claim of defendant, even though such purchaser had paid a full consideration for the land. Upon the evidence of the plaintiff, he purchased the land in dispute from defendant in good faith for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any claim, equitable or otherwise, in favor of the defendant. This witness further testifies that before his purchase of said land, and in contemplation of purchasing it, he consulted his attorney, and on his examining the records of the proper office, and informing plaintiff that nothing appeared on record to affect the title to the land, except the dower of Mrs. Cobb, widow of Mathewson's grantor, plaintiff bought the land and took titles for the same. The plaintiff further testifies that before the contract of purchase was executed and conveyance taken, he went on and looked over the land.

The defendant to this claim of a bona fide purchase for valuable consideration without notice offers no evidence, nor attempts to produce any evidence of actual notice to plaintiff, but relies on constructive notice arising from the possession and cultivation of the land by the defendant for several years. A number of our decisions hold the principle that "possession is notice" (Massey v. McIlwain); but in all cases this possession must be of a character to inform the mind of a reasonable man either that such person was actually in possession, or at least must be of a character to put any one about to lay on inquiry.

The facts, as adduced by defendant's own testimony and that of his witnesses, are that the strip or lot of land in dispute adjoins both the lands of defendant and the land purchased by plaintiff. No one lived on the strip of land, but defendant had cultivated it as his own, and paid no rents since the alleged contract of purchase or exchange from Mathewson in 1873. There is no evidence to show that there was any possession of a character to inform the plaintiff or put him on inquiry as to the claim of defendant, and in the absence of proof of this character on the part of the defendant, and upon the proof on the part of the plaintiff, that he, before purchasing the land, resorted to the usual and recognized mode to ascertain the character of the title held by his grantor, I am of opinion the plaintiff should recover the land in dispute, the location and boundaries of which are described in plaintiff's title, as included in the tract conveyed to plaintiff by Robert Mathewson.

Mr. J. J. Norton, for appellant.
Messrs. Keith & Verner, contra.

October 17, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The contest here is over a small parcel of land located in Oconee County, embracing four acres. It appears that it formerly belonged to one Robert Mathewson, under whom the plaintiff claims, and was a part of a larger tract then owned by the said Mathewson. In 1873, however, the defendant, appellant, purchased this parcel which was separated from the main tract by a ditch carrying the run of Conneross Creek. The defendant at this purchase in 1873 received no titles, but he paid the purchase money, and has been in possession by annual cultivation since his said purchase.

*In 1880 Robert Mathewson conveyed to the plaintiff the tract of land to which the parcel in dispute had been attached. It is admitted that at the time of the plaintiff's purchase, he had no knowledge of defendant's possession or claim, equitable or otherwise. It was also in evidence that the plaintiff, before his purchase, went and looked over the land and consulted his attorney as to title; that said attorney examined the records and reported that there was nothing on record to affect the title to the land except a claim of dower. He then bought, and received a conveyance from Mathewson. Under this state of facts, the action below was brought to recover the four acres alleged by plaintiff to be a part of the main tract, and covered by his deed.

The case was tried by his honor, Judge J. B. Kershaw, without a jury, who decreed that plaintiff recover the land with damages, by way of rents, to wit, $45.37½, and costs. The Circuit Judge, while recognizing the general doctrine that "possession is notice" in rebuttal of a claim founded upon the principle of bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration without notice (Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq., 421), yet failed to apply it here, because, as stated by him, "There was no evidence to show that there was any possession of a character to inform the plaintiff, or put him on inquiry as to the claim of defendant, and in the absence of proof of this character on the part of the defendant, and upon the proof, on the part of the plaintiff, that he, before purchasing the land, resorted to the usual and recognized mode to ascertain the character of the title held by the grantor, he was of the opinion that the plaintiff should recover, and so decreed."

In the recent case of Sheorn v. Robinson (22 S. C., 32), this court had occasion to examine this doctrine, and it was there determined upon the authority of several cases therein cited, sustained fully by Mr. Pomeroy in his Equity Jurisprudence, section 615, upon authority which he cites, that possession of land under a contract of purchase has the full force of a deed recorded as to subsequent encumbrancers and purchasers, and this, too, whether such subsequent purchasers or encumbrancers "had actual notice or not." And in that case this court said: "The ground upon which the recording of a deed operates as notice, whether the fact of record be known or not, is that it is always in *the power of the subsequent purchaser, by searching the records, to ascertain whether or not there has been a previous conveyance; and if he fails to make the necessary examination, it is his fault, and his rights must be determined by the facts within his reach on the subject of the record. So, too, it is an easy matter for a purchaser of land to ascertain at the time of his purchase whether his vendor or some one else is in possession, and if he fails to do so, he should take the consequences." And, further: "One in possession under an equitable title has nothing that he can record, and possession open and unconcealed is the only mode by which he can give notice to the world of his rights." &c.

Here it appears that the defendant purchased in 1873. He went into possession immediately, and has cultivated the land ever since. It was separated from the Mathewson main tract by a distinct ditch. The plaintiff, before purchasing, went over and examined in person the tract under negotiation between himself and Mathewson. He could easily, it seems to us, have inquired of Mathewson as to the boundaries of the land, and especially does it seem that he should have inquired as to the portion which, as we have said, was cut off from the main body by the ditch carrying the run of Conneross Creek. We think that the case of Sheorn v. Robinson, supra, is conclusive of this case, and we refer to that case and the authorities there cited.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur, because I think the question in this case is concluded by the decision in Sheorn v. Robinson.

Judgment reversed.

Before Fraser, J., Greenville, July, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

It is by no means clear that the validity of the order of sale was in any way dependent upon John M. Jones being a trustee. These questions, however, while raised by the exception, were not pressed in the argument of counsel. The order to reinvest the proceeds of sale was not a condition of the sale, but was only a direction to the trustee, and which he could have been compelled by proper means to carry out. It may be, however, that the knowledge beforehand of the misapplication of the funds intended by the trustee, tainted the whole transaction as between him and William A. Hudson. If the contest here was between him, Emmala B. and Elizabeth E. Jones and William A. Hudson, I think that the latter could claim no greater rights than those of a mortgagee.

It is not necessary, however, to determine this question; the dispute is not with William A. Hudson, but with William H. Austin, who claims the land as a subsequent purchaser, bona fide and for valuable consideration, and without notice of the equities between the original parties. Now, William A. Hudson held under a legal title, valid on its face and duly recorded, without any notice on the record that the deed was any other than it purported to be on its face. Holding this he made a mortgage of this land to the defendants, William H. Austin and Mrs. Ann F. Hudson, to secure them against a liability assumed by them as trustees under guardianship bond, given by the said William A. Hudson.

No question is raised as to the bond being signed by the trustee and the mortgage given at the same time, but it is claimed that these trustees can only date their consideration from the payment of the amount for which they might become liable as trustees, which was not until after the sale was made under the mortgage, under which the defendant, William H. Austin, purchased. Neither William H. Austin nor Mrs. Ann F. Hudson had any notice of any of the equities of the plaintiffs at the time they took the mortgage, or at any time before the order for sale under the mortgage.

A mortgagee is a purchaser who will be protected as well as one who claims the legal title. Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C. 159. The assumption of an irrevocable liability is a sufficient consideration to support this defence. Pom. Eq. Jur., § 747. In cases where sureties take collaterals to secure and protect themselves, the sureties have a right to collect the securities and foreclose the mortgage before paying the debts. Hellams v. Abercrombie, 15 S. C. 110 [40 Am. Dec. 684]. A second purchaser without notice from a first purchaser with notice, will be protected. Pom. Eq. Jur., § 754; 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 308. The title now held by the defendant, Austin, must be referred to the mortgage, and is entitled to all the protection which a deed of that date would have given.

Besides all this, it seems to me that there has been great laches *on the part of all the plaintiffs in allowing this property to stand so long in the apparent ownership of William A. Hudson, by which means he has been able inextricably to involve innocent third parties in heavy losses, if it now turns out that he was not entitled to mortgage the land.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the complaint be dismissed with costs.

Mr. W. H. Irvine, for appellants.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, contra.

October 23, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for the recovery of a small tract of land, containing five acres. At one time it was the property of the late General Waddy Thompson, who, some time between March and November of the year 1850, conveyed this parcel as part of a larger tract to his son-in-law, John M. Jones, in trust for the sole use and benefit of his daughter, Eliza W., wife of the said Jones, and such issue as she might have at her death. But the precise terms of the deed are not known, as it was handed back to the donor, but not for the purpose of being cancelled. It was never returned or placed on record. On November 11, 1850, the said Thompson executed another deed of trust, whereby he gave to the said Jones in trust for the use and benefit of the said Eliza W. and her issue certain negro slaves, and also the lands above mentioned, but in referring to the lands he says: "For which I have already executed to her a deed of conveyance."

In December, 1851, the said Eliza W. Jones died, leaving as her only issue two daughters, the plaintiffs, Emmala B. and Elizabeth E. Jones, and on November 10, 1856, the said Waddy Thompson executed another deed, or declaration of trust, to the said Emmala B. and Elizabeth E. to said lands, to them and the heirs of their bodies living at their deaths, wherein he constituted himself the trustee. But this deed or declaration of trust was afterwards, in 1882, set aside by order of Judge Cothran, and "the first deed declared valid and of full force and effect."

*On January 27, 1867, the said John M. Jones, as trustee, instituted a proceeding against the said Emmala B. and Elizabeth E. Jones, his daughters, stating that said lands were unprofitable and failed to support his cestuis que trust, and praying that he be authorized and empowered to sell and dispose of any part of said lands for the uses and purposes therein mentioned. Elizabeth E. Jones, being a minor, was regularly represented by a guardian ad litem, and after reference and proper inquiry, the prayer of the petition was granted by Judge Orr, who passed an order February 3, 1869, giving the said John M. Jones, as trustee, "the power to sell and convey and make good titles to all or any portion of the said lands, and that the funds arising from any such sales shall be reinvested for the cestuis que trust, subject to the conditions in the original deeds," &c.

Under and by virtue of this order the said John M. Jones, as trustee, from time to time disposed of considerable portions of these lands, and by virtue thereof on June 5, 1872, executed to the defendant, Hudson, a deed of the five acres in dispute, expressed to be for the consideration of $105. This deed was regularly recorded July 8, 1872. Hudson, the donee, included this little tract in a mortgage given to Ann F. Hudson and William H. Austin August 11, 1877, to hold them harmless as his sureties on a certain bond. This mortgage was afterwards foreclosed by the sale of the lands, and at that sale the defendant, William H. Austin, became the purchaser of the five acres aforesaid.

Conceding this perfect chain of paper title from John M. Jones as trustee, the plaintiffs, Emmala B. and Elizabeth E. Jones, daughters of the trustee, claimed that their father, John M. Jones, had no right as trustee to sell the land; but if he had, that the conveyance by him to Hudson was in fact only a mortgage to secure the $105, and that the mortgagees, Ann F. Hudson and William H. Austin, had notice of that fact; and that in October, 1883, before this suit was brought, the said John M. Jones tendered to the said William A. Hudson, the aforesaid $105, and the interest thereon, and therefore they were entitled to recover the said tract of land. At the time John M. Jones executed the deed to Hudson, something was said about the conveyance being a mortgage to secure the aforesaid $105.

*The evidence is not in the Brief, but the master, S. J. Douthitt, Esq., made a full and exhaustive report, in which he says that "John M. Jones being pressed for money to pay the taxes on the real estate which he held in trust for his daughters, endeavored to borrow money of the defendant Hudson on a mortgage of a portion of said lands. Hudson declined to loan on a mortgage, but agreed to let him have $100 if he would execute and deliver to him a deed of the land in question, which Jones finally agreed to. Hudson, on June 5, let him have $100, and charged him $5 for surveying the land and drawing the papers, and on the same day Jones, as trustee, executed and delivered to Hudson a deed to said land in consideration of $105. Hudson, at the same time, gave Jones an instrument of writing whereby he stipulated and agreed that if Jones paid him $105 in thirty days thereafter, he would not place said deed on record, but would reconvey the land to him. Jones did not pay the money within the thirty days, and the deed was put on record, as stated, July 8, 1872.

* * * At the time the mortgage was executed to Austin and Ann F. Hudson, they had no notice that Jones claimed that said deed was a mortgage," &c. The master further states that Jones testified that he had given Austin notice of the claim that the deed to Hudson was only a mortgage, but that this was denied by Austin. It was not, however, alleged that such notice was given at or before the time the mortgage was executed, nor even before the decree of foreclosure, but on the very morning of the sale, ordered in the decree of foreclosure.

The cause came on for trial by Judge Fraser, who ruled that William A. Hudson held under a legal title, valid on its face and duly recorded: that even if the conveyance, absolute in form, was really a mortgage between the original parties, neither William H. Austin nor Ann F. Hudson had any notice of the alleged equities of the plaintiffs at the time they took their mortgage, or at any time before the order for sale under the mortgage, and therefore Austin, the purchaser at the sale, was a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration: and dismissed the complaint. From this decree the plaintiffs appeal upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his honor erred in finding as a fact that Austin had no notice of the nature of the transaction as to the transfer of the land from Jones to Hudson, when the proof seems convincing that Austin was specifically notified of the nature and particulars of said transaction, and that the conveyance was intended merely as a security for a loan, and that Austin purchased with full knowledge of the rights and equities of the plaintiffs.

2. "Because his honor erred in holding that it would now be too late for Emmala B. and Elizabeth E. Jones to claim as against strangers dealing with the property, when the proof shows that neither of said parties signed said conveyance to Hudson, nor knew of the subsequent possession of the land by Hudson, or of his mortgaging it to Ann F. Hudson and Austin, until a few weeks before the commencement of this suit.

3. "Because it was error to hold that John Jones was authorized to sell the land under the order of the Court of Common Pleas, February 6, 1869, whether the said Jones reinvested the fund or not.

4. "Because the said Jones, under the deed of General Thompson creating the trust, was trustee only during the life of his wife, Eliza Jones, who died on December 8, 1854. His trusteeship, therefore, terminated long prior to the transaction with Hudson.

5. "Because the conveyance by Jones to Hudson, being in reality only a mortgage, and intended by the parties as such, and Hudson having knowledge of the way in which Jones intended applying the money advanced by him, vitiated the transaction for all purposes whatever.

6. "Because the decree is in other respects contrary to the law and justice and the evidence of the case."

The objection is made in the first place, that John M. Jones was not trustee at all, and had no right whatever to sell and convey the land. In disposing of property, the first bona fide deed is irrevocable, and gives it beyond the reach of subsequent attempted modifications by the donor. By the first deed of General Thompson, signed, sealed, and delivered, although afterwards mislaid, John M. Jones was appointed trustee and the rights of the parties fixed. Whatever may have been the precise terms of that deed, not clearly known, the matter was brought before the court in 1869, and Judge Orr made an order which recognized John M. Jones as trustee, and expressly empowered him "to sell and convey and execute good and sufficient title to all or any portion of the tract of land referred to in the trust deed as in his judgment may be to the interest of the cestuis que trust," &c.

This order was made in a case in which all the parties were before the court; indeed, it was made at the instance of John M. Jones, expressly for the benefit of the other plaintiffs. It was made after proper reference and inquiry, was never appealed from, but acquiesced in from that time (1869) until this action was brought in 1883, a period of more than ten years. Under these circumstances, it must be considered that the order was tantamount to a new arrangement by the parties themselves. It is true, as argued, that the daughters did not actually sign the deed to Hudson, but the order, by which they were bound, gave their father the right to sell for them. Through this order they held out in the most solemn manner that John M. Jones was trustee, with the right to sell and make good titles; and we agree with the Circuit Judge that it is now too late for them to aver against it, or to disturb rights bona fide acquired under it. See McNish v. Guerd, 4 Strob. Eq., 78.

It does not appear that the proceeds of sale were reinvested as directed by the order. But that duty was imposed upon the trustee, and we do not understand that the performance of it by him was a condition precedent to the validity of the conveyance. It seems that the money was needed to pay the taxes due on the trust property. As a general rule, certainly it is not the duty of a purchaser from a trustee, with power to sell and make title, to see to the application of the proceeds. See Living v. Peyton, 2 De Saus., 375; Redheimer v. Pyron, Speers Eq., 134; Laurens v. Lucas, 6 Rich. Eq., 217. Assuming, then, that Jones was trustee, and had the power to sell, it follows that the legal title passed from him to Hudson, and thence to Austin, through the mortgage and the foreclosure sale under it.

But it is earnestly urged that the transaction between Jones and Hudson was not an absolute conveyance of the land, but a mortgage to secure the payment of money advanced.

ed. and the *plaintiffs are entitled to have it so declared, and upon the payment of the debt and interest secured (which was tendered before the action was commenced), they may redeem the land. It is not at all clear that at this late day, after such laches, the plaintiffs could establish any such right against the defendant Hudson. The money was to be returned within a certain time, which was not done. But if the plaintiffs had such right against Hudson, it does not follow that they have the same right as against all persons holding under him. Innocent parties, in ignorance of the facts which constituted the secret vice, may have become involved. The right supposed to have existed against Hudson was a mere equity, arising from his knowledge of certain facts, but that equity cannot prevail against a purchaser of the legal title without notice of those facts. The plea of purchaser without notice is a counter and higher equity. "If a second purchaser for value and without notice purchases from a first purchaser who is charged with notice, he thereby becomes a bona fide purchaser and is entitled to protection." Pom. Eq. Jur., § 754; Story Eq., § 407. And see Black v. Childs, 14 S. C., 312; Dopson v. Harley [6 Rich. Eq. 176, note], reported in a note to Brown v. Wood, 6 Rich. Eq., 176, in which Chancellor Johnstone says: "Whenever, in tracing a title in defendants, you come upon an innocent purchaser having no notice, from that moment the title is considered secure in equity; under which principle, a purchaser with notice from one without notice is protected in this court."

Did Austin have notice of the secret vice, the alleged agreement between Jones and Hudson, that the conveyance, absolute in form, was in fact merely a mortgage to secure the money advanced? The testimony is not in the Brief, but both the master and the Circuit Judge concurred in finding that he did not. The defeasance given by Hudson was never recorded, while the deed absolute in form was on the record. Hudson was in possession, using the land as his own, and had been for eight years. There is no allegation even that Ann F. Hudson and the defendant Austin had notice, when they took their mortgage from William A. Hudson, on August 11, 1877, or when the decree of foreclosure was rendered, or at any time before the morning of *the day (sales-day, July, 1880) on which the land was sold by order of the court.

Even if there was no conflict in the testimony as to what occurred on that occasion, and notice of the claim of Jones as to the mortgage was then given to Austin, we think it came too late, and was not sufficient. "A mortgagee of lands is a purchaser within the meaning of the rule which protects a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice." Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C., 159. "Where the defeasance is not recorded, the obvious effect of the record of the deed alone is to make the grantee the apparent absolute owner of the estate, and the person who holds the defeasance may be barred of all right of redemption by a sale by the mortgagee to one who buys in good faith and without notice of such defeasance. As to third persons, the absolute conveyance is not defeated or affected unless the defeasance is also recorded." 1 Jones Mort., §§ 548 and 549.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

FARR v. GILREATH.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Wills ⇨681.]

A testator by his will declared: "I give unto my son R., in trust for my daughter M., the lots that I live on in the town of G. If my daughter M. should die leaving no child, it is my wish that her trustee should sell the property in his hands and divide the proceeds of the same equally between my surviving children, or the heirs of their bodies. But in case she should have a child or children, and they live to come of age, then the property belongs to the child or children at the death of their mother." Held, from the intent of the testator and the duties imposed upon the trustee, that the fee in these lots of land was devised directly to the trustee, and that the trust was not executed.

[2. Wills ⇨634.]

The interest here given to testator's "surviving children" was a contingent remainder.

[3. Wills ⇨693.]

Upon the happening of the contingency, the surviving children were not entitled to the land itself, but to "the proceeds of the same." The land then became personalty, and these remaindermen, having no title thereto, could not recover it from one to whom the trustee had con*veyed; but if such conveyance was void, they might follow the land, as impressed with a trust, into the hands of the purchaser, and demand a sale, so that they might receive the proceeds.

Contingent remaindermen in esse and without reach are necessary parties to a proceeding to sell the land in which they have such an interest, and if not parties, they are not bound by the judgment. *Moseley v. [6. Wills ⚭693.]

The daughter M., a paralytic and childless widow, filed her bill against R., the trustee, to require the sale of this property, the income from which was alleged to be inadequate to her support, and to reinvest the proceeds. The court so ordered, and the trustee sold. Held, that the postponement by testator of the sale until M.'s death being wholly for her benefit, the power of sale given by the will to the trustee might be accelerated by the tenant for life, and she having, by her proceedings in court, substantially joined with the trustee in his sale and deed, the purchaser took a good title under this power.

One of the remaindermen having instituted an action against the trustee to recover a portion of the proceeds of the property so sold, and having received a portion, she thereby elected to confirm the sale.

[This case is also cited in Mauldin v. Mauldin, 85 S. E. 61, as to facts.]

Before Fraser, J., Greenville, July, 1884.

The case is thus stated by the master:

The master, to whom it was referred to take the testimony in the above entitled action and return the same to the court, together with his conclusions of fact therefrom, and also his conclusions of law, with leave to report any special matter, begs leave to report that he has held references and taken the testimony herewith filed, and from the same he respectfully submits the following report. As conclusions of fact, he finds—

1. That Dr. Burwell Chick departed this life in 1847, leaving his last will and testament in full force and effect, in the fourth clause of which he gave to his son, Reuben S. Chick, in trust for his daughter, Maria H. Thompson, among other things, the property in dispute; and in the twelfth clause of his will he *says: "If my daughter, Maria H. Thompson, should die leaving no child, it is my wish that her trustee should sell the property in his hands and divide the proceeds of the same equally between my surviving children or the heirs of their bodies. But in case she should have a child or children, and they live to come of age, then the property belongs to the child or children at the death of their mother."

2. The said Reuben S. Chick accepted said trust and the real estate mentioned in the fourth clause of said will remained in his possession undisturbed until November 3, 1871, when the said Maria H. Thompson instituted a proceeding in this court against her said trustee, and him only, demanding, for certain reasons therein mentioned, that said real estate, or a portion thereof, be sold. The matter was referred to a special referee, and on the coming in of his report, the court ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that said real estate be sold by said trustee on the terms specified in said decree; and further ordered, that before the first installment fell due, or before it was collected, that the trustee give a bond in the sum of four thousand dollars to the clerk of this court for the faithful performance of his duties in the discharge of his trust.

3. In pursuance of said decree, the trustee, on March 4, 1872, sold said real estate at public outcry, and on March 22, 1873, filed his bond, duly approved, with the clerk, as required by said decree.

4. At the sale of said real estate a portion thereof was purchased by one A. L. Herron, who was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt, and the real estate purchased by him was sold by his assignee on January 8, 1877, in three separate parcels, and the lot in controversy was purchased by the defendants, who paid the said assignee for the same.

5. Reuben S. Chick departed this life in 1877, and subsequently thereto Pettus W. Chick was appointed trustee of the said Maria H. Thompson, and assumed charge of the trust estate. The said Pettus W. Chick died, and some time thereafter the said Maria H. Thompson instituted a proceeding in the Court *of Common Pleas for Newberry County against Sarah E. Chick, as executrix of Reuben S. Chick, and Betsy Chick, as executrix of Pettus W. Chick, demanding an accounting of them for the trust estate which went into the possession of their respective testators. On hearing the pleading in the said cause, the court, on June 5, 1879, ordered the said Sarah E. Chick to turn over to the master of Newberry County, as receiver, all choses in action and evidences of indebtedness belonging to said trust estate. The complaint in this cause was amended on August 4, 1879, making Wilhelmina B. Chaplin, Louisa V. Farr, and Caroline Hodges, who were the remaindermen, parties defendant. On February 14, 1880, under this proceeding, W. A. McDaniel was appointed trustee of said trust estate,

*This fourth clause was as follows: "I give unto my son, Reuben S. Chick, in trust for my daughter, Maria H. Thompson, the following property, to wit, Harry, Lewis, John, Judy, and her children, Martha and Willis, Tilda and her child Sofa, negro slaves; also the lots that I live on in the town of Greenville; also the tract of land I bought of D. Goodlett, laying on Richland Creek."—REPORTER.

who filed his bond and assumed the duties of trustee in July, 1880. Maria H. Thompson died on August 2, 1882, and Louisa V. Farr was appointed administratrix of her estate, and as such she was, on November 28, 1882, substituted as plaintiff in the case, which is still pending.

6. On October 5, 1880, Louisa V. Farr filed her complaint against Thomas S. Moorman, as executor of Elizabeth D. Chick, deceased (who was executrix of Reuben S. Chick), Wilhelmina B. Chaplin, and others, in which reference is made to the trust estate of Maria H. Thompson, by saying that the estate of Reuben S. Chick is responsible therefor.

7. Under this proceeding, a receiver was appointed for the estate of Reuben S. Chick, who filed a creditor's bill, and an order was passed requiring the creditors of Reuben S. Chick to establish their claims before him as master for this court. In pursuance of this order, W. A. McDaniel, as trustee, presented the claim of the trust estate, but the same has never been fully established, owing to an accounting yet to be had in the case first above mentioned. The suits are still pending.

Out of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate of the said A. L. Herron, bankrupt, his assignee, by order of court, paid over to the executrix of Reuben S. Chick one thousand dollars, and to Messrs. Earle & Blythe, attorneys for Maria H. Thompson, six hundred dollars. He also advanced to the said Maria H. Thompson three hundred and fifty dollars to pay for a lot of *land, and took a mortgage thereon to secure the same. He also let her have eighteen 20-100 dollars to pay for sash and blinds for a house built on said lot, and advanced to her in cash fifteen dollars. The balance remaining in his hands as assignee, to wit, seven hundred and thirty-eight 91-100 dollars, he paid over to W. A. McDaniel as trustee, out of which the said trustee paid to Louisa V. Farr, one of the plaintiffs herein, the sum of two hundred and thirty-seven 50-100 dollars, on account of her share in said trust estate, and for which he took two separate receipts. He also paid on account of the burial expense of the said Maria H. Thompson ninety-three 80-100 dollars, which was done at the instance of Louisa V. Farr, and who agreed that if the other parties in interest did not assent to it, she would be responsible for the same. The balance of the money is still in the hands of the said W. A. McDaniel as trustee.

8. When the property was sold by Reuben S. Chick as trustee, that portion of it purchased by the said A. L. Herron was in a dilapidated condition, and one hundred and fifty dollars a year would have been a fair rental for it. After Herron bought, he spent at least one thousand dollars on that portion now owned by the defendant in the way of improvements and thereby improved it considerably, and since it was purchased by the defendant two hundred and fifty dollars a year would be a fair rental for it.

9. The defendant paid a fair price for the property, and thought the title to it was good. He has also improved the property considerably.

10. Reuben S. Chick, Pettus W. Chick, and Maria H. Thompson all died leaving no issue of their bodies, and Louisa V. Farr, Wilhelmina B. Chaplin, and Caroline Hodges were the only children of Dr. Burwell Chick who survived Maria H. Thompson. Caroline Hodges has since died leaving no issue of her body, but left her last will and testament, executed in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, which was admitted to probate in the State of Arkansas, where she resided at the time of her death. In her said will the said Caroline Hodges bequeathed her entire estate, both real and personal, to her husband, Asa Hodges, one of the plaintiffs herein.

As matters of law the master finds:

*1. That under the 4th and 12th clauses of the will of Dr. Burwell Chick, deceased, the trustee, Reuben S. Chick, was clothed with the legal fee in the lot of land in dispute. It was not simply a power of sale, but a devise of the fee for the purpose of the sale. Executors of Ware v. Murph. Rice, 55 [33 Am. Dec. 97]; 2 Jarm. Wills, *295, and notes.

2. That under the 12th clause of said will the remaindermen took no interest whatever in said land as land, but only in the proceeds. It was a case of equitable conversion. Perry v. Logan, 5 Rich. Eq., 202.

3. That the plaintiff, Louisa V. Farr, having received a part of her share in the proceeds of the land, has made her election, and there can be no reconversion, for where the direction is to convert land into money, one co-owner cannot elect to take his share in land; all must elect or none. Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq., 659.

4. That the surviving children of Dr. Burwell Chick took, under the 12th clause of his will, a remainder dependent upon a double contingency, first, upon the failure of the life-tenant to have a child living to attain the age of twenty-one years; and, second, upon their surviving the life-tenant; and this remainder never became vested until after the sale of the land, and attached to the proceeds.

5. That in the case of Maria H. Thompson against Reuben S. Chick, trustee, the court certainly had jurisdiction; that it also had before it all parties necessary for the purposes of the suit. The trustee represented the legal title, and the court acted upon that, and the sale under its decree passed a good fee simple title to the purchaser, which has been duly transmitted for valuable consideration to the defendant herein. Van Lew v. Parr, 2

Rich. Eq., 321; Rofil v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq., 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627]; Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., 475. The case seems to have been carefully considered and the discretion of the court wisely exercised.

6. The equities of the defendant are at least as high as those of the plaintiffs. The purchaser at the sale paid a full price, and, relying upon his title, greatly improved the property. The defendant succeeded to all of his equities, and has himself made improvements. The plaintiffs have the fund and the bond of the trustee to look to; the defendant has nothing, and where equities are equal, the law will prevail. Therefore the legal title of the defendant must stand. The master therefore concludes as matter of law, that the plaintiffs can take nothing by their suit.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

It is not necessary to consider whether the plaintiffs or any of them have received any portion of the fund arising from the sale of the land, of which they now complain, or are now pursuing in another action against the trustee and his sureties, or their representatives, the fund arising from said sale.

The leading question in the case is as to the validity of a sale of this land by the trustee under an order of this court, made under proceedings commenced November 3, 1871, and in which only the trustee and the tenant for life were made parties. The quantity and quality of the interests in the land will be determined by a proper construction of the 4th and 12th clauses of the will of Burwell Chick, which are set out in the report. I have examined very carefully the authorities which have been cited in argument of the cases. The time at my disposal will not permit me to enter into any elaborate review of them, and I do not know that it will be profitable to do so. I will therefore state my conclusions as briefly as I can.

"The power of the court to sell trust estates is not doubted." Gibbes v. Holmes, 10 Rich. Eq., 491. The interest of these plaintiffs under these clauses of the will was not vested, but contingent. The distinction as laid down by Mr. Justice McIver in Faber v. Pollee, 10 S. C., 387, is "that in the one case the right to the estate is fixed and certain, though the right to the possession is deferred to some future period; while in the other the right to the estate as well as the right to the possession of such estate is not only deferred to a future period, but is dependent upon the happening of a future contingency." If the life-tenant died leaving no child, then these plaintiffs would take, otherwise not; and their interest under this will was certainly a contingent one when this sale was made during the life of Mrs. Thompson.

Under a will, the word heir is not necessary to carry the fee, and the devise to the trustee was sufficient of itself to give him the fee in this land; and if it were not, the power to sell was sufficient, and would have been sufficient even under a deed, on the ground that equity always enlarges the estate of the trustee so as to make it sufficient to support the trusts. There is nothing in the will which gives these plaintiffs any legal estate in the land. They had an interest only in the proceeds of sale, and the trustee held the fee. When the Court of Equity exercises its jurisdiction, to direct a sale of land held in trust, all that is necessary to make a valid title under its order is to have the fee represented, and even the first remainderman in fee is sufficient.

In Williman v. Holmes, supra, 493, Chancellor Dargan, in summing up the authorities, thus announces the principle: "That where the person entitled to the first estate of inheritance is a party before the court, he is to be regarded as the representative of all those contingent interests which are dependent and are to succeed his estate; and, consequently, a decree against such a party will affect and bind those who succeed him." In the case in which that order was made, which is here claimed to be invalid, the whole fee was represented by the trustee. This would have been sufficient before the code, which has, as it were, reaffirmed the rule in section 134, which gives a trustee of an express trust the right to sue, "without joining the persons for whose benefit the action is brought," and the same rule must necessarily apply to defendants. The case of Hodges v. Chick (10 Rich. Eq., 178) does not touch the question raised here. In that case there was some question as to the distribution of the proceeds of sale made by the trustee under the power of sale given by the will, and in the settlement of that all the parties interested in the fund had a right to be heard.

I therefore hold that the sale of the land claimed in this action under the order of the court, above referred to, was valid, and passed the whole fee to the purchaser, who took the land freed and discharged of all claims in favor of these plaintiffs.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the exceptions be overruled, and report of the master confirmed, and that the complaint be dismissed with costs to be paid by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed on the following exceptions:

*1. Because, it is respectfully submitted, that his honor erred in holding that the sale of the land claimed in this action under the order of the court, made under proceedings commenced November 3, 1871, by Maria H. Thompson against Reuben S. Chick, her trustee, was valid, and passed the whole fee to the purchaser, who took the land freed and discharged of all claims in favor of the plaintiffs.

2. Because his honor erred in holding that under the will of Burwell Chick there is nothing which gives the plaintiffs any legal estate in the land in question, and that they had an interest only in the proceeds of sale, and that the trustee held the fee.

3. Because that his honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs in this action, who were interested, were not necessary parties to the said snit of Maria H. Thompson against Reuben S. Chick, and that the tenant for life and the trustee, Reuben S. Chick, were the only necessary and proper parties to said snit.

Messrs. Stokes & Irvine, G. M. Chaplin, and Clark & Williams, for appellants.

Messrs. T. Q. and A. H. Donaldson, Perry & Heyward, and Wells & Orr, contra.

October 23, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was brought to recover possession of a half acre lot in the city of Greenville. The testimony is not in the Brief, but the report of master Douthit is so full and clear that it will only be necessary to give such an outline as will make the opinion intelligible.

* * * * *

Considering, as we should, the fourth and twelfth clauses of the will together, and making a small transposition by placing the last paragraph of clause twelve in its natural and proper position as part of the disposing clause, the whole provision would read as follows: "I give unto my son, Reuben S. Chick, in trust for my daughter, Maria H. Thompson, and at her death to such child or children as may live to come of age, the following property, &c. But if my said daughter should die leaving no child, it is my wish that her trustee should sell the property in his hands and divide the proceeds of the same equally between my surviving children or the heirs of their bodies," &c. It is manifest that Mrs. Thompson and her children were naturally the first objects of the testator's bounty, and the provision that, in case of her death without a child, the property should be sold and the proceeds equally divided among his other surviving children, was merely secondary. Keeping this in view, it seems to us that several points contested are so clear as to make it unnecessary to enter into the intricate and involved doctrines of contingent and springing uses mooted in the learned argument at the bar.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the testator intended to dispose of his whole interest in the property, leaving no part of it intestate. We think that such intention was effectually carried out, and that the fee in the land was devised directly to the trustee. It is true that the word "heirs" is not used, but our statute (Gen. Stat., § 1861) makes the use of words of limitation in a will unnecessary. Every devise shall be considered as a gift in fee simple, unless such a construction be inconsistent with the will of the testator, expressed or implied.

But apart from the statute, the rule is that lands devised to a trustee, upon certain trusts, gives such estate as is commensurate with the purposes of the trust. The duties imposed upon this trustee made the fee necessary to support them. He was required to hold the title for Mrs. Thompson during her life, and if she died without children, "to sell the property in his hands and divide the proceeds equally," &c. The trust was by no means a naked power to sell, but a devise of the property to the trustee for certain purposes, and in one event (which has happened) to sell and distribute the proceeds, &c. "The distinction is between a devise to executors to sell, as if the testator says: 'I devise my land to my executor to be sold;' and a devise that the executor shall sell, as when the testator says: 'I desire or direct that my lands be sold by my executors.' In the first case the fee passes to the executors; in the last the fee passes to the heir, to be divested whenever the power is executed by the executors." Executors of Ware v. Murph, Rice, 55 [33 Am. Dec. 97]; 3 Jarm. Wills (5 Am. edit.) 52, 53, and notes.

*Nor do we think that the trusts were executed by the statute of uses. A passive trust, or one where the trustee has no active duty imposed upon him, is executed by the statute of uses; but the statute does not execute the trust in case there is some duty to be performed or act to be done by the trustee, made necessary by the scheme of the will, and for the performance of which it is necessary that the legal estate should not pass from the trustee by operation of the statute. Willman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., 475; Iorr v. Hodges, Speers Eq., 593; 3 Jarman, 52, and notes. Or, as stated by Chancellor Harper in Posey v. Cook (1 Hill, 413): "Perhaps the rule might be more accurately expressed to say that where the intention is that the estate shall not be executed in the cestui qui use, and any object is to be effected by its remaining in the trustee, then it shall not be executed," &c. Besides, as to the interest of these plaintiffs, the property was to be considered more personally, as we shall see hereafter.

We cannot doubt that the interest of the plaintiffs, under the will of their father, Dr. Chick, was contingent. As to the character of the interests, it seems to us that the case of Faber v. Police (10 S. C., 376), cited in the decree below, is absolutely conclusive. It was there held that "a devise to trustees for the use of A. during his life, and after his death in trust for his lawful issue living at the time of his death, and if he should die leaving no issue (there being none), then over to his residuary devisees and legatees, gives to the remaindermen not a vested, but a contingent remainder." Considered at the time of the testator's death, when the will took effect, the interests of the plaintiffs were dependent upon a double contingency: First, that Mrs. Thompson should die without children; and, second, that the remaindermen should survive her. It cannot be necessary upon this point to do more than quote a portion of Mr. Justice Melver's remarks in the case of Faber v. Police: "According to the elementary writers a vested remainder is one which is limited to an ascertained person in being, whose right to the estate is fixed and certain, and does not depend upon the happening of any future event, but whose enjoyment in possession is postponed to some future time. A contingent remainder, on the other hand, is one which is limited to a person not in being, or not *ascertained; or if limited to an ascertained person, it is so limited that his right to the estate depends upon some contingency in the future. So that the most marked distinction between the two kinds of remainders is, that in the one case the right to the estate is fixed and certain, though the right to the possession is deferred to some future period; while in the other the right to the estate, as well as the right to the possession of such estate is not only deferred to a future period, but is dependent upon the happening of some future contingency." &c.

It will be observed that in no event is the land itself devised to the plaintiffs, but "the proceeds" of sale directed to be made by the trustee. In such case it is well settled that, by the equitable doctrine of constructive conversion, the property is considered as personalty, and not as realty. "Money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and land directed to be sold and turned into money, are to be considered as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted, and this in whatever manner the direction is given. * * * It follows, therefore, that any person claiming property under a will or settlement directing its conversion must take it in the character which such instrument has impressed on it, and its subsequent devolution and disposition will be governed by the rules applicable to property of this kind," &c. 2 Jarm. Wills (5 Am. edit.) 170, and notes, where all the authorities are collected; and among them Perry v. Logan, 5 Rich. Eq., 202.

We do not consider this as one of the cases in which the beneficiaries may elect to take the property in specie which was ordered to be sold. Not to advert to the fact that there has already been "a de facto" conversion the general rule is, that where the conversion is imperatively directed, it is regarded as taking place at the time of the testator's death, although the time fixed by him for the sale for that purpose be distant. The words of the will: "It is my wish that her trustee shall sell the property in his hands and distribute the proceeds equally," &c., amount to a positive direction that in the event contemplated, the property should not go over in specie, but be converted at all events "out and out." Mathis v. Gudlin, 8 Rich. Eq., 79; Wilkins v. Taylor, Id., 291; North v. Valk, Dudley's Eq., 212. The lands, as such, were *not devised to the plaintiffs, but the proceeds thereof as personalty, and therefore they are not devisees, but legatees. Having no title to the land itself, they cannot at law recover it from Gilreath, the defendant, who is in possession with the legal title from the trustee. So far as the recovery of the land is concerned, this would seem to be conclusive against the plaintiffs.

But it is urged that even if the claim of the plaintiffs is a mere equity for an account of the proceeds of sale, yet as cestuis que trust they may come into court to have the land now sold in order to get at "the proceeds;" that the sale made prematurely during the life of Mrs. Thompson being void, and the order of the court not binding on them, as they were not parties to the proceeding, they may follow the land into the possession of a purchaser at that void sale, who, though having the legal title from the trustee, purchased with constructive notice of the will containing the trust, which still attaches to the land. This makes the question whether the sale made under the orders of the court in the case of Thompson v. Chick, Trustee, is binding upon the plaintiffs, who were not made parties. The sale was after due notice, open, fair, and for full value. There is no reason to doubt that the parties acted in good faith without suspecting any defect. It was what is known as a judicial sale, in which the court is, in some sense, the vendor. From the confidence which the public reposes in the judgments of the courts, which should not be lightly weakened, it is wise policy to sustain such sales when it can be done without violating principle or doing injustice. It is true, there are some cases in which the judgment of the court operates on the property itself, in rem, without any nice regard to the parties personally before the court, but such cases are exceptional. The general rule certainly is, that those who are not parties are not bound by the judgment.

This court has lately held in the case of Moseley v. Hankinson, Trustee (22 S. C., 323), that contingent remaindermen in esse and within reach, are necessary parties to a proceeding to sell land. It is true, in that case the interest of the remaindermen was in the land itself, which was the subject of the proceeding, while in this they only have an interest in the proceeds, after sale by the trustee. But, in respect to the necessity of the *remaindermen being parties, we cannot see such a distinction between the cases as would warrant us in holding differently in this case. As we understand it, the rule proceeds on the general principle that all persons in esse should be made parties who have a substantial interest in the subject matter, without reference to what may be the precise character of that interest.

The case at bar, however, does differ from that of Moseley v. Hankinson in one important particular. In that case Fortune, the trustee, had no power to sell; and of course the sale rested solely on the order of the court, which was held not to bar the remaindermen who were not made parties. But in this case the will gave the trustee express power to sell, which he could exercise without any authority whatever from the court. The trustee did make the sale, which was in all respects according to the express terms of the trust, except that it was made during the life of Mrs. Thompson, instead of at her death. Leaving out of view entirely the order of the court, this scintilla of irregularity is the sole ground relied upon to avoid the sale and recover the land, with all the improvements which have been placed upon it.

No doubt the general principle is, that such powers must be strictly executed, but there is one rule of interpretation which, as it seems to us, covers the case, and was not referred to by the Circuit Judge, probably for the reason that, in his view, it was unnecessary. Mr. Perry lays it down as follows: "A power of sale, like all other powers, can be executed only in the mode and manner prescribed in the instrument of trust, as where the trust is to sell after the death of the tenant for life, * * * a sale before the time is bad, although made by the decree of the court or act of the legislature. But the execution of the power of sale may be accelerated by the tenant for life surrendering the life estate, or by joining with the trustee in effecting the conveyance; for the postponement of the sale being for the benefit of the tenant for life, such tenant may, by executing the deed of conveyance, waive such benefit. If, however, the postponement of the sale is not for the benefit of the tenant for life, but for the benefit of the remaindermen, as by preserving real security for them, or with the expectation of securing a rise in value for them, the sale of the estate cannot be accelerated, even with the concurrence of the tenant for life." See 2 Perry Trusts (3d edit.), § 783, and authorities in notes.

In regard to the intention of the testator on the point indicated, we have no doubt whatever. As we construe the will, Mrs. Thompson was the first object of the testator's bounty, and the postponement of the sale of the land until her death was entirely for her benefit, and without reference to enhancing the value of the limitation over to the remaindermen, who were only secondary, and might never take. It is manifest that the testator intended Mrs. Thompson to enjoy the property in specie during her life, but in case she should die without child or children, that it should never pass over in that form to the remaindermen. The sale was made in the life-time of Mrs. Thompson, at her earnest request and for her benefit, in fact, to enable her to live on the interest of the purchase money, which, being a feeble lady, she could not do on the land itself, as she could not make it remunerative.

It is true that Mrs. Thompson did not actually sign the deed to the purchaser, but in instituting the proceedings for its sale, she did what, in our judgment, was equivalent to it. She consented to the sale and urged it, and in so doing substantially joined with the trustee in executing the deed of conveyance, which, under the rule above stated, amounted to a waiver of her exclusive right to enjoy the land in specie, and accelerated the execution of the power of sale. The life tenant waived the peculiar privilege given to her by the testator, and concurred in making title to the purchaser; the effect of which was to allow the sale at an earlier day, and the plaintiffs, more remotely connected with the property, have no just cause to complain, but must be remitted to the proceeds of sale.

Indeed, so far as Mrs. Farr is concerned, we agree with the master that she elected to confirm the sale made when she instituted proceedings to recover the purchase money, and actually received a part of it. "So an acceptance of part of the purchase money by the cestui que trust may be a confirmation of a sale made in breach of the trust," &c. 2 Perry Trusts, § 852, and notes.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

23 S. C. *517

*BLAKE v. WALKER.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Municipal Corporations ⚡57.]

The City Council of Spartanburg, as a municipal corporation, has no powers except such as are conferred by its charter in express terms, or such as are necessary to carry out the powers granted, excepting (if, indeed, it be an exception) the inherent power in all elective bodies of judging of the qualification and election of their members.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in City of Florence v. Brown, 49 S. C. 334, 26 S. E. 880, 27 S. E. 273; Luther v. Wheeler, 73 S. C. 90, 52 S. E. 874, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 746.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 148; Dec. Dig. ⚡57.]

[2. Intoxicating Liquors ⚡36.]

Under the local option law (Gen. Stat., § 1753), all elections are to be conducted according to the law governing municipal elections in the town or city where held; and under the charter of the city of Spartanburg (17 Stat., 435, § 5), the managers are to count the votes and declare the election, such managers to be appointed by the council "to conduct the election." Therefore, the declaration by the managers of the result of a local option election could not be reviewed by the City Council.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 44; Dec. Dig. ☞ 36; Elections, Cent. Dig. § 208½.]

[3. Intoxicating Liquors ☞ 36.]

The act of 1868 (14 Stat., 108), authorizing an ultimate decision of municipal elections by boards of aldermen, cannot apply here, as there was no contest before the managers; and that act having been dropped from the General Statutes of 1872, is not now law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 44; Dec. Dig. ☞ 36.]

[4. Intoxicating Liquors ☞ 36.]

The council here were required to act upon the declaration of the result by the managers, and not upon the determination by the council of how the majority voted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 44; Dec. Dig. ☞ 36; Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 702.]

[5. Intoxicating Liquors ☞ 36.]

The conduct of an election does not literally include a declaration of the result, but the word "conducted" in the local option law had a wider meaning, and in its application to the city of Spartanburg was intended to embrace also a declaration of the result.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sezars v. Parrott, 54 S. C. 36, 31 S. E. 677, 865.

[This case is also cited in Maxwell v. Tolly, 26 S. C. 80, 1 S. E. 160, without specific application.]

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, December, 1884.

The appeal in this case was from the following interlocutory order of injunction:

The complaint in this action alleges, in substance, that under an act approved February 9, 1882, and entitled "An act to provide a local option law for the incorporated cities, towns, and villages of this State," a number of citizens of the city of Spartanburg, equal to one-third of the number of votes cast in the next preceding municipal election in that city, signed a petition and delivered it to the City Council, in which they asked that the question of "license" or "no license" should be submitted to an election by the voters of the city. In accordance with the prayer of the petition, the election was ordered to be held on November 29, ensuing, and three managers were appointed by the City Council to conduct it. The election was held at the time appointed, and upon the closing of the polls the managers proceeded immediately to count the votes. They found in the ballot-box and counted 336 for "no license" and 334 for "license," and declared the election in favor of "no license" accordingly. They notified the mayor of this result and adjourned.

The complaint further alleges that notwithstanding these facts, the mayor and aldermen proceeded on December 5, next, after November 29, 1884, on which day the said election was held, to pass an ordinance for issuing licenses for the sale of spirituous and malt liquors for the year 1885, and that under said ordinance did issue licenses to several persons to sell liquor in the city. The object of the complaint is to obtain a judgment of the court, that the City Council be enjoined from granting further licenses, and that the persons to whom licenses have been granted be restrained from selling liquor under them.

A motion was made by plaintiffs' counsel for an order requiring the defendants to show cause why they should not be enjoined from proceeding to grant licenses under the ordinance above referred to. The motion was granted, and the defendants made return on the day fixed in the order, viz., December 29, last past. They say in substance, that after the election ordered by them on the question of "license" or "no license" had been held, and the result had been certified to them by the managers, a petition signed by certain electors of the city and sworn to was presented to the council, in which it was alleged that at the said election certain persons named in the petition, who were not qualified voters of the city, had been allowed to vote; and, therefore, the petitioners prayed that the City Council would investigate the election. In pursuance of the prayer of this petition, the council heard evidence touching the allegations contained in the paper, and after full hearing adjudged and determined that a majority of the voters of the city had voted in favor of "license." That the City Council then passed the ordinance providing for granting licenses, and did grant licenses to sell liquor to their co-defendants herein. The return of the defendants other than the

City Council rest, in their return, upon essentially the same grounds as the City Council.

It appears from the foregoing statement that the plaintiffs claim that the declaration by the managers of the election was final, and bound the City Council; and that the defendants claim that the City Council had the legal right to investigate the election, and thus ascertain the true result and declare it as they found the facts to be. Thus the leading question in the case is evolved. Was the declaration of the election by the managers final and conclusive? or did the City Council have the legal right to investigate the election and declare a different result from that declared by the managers?

I do not desire to go into an exhaustive discussion of the interesting issues, obvious upon the face of the pleadings, upon this preliminary motion. To entitle the plaintiffs to the relief sought now, in advance of a trial upon the merits, a prima facie case need only appear. To this end a brief examination of the law governing municipal elections in the city of Spartanburg is indispensable. Section 8 of the act under which the election was held, which act is known as the local option law, and to be found in 17 Stat., §95, is as follows: "All elections under this act shall be conducted according to the laws now governing the municipal elections of the city, town, or village in which they are held." This language suggests that the laws governing municipal elections of the different municipalities of the State may not be the same, and a slight examination will show this to be the fact, the difference, however, consisting in matters of detail.

It is important here, therefore, to ascertain the laws governing elections of the city of Spartanburg. The charter of the city, approved December 24, 1880, provides for the elections with much detail and particularity, so much so as to induce the belief that the charter was intended to cover the whole subject. It provides the time of holding the elections, for the registration of voters, the disposition of the registration lists, the qualifications of voters, the administration of oaths, the counting of the votes, the declaration of the election, the notice of the result to the mayor, and the notification by him to the persons elected. Section 5 of the said charter is in the following words: "The said *election shall be held in some convenient place in said city, from 8 o'clock in the morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and when the polls shall be closed the managers shall forthwith proceed to count the votes and declare the election, and give notice in writing to the mayor then being, who shall, within two days thereafter, give notice, or cause the same to be given, to the persons elected," &c. Section 6 of the same charter provides "that in case a vacancy shall occur in the office of mayor or alderman by death, resignation, or otherwise, an election shall be held to fill such vacancy by order of the mayor and aldermen," &c.

It will be observed that by the 5th section quoted above the duty is imposed upon the managers to count the votes and declare the election, and give notice in writing to the mayor, who, within two days, must give notice to the persons elected; the obvious construction of this language is that the managers are not only to conduct the election, but also declare the election and announce the choice of the electors. They are then required to communicate this fact officially, not to the City Council, but to the mayor; and the mayor is required, not to investigate the election, but to inform the persons elected of their election; no duty in this connection is imposed upon the City Council, and upon the mayor is imposed only the purely ministerial duty of informing the persons chosen. It is therefore plain that no power to investigate the election is granted to the City Council by the city charter.

It is argued, however, that the power of the City Council to investigate any municipal election is supported by section 5 of "an act to provide for the election of the officers of the incorporated cities and towns in the State of South Carolina," ratified September 25, 1868 (14 Stat., 108). That act affords upon its face very strong evidence, when taken in connection with the condition of civil affairs of the State at the time of its enactment, which is matter of history, that it was intended to meet an existing exigency and then expire, and that its object has been accomplished long ago. It was re-enacted in 1872 in the general statutes, probably because some of the officers elected under it were still in office, and to repeal it then would perhaps have destroyed their tenure. The section of that act relied on, or as much of it as is material to the issue here, is as follows: After providing for *the counting of the votes by the managers, and the communication of the result to the mayor, etc., "the managers of election shall decide contested cases, subject to the ultimate decision of the board of aldermen or wardens, when organized, except when the election of a majority of the persons voted for are contested, or the managers charged with illegal conduct, in which case the returns, together with the ballots, shall be examined and the case investigated by the acting board of aldermen, who shall declare the election, and their decision shall be binding upon all parties."

In elections held under this act, the managers heard contests in the first instance, and the newly elected board of aldermen could hear appeals from their judgment; or if the election of a majority of the persons voted for or the managers were charged with illegal conduct, the existing board of aldermen were invested with power to hear and determine originally. None of these conditions exist in the present case. There has been no hearing of a contest by the managers and an appeal to the council. A majority of the persons voted for have not had their election contested, nor are the managers charged with illegal conduct, but only the named voters. The conditions which this act made necessary to give the City Council the power to investigate the election not existing, there is nothing left upon which to raise the power.

As has already been stated, this act of 1868 was re-enacted in 1872 in the General Statutes. The act is found entire in the General Statutes of 1872, beginning at page 39, except the paragraph quoted above from section 5, which is entirely omitted. That the omission was intentional can be collected from the fact that the act itself was only provisional, and that no more elections were to be held under it, and the body of the act was preserved only to support the tenure of those officers who had been elected under it. In addition to this, the Supreme Court, in the case of State v. Acting Board of Aldermen of Charleston (1 S. C., 40), had held that the acting board of aldermen, under that clause, had no power of judicially deciding an election, but could only declare the result; and it had been held long ago in this State, first in Johnston v. Charleston (1 Bay., 441), and afterwards in State v. Schmierle (5

Rich., 301), that all elective *bodies, including elective municipal bodies, had an absolute right to decide upon the election of their own members. So that it was useless to give to the new board, when organized, an appellate jurisdiction from the judgment of the managers in a matter in which they already had an absolute conclusive original jurisdiction. The reason of the omission is therefore obvious.

The act, then, of 1872, without this clause under consideration, taken in connection with the law upon the subject as declared by the courts in the cases last above referred to, covered the whole ground of the original act of 1868, and was manifestly intended to embrace the whole subject-matter of that act, and that act is thereby repealed in all its parts. Sedg. Stat. Law, 104, 105. If it should be insisted that the re-enacted statute of 1872 has still any vitality, the charter of the city of Spartanburg having exhaustively covered the same ground in regard to elections with that statute, it is clear that the provisions of the charter were intended to repeal, and under the principles just above referred to did repeal, that act as to the city of Spartanburg.

It thus appears that the only law applicable to elections in the city of Spartanburg is the charter of that city, except the decisions in Johnston v. Charleston and State v. Schmierle, supra. A municipal corporation is a creature of statute. All its powers are derivative. It has no power unless expressly granted by the legislature of the State, or implied, because necessary to carry expressly granted powers into effect. The charter of the city of Spartanburg, as has been already seen, imposes no duty upon the City Council in connection with the declaration of an election, and imposes only a slight ministerial duty—that of notifying the persons elected—upon the mayor; and this charter, as we have seen, is the only statute applicable to the matter. This would be sufficiently decisive of the matter for the purposes of this motion but for the two cases above referred to as deciding that an elective municipal body has an inherent power to decide upon the election of its own members. Our courts have gone no further than this, and the cases rest upon a principle that will not support the doctrine that, because they can judge of the elections of their own members, they can judge of all municipal elections.

*I think, therefore, that it is not necessary to extend this discussion further upon this motion, and that it sufficiently appears that there is enough in the plaintiffs' case to justify a continuance of the injunction until the case can be heard upon its merits.

It is ordered, that the defendants, the mayor and aldermen of the city of Spartanburg, be restrained and enjoined from issuing or granting, in any form, to any one, license or licenses to sell any kind of liquor, spirituous or malt, in the city of Spartanburg, and that the persons named in the complaint in this action as having obtained licenses to sell malt and spirituous liquors from said city council be restrained and enjoined from selling such liquors, upon the plaintiffs entering into a sufficient bond, to be approved by the clerk of the court, in the sum of five hundred dollars, conditioned to pay such damages as may be sustained by reason of this injunction. It is further ordered, that this order remain of force until the further order of this court.

From this order defendants appealed upon exceptions which made the points considered by this court.

Messrs. D. Johnson, Jr., and R. W. Shand, for appellants.

Messrs. C. P. Sanders, Bomar & Simpson, J. S. R. Thomson, and E. H. Bobo, contra.

October 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. [Omitting the statement which appears in the order of the court below.]

The conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge is so fully vindicated by his clear and conclusive reasoning that it is scarcely necessary for us to add anything to what he has so well said. The City Council of Spartanburg, as a municipal corporation, has no powers except such as are conferred by its charter in express terms, or such as are necessary to carry out the powers granted. The only exception to this, if indeed it be an exception, is the inherent power, in all elective bodies, of judging of the qualifications and elections of their members, as held in Johnston v. The Corpo- ration of Charleston, 1 Bay., 441, and State v. Schmierle*, 5 Rich., 299. But this exception manifestly does not cover the present case, for here there is no question either as to the qualification or election of any member of the City Council of Spartanburg.

The question here arises under the terms of the act commonly called the local option law, above referred to, and must be determined by the provisions of that act. By one of the provisions of that law (Gen. Stat., § 1753) "all elections under this chapter shall be conducted according to the laws now governing the municipal elections of the city, town, or village in which they are held." Hence to determine the mode of conducting the election which is here in question, we must first ascertain what was the law governing municipal elections in the city of Spartanburg at the time this election was held. That law is to be found in the charter of the city (17 Stat., 434). The fifth section of that act provides "the said election shall be held at some convenient place or places in said city, from 8 o'clock in the morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon; and when the polls shall be closed, the managers shall forthwith proceed to count the votes and declare the election, and give notice in writing to the mayor then being," &c.; and in the last sentence of this section the following language occurs: "The mayor and aldermen for the time being shall appoint one or more boards of managers, three managers for each board, to conduct the election," &c.

There is no provision in this act, or in any other that we are aware of, which authorizes the City Council to review the action of the managers. It is true that there was a provision in the act of 1868 (14 Stat., 106) providing for the election of the officers of incorporated cities and towns in this State by which the decision of the managers was subject to the ultimate decision of the boards of aldermen or the wardens when organized, except in certain cases which need not be specified here; but as shown by the Circuit Judge this provision was dropped when the act was incorporated in the General Statutes of 1872, and cannot now be regarded as law; and even if it can be so regarded, yet it would not help the appellants here, for there is no pretence that there was any contest of this election before the managers, and hence there was no case for the ultimate decision of the City Council.

*It is contended, however, and this seems to be the main point upon which the appellants rely, that the local option law only provides that the election shall be conducted according to the law governing a municipal election in the town or city where such election is held, and that this does not include a determination of the result of the election, which must be done by some other authority than that of the managers; and, inasmuch as the act does not in terms confer this authority upon any one, it must necessarily be exercised by the city council, as their action, in granting or refusing licenses, depends upon the result of the election. It may be very true that when the city council, or a board of county commissioners, is authorized to grant licenses or subscribe for the stock of a railroad upon certain conditions, as, for example, upon condition that a majority of the citizens of the city or county shall vote for such license, or in favor of such subscriptions, it is necessarily implied that the city council, or the board of county commissioners, as the case may be, are authorized to determine whether the required conditions have been complied with, where no other mode of ascertaining whether the required conditions have been complied with has been provided, as is held in The State v. Columbia, 17 S. C., 84, and The Board of Commissioners of Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 How., 539 [16 L. Ed. 208]. But where the act does provide another mode of determining whether the conditions have been complied with, as, for example, the result of the election, then this principle does not apply, and the result must be determined in the mode prescribed by the act.

The practical inquiry, therefore, is whether the local option law does provide a mode of ascertaining the result of the election. We think that the act, properly construed, does provide that the managers shall declare the result of the election, and, therefore, that the City Council of Spartanburg had no authority to canvass the votes and declare the result. It is true that the act does provide that the election should be conducted according to the law governing municipal elections in the city of Spartanburg, and it may be true that, according to a strict and literal construction of the word "conducted," it would not embrace a declaration of the result; but if there is anything else in the act *tending to show that the legislature did not intend to use this word in its limited sense, then it is the duty of the court to give effect to such intention.

Now, it seems to us clear that the legislature intended to apply the same law regulating the municipal election to the election provided for in the local option act, and that this act must be read as if the provisions of the fifth section of the charter of the city of Spartanburg had been incorporated into it. So reading it, we think it manifest that the legislature did not intend to use the word "conducted" in its strict and limited sense, but intended it also to embrace the declaration of the result. As we have seen, the fifth section of the charter of the city expressly provides that "when the polls shall be closed, the managers shall forthwith proceed to count the votes and declare the election, and give notice in writing to the mayor"; and in the latter part of the same section it provides: "The mayor and aldermen for the time being shall appoint one or more boards of managers, three managers to each board, to conduct the election," showing plainly that the word "conduct" was not there used in its limited sense, but was intended to embrace also the declaration of the result: the duties of the managers are first prescribed, amongst which is the duty to declare the result of the election, and then the persons appointed to perform these duties are spoken of as persons appointed to conduct the election.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be affirmed.

October 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MELVER. The plaintiff, who is a locomotive engineer, brings this action to recover damages for an injury sustained while serving the defendant in that capacity. It seems that on March 22, 1881, the defendant was directed to take an extra freight train from Columbia to Charlotte, which train was to be run under the signals of a passenger train which preceded him. On reaching a point between Cornwall and Chester plaintiff's engine was thrown from the track, whereby he received the injuries complained of. It appears that one Wooten, a section-master and supervisor of the track-laying force, had taken up the track at that point for the purpose of repairs, and that this was the cause of the disaster.

The testimony tended to show that Wooten disregarded the signal carried by the preceding passenger train, which indicated that it was followed by another train, and did not wait for the *passage of such train, as required by the rules of the company, before taking up the track; and also neglected to place the proper signal to warn an approaching train that the track was not in condition to be used, as required by another rule of the company.

At the close of the testimony, the defendant's counsel submitted a motion for a nonsuit, "on the ground that the defendant was not liable for the injury, for it was the result of the negligence of a fellow-servant, viz., that the plaintiff, Calvo, was a fellow-servant with Wooten, the section-master." The motion was granted, though upon what ground is not stated in the order granting the motion, but as there was certainly some evidence of the negligence of Wooten, we will assume that it was upon the ground that the plaintiff and Wooten were fellow-servants and that, therefore, the company was not liable, as this seems to be assumed in the argument.

So that the only question for us to determine, is whether a locomotive engineer and a section-master are fellow-servants in the sense that the company would not be liable to one for the negligence of the other. The question as to who are fellow-servants in this sense has given rise to no little conflict of opinion, and the decisions elsewhere are conflicting. The only cases in this State where this question has been distinctly considered are Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Co. (18 S. C., 262 [44 Am. Rep. 573]), followed by Lasure v. Graniteville Manufacturing Co. (Ibid., 275), and recognized in Couch v. Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta R. R. Co. (22 S. C., 557). It is there determined that in order to ascertain whether a given employee is the representative of the master, or a fellow-servant with other employees, "the true test is whether the person in question is employed to do any of the duties of the master; if so, then he cannot be regarded as a fellow-servant or co laborer with the operatives, but is the representative of the master, and any negligence on his part in the performance of the duty of the master thus delegated to him, must be regarded as the negligence of the master."

So that the practical inquiry in this case is, whether Wooten, the section-master, was the representative of the defendant. Was he employed to do any of the duties of the company? If so, *then the company is liable to the plaintiff for any injuries he may have sustained by reason of the negligence of Wooten. But if not, then the company would not be liable. As we understand it, the main duty of the section-master is to keep the track in order so as to insure, as far as practicable, the safety of the trains continually passing over it. Now, it is well settled that it is the duty of the master, not only to provide his servants, in the first instance, with suitable and safe machinery and other appliances to do the work for which they are employed, but also to keep the same in proper repair, and any negligence in the performance of such duty, whether done by the master in person, or by subordinate agents selected by him for the purpose, would render the master liable for any injury sustained by one of his servants by reason of such negligence.

In the case of corporations this duty, as well as all others, must necessarily be committed to subordinate agents, and the fact that these subordinate agents, as in the present case, are subjected, in the performance of such duty, to the supervision of other and higher officers, cannot affect the question. The fact that the section-master is under the supervision of the roadmaster, and he, in turn, is under the supervision of the general superintendent, does not alter the nature of the duty which he is employed to do. The question is as to the nature of the duty, not as to the rank or grade of the person employed to perform it. Is it a duty which the master owes to his servants? Under the well settled rule above mentioned, we think that nothing can be clearer than that it is the duty of a railroad company to provide a suitable and safe track over which its locomotive engineers and other servants of that class are required to run its trains, and that negligence on the part of those to whom it commits such duty, is the negligence of the company.

These views are fully supported, not only by Gunter's Case, supra, and the authorities therein cited, but also by other cases. In Lewis v. St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railroad Co. (59 Mo., 495; S. C. 21 Am. Rep., 385), it was held that the company was liable to a brakeman for injuries sustained by reason of negligence of the section-master, to whom was committed the duty of keeping the road-bed in proper repair, in performing that *duty. The court held that they were not fellow-servants, and that the negligence of the section-master was the negligence of the company. The court, after laying it down as an established rule that it is the duty of a railroad company to keep its road-bed in proper repair, so as to insure, as far as practicable, the safety of those who may use it, whether passengers or servants, and after saying that this duty was committed to the section foreman, or master, used this language: "It is true, in one sense, the section foreman, whose duty it was to superintend the track and keep it clear and safe, was a fellow-servant, as all are, to a certain extent, fellow-servants, who are engaged in the same business or enterprise; but he represented the company in the line of his duty—he was the company in that regard—and his negligence was the company's negligence, in a matter in which it owed a duty and obligation to its servants."

In Davis v. Central Vermont Railroad Company (55 Vt., 84; S. C. 45 Am. Rep., 590), it was held that where a fireman was killed by the washing out of a culvert, caused by the negligence of the company's bridge builder in constructing and of the roadmaster in repairing the culvert, although they were ordinarily skilful and careful in their several employments, the company was held liable, upon the ground that it was the duty of the company to provide and maintain a safe road-bed, and the negligence of the subordinate, to whom this duty was committed, was the negligence of the company. This is the language used by the court: "The bridge-builder and road-master, while inspecting and caring for the defectively constructed culvert, were performing a duty which, as between the intestate and defendant, it was the duty of the defendant to perform. Their negligence therein was the negligence of the defendant."

The case of Moon v. Richmond & Alleghany R. R. Co. (78 Va., 745; S. C. 49 Am. Rep., [401]) was very much like the one now under consideration. It was there held that a section-master and train hand, or brakeman, were not fellow-servants in the sense that would exempt the company from liability for injuries sustained by the train hand by reason of the negligence of the section-master. The court said: "where a company delegates to an agent or employee the performance of duties which the law *makes it incumbent on the company to perform, his acts are the acts of the company—his negligence is the negligence of the company"—and then went on to show that it was the duty of a railroad company to provide and maintain a suitable and safe roadway for the use of its trains. See, also, the case of Gilmore v.

Northern Pacific Ry. Co. (15 Am. & Eng. Railway Cas. 304), where many authorities upon the subject are collected in a note.

Under the view which we have taken of this case, the question whether the rule which exempts a master from liability for injuries sustained by one of his servants, by reason of the negligence of a fellow-servant, should be abrogated, which was so elaborately argued by the counsel for appellant, does not arise, and has not, therefore, been considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

DARWIN v. CHARLOTTE, COLUMBIA & AUGUSTA R. R. CO.

(April Term, 1885.)

[Reported and annotated in 55 Am. Rep. 32.]

[1. Railroads \hookrightarrow 276.]

While a railroad company cannot be said to owe no duty to one who unlawfully intrudes himself upon its engines or cars, it does not owe to him the same duty that it owes to a passenger, or even to one of its employes.

If a stranger takes his seat upon the pilot of the engine of a construction train, in sight of the engineer, and in that position is killed by a collision with a car upon the track, this would show no negligence by the company; and action for damages being brought by the administrator of the deceased against the company, a non-suit should be granted.

[3. Railroads \hookrightarrow 282.]

The proof by plaintiff of gross contributory negligence on his part does not authorize a non-suit; contributory negligence is a matter of defence, and presents a question of fact to be solved by a jury.

[5. Railroads \hookrightarrow 278.]

Where a trespasser gets, without authority, upon the most dangerous place on a railroad engine and is killed, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and no recovery of damages for his death can be obtained against the company, even if the company had been guilty of negli-

[6. Negligence \hookrightarrow 80.]

Contributory negligence ceases to be a defence only where the injury complained of is shown to have been done willfully or purposely, or is the result of such gross negligence as would imply wantonness or recklessness.

November 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On June 27, 1884, the plaintiff's intestate was killed on the Chester & Lenoir Narrow Gauge Railroad under the following circumstances, and this action is brought by the plaintiff, as his administrator, against the defendant company, lessees of said railroad, to recover damages occasioned by such killing. The engineer in charge of a construction train uncoupled his engine from the train to which it was attached and went down the road for a supply of water, the deceased going with him on the engine. Returning, Darwin was riding on the pilot of the engine, and when it reached the cars it collided with them and Darwin was crushed between the engine and the cars, causing his immediate death.

There was some testimony tending to show that at the time of the collision the engine was running faster than usual when coupling; and a railroad engineer who was examined as a witness testified that the speed of the locomotive at the time of the collision must have been at least four miles an hour, too fast for approaching a train of cars for coupling. The engine was in good order, and when examined, immediately after the accident, the brakes were found to be wound up tight. The pilot is the most dangerous place for one to ride on, and one of the printed rules of the company, put in the hands of every engineer on the road, was that the engineer should not allow any one, except the fireman or road master, to ride on the engine under penalty of discharge. There was no positive testimony that the engineer knew that Darwin was on the engine at the time of the accident, though two colored women standing on the side of the track opposite the point where the collision took place testified that the engineer could have seen him. This is a very brief statement of the testimony, which is set out in full in the record.

On the close of the testimony for the plaintiff, the defendant's counsel moved for a non-suit upon two grounds. 1. Because "there was no sufficient proof of any negligence" on the part of the company. 2. Because "the undisputed proof of the plaintiff established beyond a reasonable doubt that the deceased had been guilty of gross contributory negligence." The motion was refused, and the defendant offering no testimony, the case went to the jury.

The defendant, amongst other things, requested the judge to charge "that if the jury find that the engineer was violating the rules of the defendant in allowing the deceased to ride upon the pilot of the engine, then the defendant is not liable for the killing." This request was refused, "because there was a neglect of duty upon the part of the defendant shown; for it was the duty of the company to employ engineers who are faithful in the discharge of duty." The next request was "that the defendant is not liable for the result of the unauthorized act of the engineer, done against its rules, and resulting from the voluntary act of the one killed." This request was also refused, for the same reason as that given above.

The judge was next requested to charge

"that even if the jury are satisfied that in this case the defendant is responsible for the acts of the engineer, and the engineer was guilty of great negligence and want of care, yet the plaintiff cannot recover if the deceased was also guilty of contributory negligence; that is to say, that he did not observe proper care under the circumstances." To this request the Circuit Judge responded as follows: "This, gentlemen, brings in the exception under which this case comes to you, and on account of which I refused the non-suit asked. If the defendant, by its agent, knew that this young man was there, and did not take proper care not to injure him, then the defendant is responsible for the result."

The last request was in these words: "That if the deceased failed to observe proper care under the circumstances, the plaintiff cannot recover." To which the judge responded as follows: "I refuse this for the same reason as the last request to charge. If deceased was in a place of danger, and the agent allowed him to remain there, and by carelessness ran into the cars and killed deceased, then the company is liable. * * * Suppose you come to the conclusion that the engineer, not using due care and proper caution, knowing that the young man was in that place of danger, and by his neglect and want of proper caution caused the death, then the company is liable. It was the duty of the agent, seeing him in that place of danger, to warn him off; and seeing he did not get off, to use such care and caution in the management of his engine so as not, if practicable, to injure the lad. If he failed so to do, the company is liable. In the Jones Case, which you heard read from Otto, the point is this, that the engineer did not know, as the agent did in this case, that the cars were on the track in the tunnel, forming the obstruction."

The jury having rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, defendant appeals, alleging error in refusing the motion for non-suit upon both of the grounds taken, and in refusing the requests to charge as above stated.

It is essential to bear in mind, throughout the consideration of this appeal, that this is not the case of a passenger, or even of an employee, who is understood to assume the risks incident to his employment, who has been injured on defendant's railroad; but it is a case of a bald trespasser who, without lawful authority, *intruded himself upon defendant's engine, and was there injured. It must be manifest that a railroad company does not owe the same duty to a trespasser that it does to a passenger or one of its employees, though we do not go to the extent of holding, as some of the cases (Duff v. Alleghany R. R. Co., 91 Penn. St., 458; S. C. 36 Am. Rep., 675; and Cauley v. Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway Company, 95 Penn. St., 398; S. C. 40 Am. Rep., 664) seem to do, that a railroad company owes no duty to one who trespasses upon its tracks or unlawfully intrudes himself upon its engines or cars. No one can safely disregard the ordinary instincts of humanity and shield himself from responsibility for an injury done, even to a trespasser, by its wanton or reckless disregard of such instincts.

So far as we are informed, there is no case in this State which defines the measure of duty which a railroad company owes to one who unlawfully intrudes upon its engines or cars. The nearest approach to it is the case of Carter v. C. & G. R. R. Co. (19 S. C., 20 [45 Am. Rep. 754]), in which the action was brought to recover damages for an injury sustained by a trespasser upon the track of the defendant company. In that case, the court, in speaking of one of the requests to charge, used this language: "So, too, although the second part of the request may have been good technical law, to wit, 'that if the deceased was upon the track of the defendant without lawful authority, and using it for his own convenience, he was a trespasser, and the company were under no obligation to take precautions against possible injuries to trespassers,' yet this principle could not have shielded the defendant from such injury as may have been produced by its negligence, if any, in every case without exception. It would, no doubt, require a much stronger case to make out negligence as to a trespasser than is required in ordinary cases, but we have found no case which goes to the extent of declaring that a trespasser has no protection." Citing 2 Thomp. Negl., 1162, in notes.

Now, the rule, as laid down in Gunter v. Graniteville Man. Co., 15 S. C., at page 456, in reference to the liability of a master for an injury sustained by one of his servants by reason of the negligence of a fellow-servant, is that the master is not liable unless he has been guilty of negligence in selecting or supervising such fellow-servant. The court there uses this language: "Where an injury has happened to a servant or employee, the master's liability is fixed as follows: * * * If it results from defective machinery or the negligent act of a co-servant with the injured party, he is not responsible unless the proof shall go further and show that the master's negligence or want of reasonable care in purchasing and overlooking his machinery, or in employing and supervising his servants, was the cause of his having defective machinery in use and negligent servants engaged." Assuming, in this case, that the disaster which resulted in Darwin's losing his life was caused by the negligence of the engineer, yet if Darwin had been a fellow-servant of the engineer instead of a trespasser, under the rule just stated the plaintiff could not recover against the company unless the proof went further and showed negligence either in the employment or the supervising of the engineer.

And shall the company be held to owe a higher duty to a trespasser than it does to one of its servants? Shall it be held responsible in damages to a trespasser when, under the same state of facts, it would not be responsible to one of its employees? In this case there is not the slightest evidence that the company had been guilty of any negligence in employing the engineer, or that it knew, or had any reason to suspect, that he was negligent in the discharge of his duties. Nor was there any testimony tending to show that the company had been negligent in supervising the conduct of the engineer; on the contrary, the testimony shows that stringent orders, under a heavy penalty, had been placed in the hands of all of its engineers, doubtless designed to prevent just such accidents as here occurred. Of course, we need scarcely add that this rule would not apply in the case of a passenger to whom the company owes a much higher duty. Even, therefore, if it be assumed that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the engineer, we do not see the slightest evidence of any negligence on the part of the company, and hence the non-suit ought to have been granted upon this ground.

The second ground upon which the non-suit was claimed cannot be sustained under the case of Carter v. C. & G. R. R. Co., supra. Contributory negligence is a matter of defense, and presents a question of fact to be solved by a jury.

The first and second requests were, as we have already shown in discussing the question of non-suit, improperly refused in this case, where the question is as to the liability of the company to a trespasser. The fact that the engineer was negligent in this particular instance was no evidence that he was habitually so, and much less was it any evidence that the company knew it, or that it had been guilty of negligence in employing him. All misconduct must have a beginning, and, so far as the testimony shows, this was the first and only act of negligence on the part of the engineer. Certainly there was no testimony tending to show that the company, at the time the engineer was employed, or afterwards, knew or had any reason to suspect that he was, or was likely to be, negligent in the discharge of his duties. While, therefore, the reason given by the Circuit Judge for refusing these requests might have been sufficient if the question was as to the liability of the company for an injury sustained by a passenger, we do not think such reason sufficient in a case of this kind.

The other requests to charge which were refused involve the law as to contributory negligence. The rule upon this subject is laid down in the case of Gunter v. Graniteville Man. Co., supra, in the following language: "The question in all the cases seems to be, has the damage or injury complained of been occasioned entirely by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant, or, notwithstanding such improper act of defendant, would the injury have been avoided but for the negligence or want of ordinary care of the plaintiff? In the former case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. In the latter, the defendant is entitled to the verdict. * * * In other words, the courts cannot undertake in these cases to solve the problem how far such party may have contributed to the unfortunate result and by this means assess the damages on each pro rata. The only question that can be considered is, has the defendant entirely caused the injury? If so, he is responsible. If, however, the injury could have been avoided by reasonable or proper care on the part of the plaintiff, then the defendant is held harmless."

*This is an authoritative statement of the rule, and, what is more, it is well sustained by reason. It certainly would be very unjust to allow a person who has sustained an injury by the negligence of another to recover damages for such injury when it is made to appear that he himself contributed by his own negligence to the cause of such injury, or when by proper care on his part he might have avoided it altogether. This would, in effect, be giving one compensation for his own default, and would amount to the offer of a premium for negligence or want of proper care of one's own person.

In Railroad Co. v. Jones (95 U. S., 439 [24 L. Ed. 506]), the plaintiff, who was employed by the company in repairing its roadway, while being transported from his place of work by a train to which was attached a box car for the hands to ride in, was riding on the pilot of the engine, when by a collision with other cars in a tunnel which had become detached from another train, was severely injured, and brought his action for damages. The defence was contributory negligence. The court said: "One who by his negligence has brought an injury upon himself cannot recover damages for it. * * * But where the defendant has been guilty of negligence also in the same connection, the result depends upon the facts. The question in such cases is (1) whether the damage was occasioned entirely by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant; or (2) whether the plaintiff himself so far contributed to the misfortune by his own negligence or want of ordinary care and caution that but for such negligence or want of care and caution on his part the misfortune would not have happened. In the former case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover; in the latter, he is not."

This case is identical in principle with the one now under consideration, for it will be found upon examination that the points of difference pointed out by the Circuit Judge and the counsel for respondent were not regarded as material by the court. The distinction alluded to by the Circuit Judge, that there the engineer did not know, as the engineer did in this case, that the cars were on the track in the tunnel, forming the obstruction, does not very clearly appear in the case; and, on the contrary, the court uses this language: "The facts with respect to the cars *left in the tunnel are not fully disclosed in the record." But, even assuming that the engineer did not know that the cars were in the tunnel, this fact could only bear on the question of defendant's negligence, and the court said expressly that "for the purposes of this case, we assume that the defendant was guilty of negligence."

So the language quoted by respondent's counsel that "the plaintiff was on the pilot at the time of the accident without the knowledge of any agent of the defendant," while it is found in the opinion of the court, is in that portion of it where the learned justice is stating the testimony adduced by the defendant, and does not occur in that part of the opinion where the question of contributory negligence is discussed. On the contrary, it is there said: "The knowledge, assent, or direction of the company's agents as to what he (alluding to the plaintiff) did is immaterial." Again it is said: "The liability of the company was conditioned upon the exercise of reasonable and proper care and caution on his (the plaintiff's) part. Without the latter the former could not arise. He and another who rode beside him were the only persons hurt upon the train. All those in the box car, where he should have been, were uninjured. He would have escaped also if he had been there. His injury was due to his own recklessness and folly. He was himself the author of his misfortune. This is shown with as near an approach to a demonstration as anything short of mathematics will permit. The case is thus clearly brought within the second of the predicates of mutual negligence we have laid down." Accordingly it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The case practically decides that where one voluntarily places himself in a position on a railroad train known to be dangerous, he cannot recover damages from the company for injuries sustained by a collision upon the ground of contributory negligence, even though his position was known to the agents of the company, and the collision was occasioned by defendant's negligence. This decision, therefore, fully sustains the view which we take of the case now under consideration. Indeed, the present case is much stronger than the one just cited. Here the deceased was on the engine without authority, where he had no right to be, *and voluntarily placed himself in a position which the evidence shows was the most dangerous place he could have selected, and in so doing was clearly guilty of contributory negligence. The unfortunate result was due to his own unlawful and reckless act; and even if the defendant had also been guilty of negligence, he should not be permitted to recover damages for an injury to which he himself contributed, although the engineer may have known that he was in such a dangerous place and did not warn him off.

In the case of a passenger the rule would be different, for in such case it is the duty of the company, through its conductor, to look after the comfort and safety of the passengers, and if one of them is known to be in a dangerous position on the train, it would be the duty of the conductor to warn him of his danger; and if he failed to do so, it might be regarded as equivalent to the consent of the company, through its agent, to carry safely such passenger, even in such dangerous position. But to a trespasser the company owes no such duty. The company is not bound to assume, or even expect, that trespassers will intrude themselves into dangerous places upon their trains, and is therefore under no obligation to provide for their safety by warning them of the danger of their unlawful and reckless acts; but in the case of passengers, whom the company does expect and invite to travel upon their trains, they are under obligation to look after their safety, and if such duty is neglected by their agent appointed for that purpose, they would be liable for the damages resulting from such neglect.

In Flower v. Penn. R. R. Co. (69 Penn. St., 210, found in 8 Am. Rep., 251), an engine, tender, and one car ran from the station where the train had stopped down to a water tank, in charge of the fireman, who asked a boy about ten years old standing there, to put in the hose and turn on the water. While the boy was climbing upon the tender to comply with the request, some detached cars belonging to the train came down with ordinary force and struck the car next to the tender, whereby the boy was thrown down and crushed to death, and the court held that the company was not liable. In the opinion it is said: "The true point of this case is, that in climbing the side of the tender *or engine, at the request of the fireman, to perform the fireman's duty, the son of the plaintiff did not come within the protection of the company. To recover the company must have come under a duty to him, which made his protection necessary. * * * Here the boy was voluntarily where he had no right to be, and where he had no right to claim protection. * * * The only apology for his presence there is the unauthorized request of one who could not delegate his duty, and had no excuse for visiting his principal with his own thoughtless and foolish act."

In Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. R. Co. (57 N. Y., 382, reported also in 15 Am. Rep., 513), plaintiff was invited by the conductor of defendant's coal train to ride on the train, which was never used to transport passengers, and, on the contrary, by the printed regulations of the company, of which, however, the plaintiff had no notice, passengers were forbidden to ride on coal trains. While on the train the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the employees of the company; held, that the company was not liable. The court said that the unauthorized act of the conductor in inviting the plaintiff to ride on the train could not be attributed to the company so as to create the relation of carrier and passenger, and thereby impose upon the company the duty of care in the transportation of the plaintiff; that he could only be lawfully on the train by an authorized act of the conductor. "It is not necessary to consider whether he was a trespasser. It is enough to hold that a duty to be careful toward him could only spring up on the part of the defendant by an act on the conductor's part, coming within the scope of his authority."

In Everhart v. Terre Haute & Ind. R. R. Co. (78 Ind., 292; S. C. 41 Am. Rep., 567), the plaintiff, who was not in the employ of the company, at the request of one of its employees, got on a slowly moving car and applied the brakes. While so occupied he was injured by a collision with other cars, caused by the negligence of other employees, and it was held that he had no remedy against the company. The court said that he was not "in any better condition, legally, than if he had been a mere intermeddler, undertaking to perform the service without request or direction from any one, because, as we have seen, he *was not requested or directed to get upon the car and apply the brake by any one having power from the defendant to authorize him to do so. The defendants owed him no duty, either as an employee, passenger, or traveller upon a highway crossed by the railroad."

In New Orleans, Jackson, &c., R. R. Co. v. Harrison (48 Miss., 112; S. C. 12 Am. Rep., 356), the conductor of a train ordered a boy, fifteen years of age, not in the service of the company, to uncouple the cars, notoriously a dangerous duty, especially to an inexperienced person, and he was injured by the negligence of the defendant's servants. Held, that he could not recover from the company, the court saying, amongst other things: "If uncoupling the cars was voluntary by Harrison, it was an act of most extraordinary rashness and folly, and one which contributed directly to the injury. It is not the degree of his carelessness, however, which exonerates the company, but the question to be determined is, whether his negligence contributed to the injury of which he complains. It is enough to defeat him if the injury might have been avoided by his exercise of ordinary care, and this rule is based upon grounds of public policy, which require, in the interest of the whole community, that every one shall take such care of himself as can reasonably be expected of him."

From these cases it will be seen that the fact that it was known to the conductor or other officer in charge of a train that the person injured had, by his own recklessness, placed himself in a dangerous position, does not affect the question, and that such fact cannot have the effect of overcoming the defence of contributory negligence. It is true that there are cases, many of which were cited by respondent's counsel, tending to establish an exception to the general rule as to contributory negligence, to the effect that the plaintiff may recover, notwithstanding his own negligence exposed him to the risk of injury, if the defendant after becoming aware of the plaintiff's danger, could, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided injuring him; but no such exception has been recognized by the courts of this State, by the Supreme Court of the United States, or by many of the States. In Gunter's Case, cited above, the defendant must have been aware of the danger to which the plaintiff was exposed in operating the loom in the condition in which it was, and yet it was laid down without qualification or exception that if the negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the injury, she could not recover, notwithstanding the negligence of the defendant.

It seems to us that the correct rule is laid down in Pennsylvania Company v. Sinclair (62 Ind., 301; S. C. 30 Am. Rep., 185), where the cases pro and con are collected in a note—that contributory negligence ceases to be a defence only where the injury complained of is shown to have been done wilfully or purposely; or, we would add, where it was the result of such gross negligence as would imply wantonness or recklessness.

We think, therefore, that the Circuit Judge erred in refusing to charge the two last requests of defendant, and that the mere fact that the engineer knew that the deceased was in a place of danger and did not warn him off, would not make the company liable, if the deceased, by his own negligence, recklessness, or want of care, contributed to the injury which he sustained.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON and Mr. Justice MCGOWAN concurred in the result.

23 S. C. 543

KING v. FRASER.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨1022; Partnership ⇨218.]

Whether an agreement between A and B, under which A was to receive "as compensation for his services one-half of the net profits, after paying all expenses," was such a partnership as entitled A to claim an interest in property purchased and paid for by B and conveyed to him alone, was a question of fact; and the finding by master and Circuit Judge upon this point was affirmed, it not being unsustained by the evidence.

[2. Mortgages ⇨173.]

Under the registry act of 1876 (16 Stat., 92; Gen. Stat., § 1776), a mortgage recorded after the time (40 days) allowed by that act, acquires a lien from the date of its record, and will, from that date, have priority as to the mortgaged lands over the general debts of the mortgagor not having liens, including such as were contracted without notice to the creditors, between the date of the execution of the mortgage and the date of its record. Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting.

Counsel being absent at the call of a cause in its regular order in this court, the court declined to fix another time for counsel to argue the appeal orally, but granted them leave to submit an argument, which was done. Held, the refusal to fix a further time out of order furnished no ground for a rehearing.

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, July, 1884.

A statement of the facts of this case will be found in the opinion of this court. Upon the status of the Doar mortgage, the master reported as follows:

But it becomes necessary, in the next place, to consider what effect the failure of the executors of Doar to record their mortgage within forty days from its execution as prescribed by law, and their recording it after that time, has upon the relative rights of parties as to the fund in court. The mortgage held by the executors of Doar was executed on February 1, 1877, and was recorded on January 7, 1879. Between those dates all the claims of the general creditors accrued.

It has been earnestly contended, with great force and ability in argument before me, that, inasmuch as these claims were not reduced to judgment prior to the recording of their mortgage by the executors of Doar, on January 7, 1879, they had no lien at that date; and that, under the act of 1876, the mortgage previously unrecorded, but recorded at that date, became from that time a lien prior to any lien that might be acquired by judgments obtained by these creditors after that date. Or to state the question in the language of the learned counsel, who so ably argued the point before me: "The precise question is, whether, under A. A. 1876 (Gen. Stat., § 1776), a deed in fee simple, or a mortgage recorded more than forty days after its execution, is valid against the claims of a creditor whose debt was contracted between the date of the execution and the date of the recording of such deed or mortgage, but who had no specific lien or right in rem, to be interfered with by the deed or mortgage at the date of its *record. In other words, who are meant by the words 'subsequent creditors and purchasers'? Do they include all creditors or purchasers subsequent to the execution or delivery of the deed or mortgage, or only those whose specific liens, or rights in rem, are interfered with by the recording of the deed or mortgage?"

It was urged that under the act of 1876, the recording of the deed or mortgage executed more than forty days previously, was equivalent to its re-execution at that date, and was a publication and notice of such re-execution, by and from the time of such recording. And that, therefore, as a new deed or mortgage executed on that day would certainly rank as a prior lien as against any "rights" of any creditor who was not a judgment creditor at that date, so an old deed or mortgage then for the first time recorded, would operate in the same way; and that the one would work no greater hardship to the general creditor than the other. It was contended that this was the policy and purpose of the act of 1876, in providing "that the above mentioned deeds or instruments in writing, if recorded subsequent to the expiration of said period of forty days, shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, only from the date of such record."

I have been very much impressed by this argument. I am aware of the dangers and inconveniences that must be encountered in the examination of titles when a deed or mortgage which forms a part of the chain of title is recorded out of due time, and I understand the hardships which may be worked, if the words "subsequent creditors" shall be interpreted to mean "general creditors as well as judgment creditors." I am not opposed to some mild judicial legislation, to correct and harmonize the sometimes crude provisions of acts of assembly; but after the most careful consideration, I cannot hold this to be the true interpretation of the words, "rights of subsequent creditors," in the act of 1876. I can find no authority or precedent for so sharp and material a change in the language of the act as to make the word "creditors" read "judgment creditors." And I can find no warrant for such a change or for such an interpretation either in the context of the act, or in the history of the registration laws in this State.

of that learned and distinguished jurist, Judge Wardlaw, in the celebrated case of Steele v. Mansell, 6 Rich., 452-453. But the only questions decided in Steele v. Mansell were: 1st. That a subsequent judgment, under the law as it then stood, was not preferred to an unrecorded absolute conveyance of land. 2d. That under the joint operation of the 45th section of the county court act of 1785 and the act of 1698, an absolute conveyance of land, not recorded for four years after its delivery, but recorded before any subsequent conveyance was made, had priority over a subsequent conveyance, which was recorded within six months from its date. All the rest of the opinion in that case is historical, discursive, critical and suggestive; but it makes no judicial decision of the questions suggested. It does suggest that under the 45th section of the act of 1785, "creditors" might have meant only judgment creditors. And it does suggest that under the joint operation of the act of 1698 and the 45th section of the act of 1785, recording after the prescribed time might have been considered to have had the same effect as if the deed had been executed on the day it was recorded. But neither question was even pretended to be decided, even as an historical question. It was a suggestion of possible views of the courts in the past, and nothing more.

I think everybody will agree with the learned judge who delivered the opinion in that case, when he says that "our registry law was, before the act of 1843 concerning mortgages, lamentably obscure and deficient." It is apparent, too, that the court, in Steele v. Mansell, regarded the act of 1843, as far as mortgages were concerned, as a new departure in our registry law, and that it must receive independent interpretation. They suggest, and only suggest, as a difficult question what would be the effect under that act, of recording after the prescribed time, but before opposing rights had accrued.

It would be difficult, too, not to concur with the chief justice, when, in Williams v. Beard (1 S. C., 321), he says: "It would be a matter more of interest and curiosity than of practical utility to consider here the numerous decisions under our registry laws." * * "The question, however, with which we have to *deal is, in our judgment, affected by neither of the said acts [the act of 1698 and the 45th section of the county court act of 1785], unless we can be persuaded by the argument to hold that the act of 1843 was intended by the Legislature to compel no change, and must be construed with reference to the former acts, only adding another to the structure, which was in no way to destroy the symmetry of the whole." And in Youngblood v. Keadle (1 Strob., 130), Wardlaw, J., says: "Our act of 1843, concerning the recording of mortgages, has so altered the law, that many cases are not likely to occur in which the decision now made will be exactly applicable." It is thus apparent that the act of 1843 has been on all hands recognized as a new departure in our registry law, so far as mortgages are concerned.

Still more clearly, it seems to me, is the act of 1876 (Gen. Stat., § 1776) to be interpreted independently of the acts of 1698 and 1785. It is evidently a well considered effort to deal effectively and clearly with the whole subject of registration. It includes in its provisions absolute conveyances and other writings therein named, as well as mortgages. It changes the time allowed for recording. It enacts that "the deeds and instruments of writing therein named shall be valid, so as to affect, from the time of delivery or execution, the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, only when recorded within forty days from the time of such delivery and execution," &c.

But McKnight v. Gordon (13 Rich. Eq., 222 [94 Am. Dec. 164]), and Williams v. Beard (1 S. C., 309), had been decided. These in effect established that, under the act of 1843, the recording of a mortgage after the prescribed time did not operate as constructive notice from the date of record. And, therefore, in the act of 1876 the following proviso was added: "Provided, nevertheless, that the above mentioned deeds and instruments in writing, if recorded subsequent to said period of forty days, shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration without notice only from the date of such record." It will be observed, however, that the words, "shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice," are an exact repetition of the language of the act of 1843.

Accepting, then, the acts of 1843 and 1876 as constituting a new departure in our registry law, it now becomes necessary to decide for the first time in the history of these acts what is meant by the words "subsequent creditors." Do they mean only creditors who have reduced their claims to judgment after the execution, but before the recording, of the deed or mortgage, or, in other words, only "judgment creditors;" or do they include all creditors whose debts have been contracted between those dates, or in other words, "general creditors" as well? The case of McKnight v. Gordon would seem to have come very near deciding it. But the question was not actually involved in that case. And the necessity, therefore, remains for an explicit decision.

It is a rule of interpretation so familiar and so long and well established that it is needless to cite authority for it, that, as a general rule, the words of statutes are to be taken and interpreted in their ordinary, popular, and customary sense, unless they are otherwise defined, either by express definition, or by the context of the same act, or the context of other acts dealing with the same subject, or, as it is said, in pari materia, or by judicial decision. Now, I find nothing, either in the context of the act of 1876 or that of 1843, or in any judicial interpretations of either, to warrant the giving of any other meaning to the word "creditors" than its well-established customary, commercial, and legal sense. The word "creditors" in all these senses means simply and plainly one who gives "credit" to another, by giving him money, or some other value, on the "credit" of, or the faith in, his honesty and his ostensible means of paying; or, in other words, it means those who popularly, commercially, and legally are known as "general creditors"—creditors who have given "credit," but have neither originally given, nor subsequently obtained, any lien or security for the payment of their debts.

The distinction between "judgment creditors" and "general creditors" was perfectly well known to the law and thoroughly established in its language. It is recognized in the very case of Steele v. Mansell, which is relied on for a different interpretation. It occurs passim in all the authorities. It is one of the phrases and features of the law, better known perhaps than any other among laymen, who thoroughly appreciate the difference between the creditor who can levy upon your property for payment and the creditor who can only dun you for his debt. The Legislature must be assumed not only to have well known the distinction between these two classes of creditors, but to have used the language of the acts with the purpose of providing for an existing evil or remedying some defect in the law.

What was the evil to be remedied? Ours is pre-eminently a commercial generation. The security of trade is one of the great objects of our governments. Trade is largely based upon the credit given to those who seem to have the means of paying, and who are believed to be fair and open in disclosing their property, and in declaring the incumbrances upon it. Registry laws are intended to furnish the citizens with the facilities of giving notice of their property and its incumbrances on the one hand, and of giving creditors the means of knowing what these are on the other. Such laws must necessarily be imperfect, but this is unquestionably their wise and useful purpose. The evil to be remedied was that some persons, by failing to record their deeds or mortgages, whether carelessly or purposely, induced others to give them "credit" for the means of paying their debts, when, by their own acts, they had conveyed away, or incumbered their property and concealed, or allowed others to conceal, the fact, or neglected to give notice of it. This was the evil to be remedied. But surely the creditor who gives credit, but does not pursue his debtor to judgment, is as much deceived and wronged by the concealment as the creditor who sharply demands the rigor of the law. Did the legislature mean that creditors must make haste to pursue and cripple the debtor, or the registry law would give him no protection? We all know that such never was their temper. Yet such would be the result if the judgment creditor alone is protected against unrecorded deeds and mortgages, while the general creditor is left to suffer.

I have dwelt upon this question of the popular and customary commercial and legal meaning of the word "creditors," not only because it was the first which demanded attention, but because *it is the chief and the broadest ground on which I rest my decision.

Let us next consider what was the defect in the law as it stood in 1876 under the adjudicated cases which was to be remedied. It was found that many careless persons who had failed to record their deeds and mortgages had no means of repairing the neglect and giving notice of their existence, except by express notice to every possible creditor and every probable purchaser. Such express notice, from the very nature of the case, was almost impracticable. In Williams v. Beard, it had in effect been decided that recording after the prescribed time was not such notice as the law would recognize. The careless purchaser or mortgagee was left without a remedy. The act of 1876 came to his relief, and by the proviso we have quoted, declared that such recording, after due time, should operate as constructive notice from the date of the record.

And when we have thus described the evil to be remedied by both the act of 1843 and the act of 1876, and the defect in the act of 1843, which was supplied by the act of 1876, we have, in fact, given in brief the whole history and purpose of these acts, and by the very statement in effect decided the question before us. The great object of all registry laws is to give notice—notice to purchasers, notice to incumbrancers, notice to creditors who give credit on the faith of property. The preservation of the evidence of the deeds themselves has indeed, in these careless times of ours, been found to be an important function of registration, but it is secondary and incidental, and probably formed no part of the original purpose. That notice was the ruling idea is made unquestionable by the provision that express notice should be equivalent to careful recording. The object was thus to give notice of existing deeds, not to make, or aid in making, new securities, or giving them new dates. That was the right and function of the grantor or mortgagor alone.

And just here we have the essential difference between the recording of an existing deed and the making a new one at the date of record. With the recording the grantor or mortgagor has nothing to do. He need not be consulted. He has no right, and has placed it beyond his power to prevent it. But a new *deed cannot be made without his express consent and concurring action. He might see proper, and think it right, not to make the new deed. He might sometimes justly say, "I supposed your deed was recorded; I have contracted debts, believing that my creditors knew from the records that my property was incumbered by your mortgages; I find that they have given credit on the faith of those records, which gave no notice of any incumbrance; they must not suffer by your laches; you must take the consequences of your own neglect; I decline to execute the new deed." Would the law, does the law, can the law compel him?

Again, both under the act of 1843 and the act of 1876, express notice, whether to purchasers or creditors, was to be a full equivalent for and have all the effect of recording. Could mere notice of an old deed, however clear, full, and express, have made that old deed a new deed, or have given it all the effect of a new deed? Can express notice be not only notice, but re-execution also? Can constructive notice be anything more? Could such notice of an unrecorded mortgage to creditors, after their debts were contracted, but before they had obtained judgments, have had the effect of defeating their rights as creditors under the act of 1843, which provided for the case of express notice, but not for the case of recording after due time? Can express notice have such an effect in a similar case under the act of 1876? What is there in the act of 1876 which gives express notice a greater effect under that act than express notice under the act of 1843? Can the constructive notice of recording under the act of 1876 have a greater effect than its equivalent express notice under that act? I think the whole theory, policy, and purpose of our registration law contradicts such an idea. Under the act of 1876, it seems to me, notice, whether express or constructive, remains notice, and nothing more.

In McKnight v. Gordon (13 Mich. Eq., 231 [94 Am. Dec. 164]), Chan. Inglis says: "Recording is not an element in the due execution of a mortgage." And again, after stating the mischief to be remedied, he says: "The remedy provided (by registration laws), therefore, consists in giving notice, so far as the law can effect this, to all persons, of every such mortgage sale, &c., by requiring of the first purchaser, &c., under pain of the defeat or post*ponement of his estate, that the deed or other instrument by which his purchase has been consummated, or an abstract of it, shall be recorded within a reasonable time in public books, kept in a public office provided for the purpose, to which office or books all persons may have free access." And on same page: "The courts have uniformly in their construction of these laws come to hold that registration, being but a substitute for actual notice and intended to secure this, is not essential when the party intended to be protected has such notice." And in the same case the same distinguished chancellor says: "But the positive rule of law established by this statute precludes the mortgagee who has omitted to put his mortgage upon record within the time limited, from interposing the estate which he acquired by it in bar or derogation of the estate or claim for which one who is within the terms of its protection has paid."

Taking these extracts from the opinion of Justice Inglis together, they not only sustain the position that recording is notice, and only notice of a deed, and not a re-execution of that deed, but in the use of the word "claim," as among the rights to be protected, he came as near deciding the question as he well could in a case in which the question was not involved. This was, it is true, under the act of 1843, but as we have before said, the language of that act in regard to "subsequent creditors" is identical with the language of the act of 1876.

But in reply to all this it was earnestly urged in argument before me that the act of 1876 made a mortgage recorded after the prescribed time "valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, from the date of such record." And that if creditors had no judgments before such recording, they could have no "rights" in rem until after the recording, and the mortgage would be valid against these debts only contracted, but not reduced to judgment before such recording. And to illustrate the absence of such rights in rem, it is said that if either the recorded or the unrecorded mortgage was foreclosed, such creditors would not be necessary parties to the action as having no lien. But it must be remembered that the act does not say "rights in rem," but simply "rights." Have creditors no "rights" under the law, but "rights in rem in pre*sent"? May they not have rights which may become rights in rem in futuro by appropriate proceedings—rights in rem which, when acquired, will relate back to, and be protected by, their "rights" as creditors, existing before the mortgage was recorded, and which will rank and take priority as of that date? In other words, may they not have "rights" in the nature of equities which the law will respect and enforce as effectually as they would respect and enforce a "right in rem"?

Similar equities are well known to the law and thoroughly established. The equity or quasi lien of creditors of the estate of a decedent will furnish an example. See Jones v. Wightman, 2 Hill, 580; and Adger & Co. v.

Pringle, 11 S. C., 527. The equity of creditors (general creditors as well as judgment creditors) against a voluntary conveyance is an equity so well known as to be familiar law, and needs only to be referred to. In the case of these voluntary conveyances the voluntary grantor need not be shown to have had judgments against him unsatisfied at the date of the voluntary conveyance. (The lien of such judgments would protect themselves without the aid of the equity.) It is sufficient to show that those claiming the equity were bona fide creditors at the date of the voluntary conveyance. Could a substantial equity of "general creditors" be more clearly recognized? The claim of general creditors against an unrecorded marriage settlement will furnish another example.

And so in the case of general creditors subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, and before it was recorded. They may not be necessary parties to an action for foreclosure, but they are necessary parties to the title, so to speak. They cannot maintain a creditor's bill until they have obtained judgment. But when they have obtained judgment their equity will relate back to the time of contracting the debt, and the purchaser at the sale under the foreclosure will take subject to an equity of the possibility of which he was notified by the fact that the mortgage was recorded out of due time. In McKnight v. Gordon, already recited, Judge Inglis, at page 243, says: "Let it be borne in mind, then, that there are two classes of persons protected against the damage to be apprehended from these undisclosed mortgages: 1. Subsequent creditors of the mortgagor without notice of the mortgage. *2. Purchasers for valuable consideration without such notice. In order to make the rule effectual for the defense of the former class, it is necessary to insure a good title to purchasers at sales under their executions, whether such purchasers have or have not notice."

I understand very well that the exact question in this case was not involved in that case. I have only quoted the passage to show that the judge in that case had in his mind equities, which might only be equities when the "rights" accrued, but might become effective "rights in rem" against a mortgagee or a purchaser under the foreclosure of his mortgage. And it is noteworthy that neither in that case, nor in Williams v. Beard, already cited, is there any suggestion even that by "subsequent creditors" only judgment creditors might be intended.

One further consideration deserves brief notice. It would seem that if only creditors having judgments prior to the date of recording can claim under the act of 1876 against a mortgage recorded out of due time, because the recording was equivalent to the re-execution and delivery of the mortgage at that date, then the provision of the act of 1876 for the protection of subsequent creditors was wholly superfluous. The lien of their judgments would have protected them, without the protection of the statute. Ex proprio vigore they would be liens prior to any deed or mortgage re-executed as of the date of record.

There may be inconvenience, hardships, and embarrassments growing out of what I hold to be the true construction of the act of 1876. But it must be remembered that one object of the act was to compel persons to record their conveyances and mortgages under pains and penalties. Frauds may be practised perhaps under that construction. But, as is well known, hardships and embarrassments and frauds may occur under the act of 1876 (and perhaps under any registration act) even as to those parts of it about which there never has been, nor ever can be, any dispute. And perhaps some of the questions of hardship and difficulty suggested in argument may receive solution, without so strong an act of judicial legislation as changing the well considered language of a statute.

After this anxious and careful consideration of the whole sub*ject, I hold that the words subsequent creditors in the act of 1876 include general creditors, and cannot be confined to judgment creditors.

And I hold, therefore, that the mortgage of "Jack's Bluff and Elmwood," proved in this case by the executors of S. D. Doar, is not a prior lien as against the claims of creditors for debts contracted by the defendant, S. S. Fraser, subsequently to the date of the execution of that mortgage, and prior to its being recorded, except in so far as that mortgage may be protected by the subsequent and duly recorded mortgage of the same tracts of land to the defendant, R. E. Fraser, who had express notice of this mortgage to the executors of Doar.

And this leads to one other question which remains to be considered. The mortgage of Jack's Bluff and Elmwood, proved in this case by the executors of Doar, was not recorded until all the debts of the claiming creditors had been contracted. The mortgage of the same tracts of land to the defendant, R. E. Fraser, was duly recorded within forty days from the date of its execution. But R. E. Fraser had express and admitted notice of the Doar mortgage at the time of the execution and record of his mortgage.

These conflicting claims present a curious puzzle, and the proceeds of sale of the land in dispute would at first sight seem to move in the endless circle of passing from the hand of one claimant to another claimant, and from the second claimant to a third claimant, and from the last to the first again, who must again pass it on through the same circle indefinitely. For example, the creditors of the mortgagee cannot claim against the mortgage of R. E. Fraser, because as to them it was duly recorded, and is a prior lien. But Fraser cannot hold so much of the proceeds of sale as is covered by the Doar mortgage, because he had express notice of it. And it is claimed that the executors of Doar cannot hold their portion of the proceeds against the creditors, because, as to them, their mortgage was not recorded, and they had no express notice of it.

But I think the circle can be broken and the problem equitably solved, by holding each party to his or their contract, and giving *the executors of Doar the benefit of their diligence in giving notice to Fraser.

1. It is evident that the creditors cannot equitably claim more than the balance of the proceeds of sale remaining after payment in full of Fraser's mortgage, because it is duly recorded, and they so had notice of it, and must be assumed to have given credit, subject to the right of the mortgagor to make it. This balance, then, is the only part of the proceeds of sale which can possibly come to the creditors.

2. R. E. Fraser can only claim, under his mortgage, the balance of the proceeds of sale remaining after deducting the amount due on the Doar mortgage, because he had notice of that mortgage, and this balance was the security for which he contracted. This balance, then, is the only part of the proceeds of sale which can come to R. E. Fraser.

3. But the executors of Doar did not give notice to Fraser for the benefit of the creditors of the mortgagor. They gave that notice for their own benefit. So much, then, as R. E. Fraser (and not the creditors), by reason of the notice of the executors of Doar to him, contributes to the payment of their mortgage they are entitled to retain; but so much as the creditors could claim after R. E. Fraser is paid in full (as before stated) the executors of Doar must pay over to them. Because, as to this last amount, the executors of Doar, by failing to record their mortgage in time, are held in law to have contracted that the creditors should have it. Or, in other words, what the executors of Doar can retain under their mortgage is the difference between the full amount Fraser could have claimed if they had not given him notice of their mortgage, and the reduced amount he is compelled to take by reason of that notice. Or, in other words again, just so far as, in the division of the proceeds, the Fraser mortgage laps over the Doar mortgage, just so far it protects that mortgage, and no farther.

I hold, then, that the proceeds of sale of the "Jack's Bluff and Elmwood tracts" are to be practically distributed as follows: 1. R. E. Fraser is to be paid out of the proceeds of sale the amount due on his mortgage, less the amount due on the Doar mortgage. 2. The creditors are to be paid the balance, if any, of the proceeds of sale which would remain if the Fraser mortgage were paid in full. 3. The executors of Doar are to be paid the difference between what the creditors receive, if any, and the whole amount due on their mortgage. This method of solving the problem stated and of adjusting the conflicting claims is, it seems to me, what is practically meant by the doctrine laid down in the cases of Earl of Pomfret v. Lord Windsor, 2 Vesey, 472, 486; and in Wilcocks v. Wain, 10 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 380; and in Manufacturer's and Mechanic's Bank v. Bank of Pennsylvania, 7 Watts & S. [Pa.] 335 [42 Am. Dec. 240], cited in 2 Lead. Cas. Eq., 185.

It has been contended before me that the meaning of the doctrine in these cases is, that the Doar mortgage is to be paid not out of the entire proceeds of sale, in such shares to Doar and the creditors, respectively, as I have above held they are to receive, but the entire amount due on the Doar mortgage is to be paid by Fraser out of that portion of the proceeds of sales which would have been his, if he had not had notice of that mortgage, and that the entire amount so paid is to be retained by the executors of Doar, while the creditors still receive the balance coming to them, after deducting the full amount due on the Fraser mortgage. Not only do I not believe this to be the true doctrine of those cases, but even if it was, I would regard such a ruling, which would thus punish Fraser for the failure of the executors of Doar to record their mortgage, as so repugnant to reason, justice, and equity that I would not feel bound by the authorities cited, but would still report as I have done and await the decision of our own courts.

In applying, however, the rule of apportionment I have adopted in the distribution of the proceeds of sale of Jack's Bluff and Elmwood, an equity arises which seriously affects the portion coming to the creditors. It is a familiar principle in marshalling assets, that where one of two creditors holds two securities for the payment of the same debt, and another creditor holds a subsequent lien or claim on the property included in only one of these securities, the creditor so holding the double security will be required to first exhaust the security in which the other creditor has no interest, before seeking payment out of the property on which alone that other creditor must rely for the payment of his claim. For the "advances" proved by the defendant, R. E. Fraser, in this case, he holds a double security, namely, the mortgage of Jack's Bluff and Elmwood, and the bill of sale of the turpentine, naval stores, and rice on those places at its date.

In ascertaining, therefore, the amount due on the claim of R. E. Fraser, which is to be paid out of the proceeds of sale of Jack's Bluff and Elmwood, he must be required to first exhaust the turpentine, naval stores, and rice for the payment of his "advances," and can only claim the balance of "advances" then left unpaid, and the amount due on the promissory note, under his mortgage of Jack's Bluff and Elmwood. And, therefore, the extent to which his recorded mortgage will protect the unrecorded mortgage of the executors of Doar is to be fixed, not by the whole amount due on his claim, but by the balance remaining due after this equity of the creditors has been enforced. In other words, Fraser's mortgage cannot protect the Doar mortgage beyond the amount Fraser can equitably, as well as apparently, claim under that mortgage as against the creditors. And, as we have seen, the only amount he can equitably claim under his mortgage, as against the creditors, is the balance left after exhausting the turpentine, naval stores, and rice in payment.

The decree of the Circuit Judge was a simple order confirming this report.

Mr. T. M. Mordecai, for plaintiff and the general creditors.

Messrs. J. P. Lesesne and Isaac Hayne, for the executors of Doar.

Messrs. Rutledge & Young and J. W. Perry, for respondents.

November 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The pleadings and earlier proceedings are not in the "Case," but from the very full report of master Hancel, it appears that prior to 1876 there had been a partnership between the plaintiff, S. B. King, and the defendant, S. S. Fraser, under the style of "S. B. King & Co.," in carrying on the business of a turpentine farm and store called "Six Mile store," in Georgetown County; that this copartnership was not successful, and in 1876 was dissolved, its available assets realized, and all the debts paid, mostly by S. S. Fraser, to whom the other partner, S. B. King, was largely indebted.

Under these circumstances a new arrangement was made by the parties, which, as the master reports, was substantially as follows: "It was agreed that S. S. Fraser should purchase in his own name and with his own funds two tracts of land in the County of Charleston (now Berkeley), known as 'Jack's Bluff' and 'Elmwood,' for the purpose of carrying on the business of a turpentine farm, and that in some sort of connection therewith (not very clearly shown by the evidence) he should establish at South Santee Ferry a general store called 'Romney,' the entire business of both places to be carried on in the name of S. S. Fraser, and one to be designated as 'Elmwood,' and the other as 'Romney.' * * * The plaintiff, King, was to have immediate charge of the active operations of the farm and store, while Fraser was to direct and control these operations and to have the entire management of the finances; and that, for his services, King was to receive as compensation one-half of the net profits after paying all expenses," &c.

In putting on foot this new arrangement, S. S. Fraser purchased "Jack's Bluff" and "Elmwood" from the executors of Doar, took titles in his own name, and had them regularly recorded February 1, 1877; and at the same time he executed a mortgage of the premises to secure the credit portion of the purchase money; but the executors of Doar neglected to record this mortgage until January 7, 1879. The business was not a success, and after the date of the aforesaid mortgage to the executors of Doar, other debts were contracted, which need not be specifically mentioned, except the following: First. To R. E. Fraser, part by promissory note for $1,297.46, secured by mortgage of Jack's Bluff and Elmwood, and also by an account for advances, $610.11, which was secured by a bill of sale of certain naval stores, and also covered by the aforesaid mortgage. The aggregate amount of this debt was about $1,917.57, secured by the mortgage aforesaid

December 17, 1878, which was regularly recorded within the time prescribed by law. Second. To Thomas R. Sessions, for $761.22, secured by mortgage of "one still and fixtures, two mules, one horse, and two wagons," &c., on the place of S. S. Fraser, on Wambaw Creek, &c. This mortgage was executed December 10, 1878, and it seems was regularly recorded. Third. General unsecured creditors of S. S. Fraser. All these debts were contracted after the mortgage was executed to the executors of Doar, and without notice of it, except that of R. E. Fraser, which was contracted after the execution of said mortgage, but it was admitted that at the time he took his mortgage he had actual notice of the then unrecorded mortgage to the executors of Doar.

R. E. Fraser, by virtue of his bill of sale of naval stores, and T. R. Sessions, under his mortgage, commenced actions for the claim and delivery of the property covered by them respectively as the property of their debtor, S. S. Fraser. To this S. B. King, who was in possession, objected, and claiming that he was a copartner in the business, and entitled to an interest in the property, instituted these proceedings for an account, injunction, &c. The moving creditors were enjoined, and all being called in, the master made a full and exhaustive report, finding as follows: First. That the plaintiff, King, was not the partner of S. S. Fraser in the legal commercial sense of the word, either in the business of the turpentine farm at "Elmwood," or that of the store at "Romney;" that all the real and personal property employed in the business belonged to S. S. Fraser, and he alone had the right to encumber it. Second. That the mortgage and bill of sale of R. E. Fraser, and the mortgage of Sessions, are all good securities for valuable consideration, and must rank as liens, except as they may be affected by the failure of the executors of Doar to record their mortgage within the time prescribed by law; and upon that subject he held that the Doar mortgage, which was not recorded within time, was not a valid lien as against creditors of the mortgagor, whose debts were contracted between the date and the registry thereof, except that of R. E. Fraser, who had actual notice of the execution and existence thereof; and, finally, that in this peculiar state of facts, the proceeds of the sale of the said premises should be distributed as follows:

1. R. E. Fraser, *after exhausting the personal property covered by his bill of sale, to be paid the amount due on his mortgage, less the amount due on the Doar mortgage. 2. The general creditors to be paid the balance, if any, which would remain if the Fraser mortgage were paid in full; and, 3. The executors of Doar to be paid the difference between what the creditors receive, if any, and the whole amount of their mortgage, &c.

To this report exceptions were filed, and the cause coming on to be heard by Judge Hudson, he overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report. From this decree the plaintiff, King, appeals: I. Because the court should have decided that there was a partnership between S. B. King and S. S. Fraser subsequently to December 31, 1876. II. Because the court should have decided that the mortgages of S. S. Fraser to R. E. Fraser and to T. R. Sessions were respectively illegal and void so far as the creditors and the plaintiff are concerned. III. Because the court should have decided that the bill of sale from S. S. Fraser to R. E. Fraser, not having been recorded, and not being a mortgage, was invalid as against the creditors and the plaintiff. IV. Because the court should have decided that R. E. Fraser must first exhaust the proceeds of the personalty covered by the bill of sale, and that out of the proceeds of the sale of the lands he was only entitled to receive the balance so remaining unpaid, and that Fraser having admitted notice of the mortgage to the executors of Doar, such mortgage being void as against subsequent creditors to the extent of the amount due on such mortgage, the general subsequent creditors are entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the lands, and that the executors of Doar are simply general unsecured creditors.

The executors of Doar appeal: I. Because the presiding judge erred in holding that because the mortgage from S. S. Fraser to the executors of Doar was not recorded until after the expiration of forty days from the date of its execution, it is not a valid lien as against creditors of the mortgagor, whose debts were contracted between the date of its delivery and that of its record. II. Because his honor should have held that when the mortgage was recorded the mortgagees acquired a valid lien upon the mortgaged premises as of the date of its record; and in the distribu*tion of the sale of said premises, said mortgagees are entitled to rank as lien creditors, as of the date of the record of the mortgage, against all the creditors, alike those contracted prior to the execution of the mortgage, and those contracted between the date of the mortgage and that of its registry, and also those contracted subsequent to the record.

Whether there was such partnership between the plaintiff, King, and S. S. Fraser, as gave to King an interest in property purchased and paid for by Fraser and conveyed to him alone, was a question of fact as to which both the master and the Circuit Judge found that no such partnership existed. Under these circumstances this court will not disturb the finding, unless it is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. We have looked carefully through all the evidence in the case, which, it is admitted, is somewhat conflicting, but, taking it as a whole, we are unable to say that the finding is unsustained. The exceptions making this point are overruled.

This brings us to the most important question in the case, viz., whether the omission on the part of the executors of Doar to put their mortgage on record within forty days after its execution, although recorded afterwards and before the commencement of this suit, made it absolutely invalid as to all debts of the mortgagor contracted between its execution and registry; that is to say, whether a mortgage recorded after the time prescribed by law has a lien, as of that date, with the ordinary incidents of a lien as to all debts which at that time are unsecured or shorn of these incidents, as to that class of debts which were contracted between the execution and delivery thereof. This is a new question in this State, the precise point, so far as we know, never having arisen before; and it is certainly one not free from difficulty, arising principally from the terms of the general registration act of 1876, which it is now necessary to consider.

It has been truly said that there is no subject upon which our law has been more confused and obscure than that of registry, both as to the effect of omission to record, and of recording within as well as after the time prescribed by law. The act of 1843 (11 Stat., 256) embraced only mortgages, and as to them it made no provision for recording

fied the general provision "that no mortgage of real estate shall be valid so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers, &c., unless the same shall be recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances," &c. As this act did not touch absolute conveyances, the confusion as to them still continued until 1847, when the old Court of Errors, after repeated argument in the case of Steele v. Mansell (6 Rich., 438), decided that an absolute conveyance of land never recorded was not thereby absolutely void, but as between the parties was still good; that if recorded within time the deed took effect from its date, and that if recorded after the time it did not have reference back to the date of the deed, but took effect and was notice to all the world from the date of its actual registry.

Thus the rule as to the effect of registry was not the same as to mortgages and absolute conveyances, and this discrepancy continued down to 1876, when the legislature (probably with the view of harmonizing this difference, and establishing one uniform system upon the subject) passed the general registration act (16 Stat., 92, re-enacted as section 1776 of the General Statutes), which repealed all former laws "inconsistent with it," and dealing with the registry of both mortgages and absolute conveyances, made as to both precisely the same regulations, which, as might have been expected, were the compound result of adding to the mortgage act (1843) the principles which had been declared in Steele v. Mansell as to the legality and effect of recording a deed after the time prescribed by law.

Possibly from this cause has arisen the obscurity of the act which, so far as relates to the point in question, is as follows: "And generally all instruments in writing now required by law to be recorded in the office of register of mesne conveyance, or in the office of the secretary of the State, delivered or executed after the first day of January, 1877, shall be valid so as to affect, from the time of such delivery or execution, the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, only when recorded within forty days from the time of such delivery or execution in the office of the register of mesne conveyance of the county where the property affected thereby is situated, &c. Provided, nevertheless, that the above mentioned deeds or instruments in *writing, if recorded subsequent to the expiration of said period of forty days, shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, only from the date of such record," &c.

If this section were to be considered without reference to the proviso, there would be little difficulty. Ignoring the proviso, it is clear that the body of the section declares that, without recording, none of the instruments referred to would be valid as to any debts "without notice," whether contracted before or after the date of the instrument in question; but it goes on to provide that if recorded within the time prescribed, said instrument shall be valid even as to all "subsequent creditors without notice," reaching back to the time of the delivery of the instrument. Without the proviso the section would be substantially the same as the act of 1843 in reference to mortgages, which was several times before this court, notably in the case of Williams v. Beard, 1 S. C., 309, and McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq., 223 [94 Am. Dec. 164], which are not, however, applicable to the general act now under consideration; and see Herring & Co. v. Cannon, 21 S. C., 212 [53 Am. Rep. 661], as to an entire failure to record.

But the addition of the proviso in the act of 1876 makes a very material change in the law, applying to the registry of mortgages substantially the same rules which were declared as to the registry of absolute conveyances in the case of Steele v. Mansell, supra; and the question now presented is as to the effect of a mortgage recorded out of time upon the general unsecured debts contracted by the mortgagor between the time of the execution and registry of the mortgage. This makes it necessary to construe the proviso, the important words of which are: "shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, only from the date of such record," &c. There cannot be the least doubt that this provision was intended to give to a mortgage, though recorded out of time, some "effect" upon the class of creditors indicated; not, however, to reach back to the date of the mortgage, as in the case of one recorded within time, but only from the time of recording.

It is obvious that this postponement of the lien must seriously *affect the rights of the mortgagee, especially in respect to liens, which, in the mean time, may have been acquired by others. While the lien of a mortgage not recorded in time is in abeyance for the lack of registry, other creditors of the mortgagor may come in and acquire liens upon his property, which will take precedence over the mortgage without regard to its date. This is not expressly declared, but results necessarily from the postponement of the lien of the mortgage and the general nature of liens as to which time is the essential thing. So far, therefore, as there may be conflict between liens, there is no obscurity, for as to them it is only necessary to inquire which is the first in the order of time. We may also say in passing that if the property is actually purchased before the mortgage is recorded, and without actual notice, the innocent purchaser will undoubtedly take it unaffected by the dormant lien of the unrecorded mortgage.

So far, then, there is no difficulty, but the matter is not so plain as to what is the effect of a mortgage recorded after the time upon general debts contracted after its execution without notice, and which are found in the condition of unsecured debts at the time the mortgage is recorded and its lien attaches. It is certainly the general rule that a bona fide lien, no matter when entered, from that time forth has priority over all debts which are then unsecured, without the least regard to their date. This is involved in the very nature of a lien as against general unsecured debts. For example, we suppose that as soon as the Dear mortgage was recorded, the lien then taking effect, at once gave it priority even over debts (if any) contracted before the mortgage was executed.

It is, however, earnestly contended that the terms of the proviso make an exception in favor of such debts as were contracted between the execution and registry of the mortgage, for the reason that during that time the mortgage not being recorded, they were without notice; and, further, that this immunity, this shield from the lien of the mortgage, still remains over and protects this class of creditors from the mortgage, even after it is recorded and has become an effective lien as to all other persons, and for all other purposes. This view seems to pre-ceed upon the ground *that the exemption from the lien of the mortgage having existed during the time it was not recorded, may be said to have then attached as a charge, incumbrance, or a lien, which continues even after the mortgage is recorded, and acquires a lien, of which they have notice; in other words, that their exemption arising from want of notice continues even after they have notice.

For several reasons we hesitate to accept this view. In order to reach a satisfactory conclusion on the point, it is necessary first to settle clearly who are the persons meant by "subsequent creditors and purchasers without notice." The exact phrase occurs twice in the section, once in the body, and once in the proviso. Where it occurs in the first connection, it is plain that the creditors meant to be described are those whose debts were contracted between the execution and registry of the mortgage, "subsequent" having reference to the execution; and we see no reason to suppose that the very same phrase, when used in the proviso, has reference to a different class of creditors, and is limited to those whose debts were contracted "subsequent" to the recording instead of the execution of the mortgage. Besides those becoming creditors after the recording could not, with any propriety, be referred to as "without notice."

This being clearly settled, it would seem that the terms of the proviso itself negative the idea that a mortgage registered out of time is absolutely null and void as to all debts contracted between the execution and registry thereof, for it declares in express terms that such mortgage so registered "shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors," &c. It seems to us that there never could have been a doubt upon the subject, but for the last clause in the proviso, which makes the ambiguous declaration that such effect shall be "only from the date of such record," which, it is contended, limits the lien of the mortgage after registry to future debts, leaving the rights of the class of prior creditors before described entirely unaffected as they existed before registry.

There are insuperable difficulties in the way of this being taken to be the true construction. In the first place it would be inconsistent with the very sentence in which the phrase occurs, for that expressly declares that such mortgage so registered

"shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors without notice," &c.; and, as we have seen, all these being prior to the recording, it is plain that the vitality given to the mortgage by registry was not intended to be limited to future debts counting forward "from the date of the record." Besides, it is not denied that the lien of the mortgage thus recorded is valid as to all debts contracted before the execution of the instrument, and therefore not falling within the category of those styled "subsequent."

It is not perfectly clear, but we suppose that upon this point some confusion may have arisen from interpreting the word "from" in a sense which was really not intended. Considering the subject matter and the context, we cannot doubt that the phrase "from the date of such record" was intended, not to fix that as the point from which the lien of the mortgage was to operate forwards, but simply to indicate the time at which it received vitality; or, in other words, that the registry fixed the time at which the mortgage becomes a lien, but not the date of the debts which, as such, it might affect, according to the condition, as to being secured or unsecured, in which they were found at that time. Unless some effect upon this class of creditors was intended, why was the phrase inserted at all? The sense would have been more clear by omitting it entirely, leaving the provision as if it read, "shall not be valid to affect subsequent creditors, whose debts were contracted without notice."

If, then, the registry from its date gave the mortgage vitality to affect, in some way, the class of creditors indicated, as well as others, what was intended by the words, "valid to affect their rights," &c.? To say that a mortgage shall be valid, means, of course, valid as a mortgage, that is to say, a lien upon specific property, with the ordinary incidents of such lien, one of which is priority as to that particular property over all other debts of the mortgagor, which have not prior to that time ripened into a lien "To affect their rights." What rights and how? All creditors in common have certain rights, as the right to be paid, to sue to judgment, and to pursue the debtor in all the various modes allowed by law. But there are certain other rights which some possess and others do not; some have liens, and some have *none, and some may and some may not protect themselves by the equitable defence of being "subsequent creditors" without notice, &c. The whole tenor of the registry act shows that the "rights" therein spoken of, were those peculiar rights which appertained to the class indicated as subsequent creditors without notice of the mortgage; that is to say, the shield which protected them from the lien of the mortgage while it lay unrecorded and unknown. This was the only "right" in question or which could be "affected" by recording.

We can conceive of no effect of recording other than the putting an end to the exemption which arose from want of notice, and continued until notice was given by that recording, that the registry giving them notice at the same moment gives vitality to the mortgage as a lien with priority, as if the old mortgage had never existed and a new one had been executed and recorded on that day, the exemption arising from want of notice ceasing to exist as soon as notice is given. Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex. That this is what was meant by the phrase, "shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors," &c., conclusively appears by reference to the body of the section, where, in providing for the case of a mortgage recorded within time, the identical phrase is used to give priority to the mortgage over creditors whose debts were contracted subsequent to the execution of the instrument and without notice of it.

It seems clear to us that the principal object of the registry act was to require notice, and that it proceeds on the theory that recording is notice, whether made in or out of time. As foreshadowed by Judge Wardlaw in Steele v. Mansell: "Being without registration good as to the party who made it, the deed might, as to all other persons, be considered as if it had been executed on the day it was registered; in other words, as if it had been executed or acknowledged on that day. By delaying beyond a prescribed time, the grantee in a deed (or a mortgage) has lost the right to insist that the tardy registration shall have relation to the date of the deed so as to provide against intervening claims; but why should he lose the benefit of registration from the day it was made?"

It is, however, urged against this construction, that it must *operate as a hardship to the creditor who trusts the mortgagor without knowing that there was in existence a mortgage not recorded. We have considered and reconsidered this suggestion, and we confess we are unable to see the alleged hardship, beyond that which every creditor encounters when he trusts another upon faith in his ability to pay and his honesty and fair dealing. It is very true that our law properly denounces all manner of secret liens, that is, liens having an existence on property, without its being known; but this can hardly be said to extend to the case of a mere possibility of becoming a lien. Every debtor has the right to give a bona fide preference to one creditor over others, and this right is beyond the control of those others, who must be presumed to be aware of it and to extend credit subject to that risk. There is no obligation on the part of the creditor to whom a mortgage may be given, to record his debt, and as to the mortgage, he may omit to record or record it out of time, suffering therefor only the penalties imposed by the law. An unrecorded mortgage is in no sense a secret lien, nor, indeed, any lien at all until it is recorded. Up to that time it is precisely as if it had no existence, invalid and unknown to the creditor. It is difficult to understand how it could mislead or operate as a fraud upon him. It is true that as soon as the mortgage is recorded it becomes a lien, not, however, reaching back over the period in which the debts were contracted, but only from the date of record; the very act which makes it a lien also gives notice to the world. So far as other creditors are concerned, it would seem to be the same in effect as the giving a new mortgage or changing the date of the old one on that day.

Nor can we concur in the view suggested, that the object of registration is for the protection of the mortgagor, in order, as claimed, to secure him from the temptation of dealing with property as unencumbered which he has himself encumbered. The creditor may be ignorant of the existence of the unrecorded mortgage, and on that account he is protected until it is recorded, giving him notice; but the mortgagor certainly has knowledge of it in its inchoate state; and while the omission of the mortgagee to record may be his fault or misfortune, that surely can afford no excuse for the mortgagor to disregard what he knows to be the condition *of the property as to encumbrances. As we understand it, the object of the registration act was to give notice to the public, especially to creditors and purchasers, and not for the benefit of the mortgagor, who is bound by all the mortgages executed by him, whether they are recorded or not.

It must not be overlooked that the act of 1843 is no longer the law in relation to the recording of mortgages, but has been absorbed and superseded by that of 1876, which makes precisely the same provisions as to the registry of "all instruments in writing now required by law to be recorded," including mortgages and absolute conveyances; and, as to all, legalizes recording out of time, on the simple condition that the paper so recorded shall be valid only from the date of such record. This is a great advance as to systematizing our perplexed registry law, and in order to sustain and promote this effort at symmetry, it seems to us that it is incumbent on this court to make its decisions in regard to the registry of different kinds of instruments in the same spirit of consistency and uniformity.

The act of 1876 has not been before this court for construction, except in the single case of McNamee & Co. v. Huckabee, 20 S. C., 190. That case was in reference to the registry of absolute conveyances, and involved the question as to the effect of the registry of two deeds of the same land, each of which was recorded out of time, and it was held that deeds, under the registry act of 1876, not recorded within forty days, are valid as against subsequent creditors and purchasers without notice, only from the date of record; execution of the second deed before the registry of the first, and recording out of time, being equivalent to execution after the first and recording within time, as in Steele v. Mansell, supra.

In Piester v. Piester (22 S. C., 139 [53 Am. Rep. 711]), this court held that the mortgage in that case, recorded out of time, was void as to creditors whose debts were contracted after the execution and before its registry. But that case was not decided under the act of 1876. The question arose in the settlement of the estate of David B. Piester, who died in 1869, and, of course, both the mortgage and the debt of Wright, the "subsequent creditor," were executed before the passage of the act of 1876, and necessarily fell under the operation of the act of 1843. The case was decided right under the provisions of that act, which, as has been stated, did not recognize in any way the legality of registry out of time. It was, so far as the subsequent creditor, Wright, was concerned, precisely the same as if the mortgage to the probate judge had never been recorded at all. The court said: "It cannot be necessary to do more than to refer to the express terms of the act of 1843, which declares mortgages invalid as against subsequent creditors for valuable consideration, unless the same shall be recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance within sixty days from the execution thereof, which was not done," &c.

The case of Cameron, Hull & Co. v. Marvin (26 Kans., 622), cited at the bar, involved, as we think, a point very analogous to that under consideration. The law of Kansas required that every conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage of personal property not actually delivered, "shall be absolutely void as against the creditors of the mortgagor and as against subsequent purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, unless the mortgage or a true copy shall be forthwith deposited in the office of the register of deeds, in the county where the property shall then be situated," &c. One Patterson executed mortgages of personal property, and among them one or more (March 2, 1880) to Cameron, Hull & Co., who failed to record them. Afterwards Patterson contracted a debt to Goodnow & Co. On June 3, 1880, Cameron, Hull & Co. took possession of the property under their mortgages which had not been recorded. On June 11, eight days after, the subsequent creditors commenced action by attachment, and under this process the sheriff seized the property. The holders of the unrecorded mortgages, Cameron, Hull & Co., brought an action of replevin against the sheriff, and the question was, whether they, as mortgagees, or "the subsequent creditors," Goodnow & Co., were entitled to the property; and it was held that the mortgages, from the time the mortgagees took possession, must be considered as valid, and the plaintiffs had a verdict.

In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge Valentine said: "We will assume that the mortgages were void as against Goodnow & Co. and all the subsequent creditors up to the time when *the plaintiffs took possession of the property, and will simply discuss the question whether they continued to be void after that time. Did the mortgages become valid when the plaintiffs took possession of the property under them? We think we must answer this question in the affirmative. [Citing many authorities.] Mr. Jones, in his work on chattel mortgages, says that if a mortgagee takes possession of the property before any other right or lien attaches, his title under the mortgage is good against everybody, although it be not acknowledged and recorded. Counsel for the defendant in error seem to contend that when a chattel mortgage is not recorded immediately after its execution, and the property is not immediately delivered, it is absolutely void as to all creditors whose debts have been created subsequent to the execution of the mortgage and prior to its being recorded. * * *

"Of course a chattel mortgage not recorded of personal property not delivered is void as to all creditors who have no notice of the mortgage; but they have no right to, nor interest in, any specific property until they have obtained this right or interest by some legal process. They have no more right to the property than the mortgagee has, whose mortgage is void. They all have an equal right to the property—that is, they all have a right to procure a lien upon it, and the one who first acts will obtain the prior right. The mortgagor has a continuing right to mortgage his property. He has the right to prefer one creditor over another. And if the mortgagee, whose mortgage is not recorded, and who does not have possession of the property, records his mortgage with the consent of the mortgagor, &c., his mortgage then has the force and effect of a mortgage executed on the day on which it is filed for record, or on which the property is delivered. It is the same thing as though a new mortgage had been executed by the parties and recorded. The old mortgage is then given life and force and effect by the joint action of both parties, and hence must be held to be valid from that time on as against all persons," &c. Our act recognizes registry, not only within the time, but afterwards. It is the right of the mortgagee to record, which he may or may not exercise in or out of time with or without the consent of the mortgagor.

"If, as Mr. Dwaris states, considerations of inconvenience are allowable in construing a doubtful statute, it seems to us that the construction contended for, giving to a particular class of general creditors an anomalous character, yielding to some liens and overriding others—would in practice be fruitful of untold "complications, inconveniences, hardships, and embarrassments," creating indeed in this case what the learned master so aptly styled "a curious puzzle." Under what we conceive to be the proper construction of the act, no such complication can arise. The Doar mortgage, although recorded out of time, from that date became valid as a lien, and as such had priority over all the general debts of the mortgagor which had not then become liens, regardless of the time they were contracted as prior or subsequent; and as to the mortgage of Fraser, who had actual notice, it (the Doar mortgage) was, according to its date, the first lien, and from the proceeds of the mortgaged premises must be first paid, and the mortgage of Fraser second.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so as to conform to the conclusions herein announced, and in all other respects be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting. I am unable to concur in the construction given to the act of 1876, and, on the contrary, agree with the view taken by the master and adopted by the Circuit Judge. The question is so fully and satisfactorily discussed by master Hanckel in his able and elaborate report that it would be a work of supererogation to go at large into the argument. I propose simply to indicate some of the points which, to my mind, are conclusive.

The language of the statute to be construed, so far as it relates to the particular question with which we are concerned, is as follows: "All mortgages, or instruments in writing in the nature of a mortgage, of any property, real or personal, * * * should be valid so as to affect, from the time of such delivery or execution, the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, only when recorded within *forty days from the time of such delivery or execution. * * * Provided, nevertheless, that the above mentioned deeds, or instruments in writing, if recorded subsequent to the expiration of said period of forty days, shall be valid to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration without notice only from the date of such record." The question to be determined is, whether the Doar mortgage, which was not recorded within forty days from its execution, takes precedence of the general creditors whose claims were incurred between the time of the execution of that mortgage and the time when it was recorded.

The turning point of the inquiry, as it seems to me, is whether the words "subsequent creditors and purchasers" in the proviso to the act mean persons whose claims arose subsequent to the date of the mortgage, whose validity is in question, or subsequent to the record of such mortgage. I think they refer to the latter, and not to the former period. There can be no doubt, and I understand it to be conceded, that if the body of the act stood alone, without the proviso, the result would be that a mortgage not recorded until after the time allowed for that purpose would have no validity as against the claims of creditors or purchasers subsequent to the date of such mortgage; for the language of the act of 1876, that a mortgage shall be valid so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers without notice, only when recorded within forty days, is in effect the same as that used in the act of 1843, which substantially declared that no mortgage should be valid so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers without notice, unless it shall be recorded within sixty days. To say that a mortgage shall be valid only when recorded, is tantamount to saying that no mortgage shall be valid unless it is recorded, &c.

The language of the act of 1843 has been construed by the courts of this State in several cases to mean that a mortgage not recorded within time has no validity as against subsequent creditors or purchasers without notice, and this, therefore, would be the proper construction of the act of 1876, without the proviso. McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq., 222 [94 Am. Dec. 164]; Williams v. Beard, 1 S. C., 309; and Piester v. Piester,

22 S. C., 139 [53 Am. Rep. 711]. The *inquiry, then, is as to the effect of the proviso. Was its purpose anything more than to relieve a mortgagee who had neglected to record his mortgage within time from the extreme penalty, which under the body of the act he would incur, of having his mortgage declared of no validity as against the claims, not only of creditors or purchasers subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, but also of those subsequent to the recording of such mortgage, by declaring that as to this latter class his mortgage should have validity from the time it was actually recorded, inasmuch as from that time forward the public would have notice of his lien, and therefore any one who dealt with the mortgagor subsequent to that time must be affected by such lien?

The object of the proviso was simply to qualify the very general terms used in the body of the act and to confine the protection afforded by them to the class of creditors and purchasers who needed and deserved protection, viz., those who had dealt with the mortgagor without knowing, or having the means of knowing, of the mortgage, and to deprive another class of creditors and purchasers of that protection to which they would not be entitled, though under the general terms of the act, unqualified by the proviso, they could claim it, viz., those who dealt with the mortgagor after they had the means of knowing of the existence of the lien by the recording of the mortgage, and who chose subsequently to that time to deal with the mortgagor.

This, it seems to me, is the proper construction of the act. The other view would lead to the very singular result of giving superior efficacy to constructive over actual notice, and this certainly was not the intention of the act. For if the Doar mortgage had never been recorded, and the simple contract creditors had received actual notice of it after their claims were contracted, this would not give the mortgage any validity as against such claims, and yet it is contended that mere constructive notice, arising from the record of the mortgage after the claims of the simple contract creditors were contracted, and after the time allowed by law for recording the mortgage, will give the mortgage a validity against these claims, which actual notice would not do.

Again, the construction contended for involves the necessity *of interpolating words into the statute, for which I find no warrant; for, practically, by that construction the word "creditors" must be read "judgment or other lien creditors." The act, in express terms, declares that creditors, not judgment or lien creditors, subsequent to the execution of a mortgage, shall not be affected by it, unless it is recorded within forty days; and yet it is contended, practically, that a creditor who has acquired no lien prior to the recording of a mortgage, will be affected by such a mortgage, even though it be not recorded until after the lapse of forty days. This, it seems to me, is extending protection to that class of creditors who do not need it—lien creditors—and withholding it from that class—unsecured creditors—who do need it, and defeats the main object of the registry law, which is notice—not notice to the creditor after, but before, his debt is contracted.

Again, it will be observed that the word "subsequent" qualifies the word "purchasers" as well as the word "creditors," and therefore we may legitimately test the construction by reading the act as if purchasers were the only class intended to be protected. So reading the act it seems clear that the words "subsequent creditors and purchasers" in the proviso mean persons whose claims arose subsequent to the recording, and not the date, of the mortgage. For it must be, and is, conceded that a mortgage recorded out of time cannot affect the rights of a purchaser who has bought the property subsequent to the date, but prior to the recording, of such mortgage, and as the same protection is extended in the same language to a creditor, it is difficult to understand why a creditor, whose debt was contracted subsequent to the date, but prior to the recording, of the mortgage, should not receive the same protection against the mortgage, as it is admitted a purchaser could claim.

It is a mistake to suppose that if the word "subsequent" in the proviso has relation to the time of recording of the mortgage, and not to its date, that then there would have been no necessity for the provision contained in the proviso. Such a view proceeds upon the erroneous assumption that the recording of a mortgage after the time limited for that purpose, would operate as constructive notice, and therefore that all persons who became creditors or purchasers after that time, having constructive notice of the mortgage, would be bound by it. But prior to the act of 1876 the recording of a mortgage out of time did not operate even as constructive notice, and hence, according to my view, the principal object of the proviso was to enable it so to operate: and therefore the legislature very properly declared that such a mortgage should be valid as against subsequent creditors and purchasers without notice "only from the date of such record," meaning that from that time it should operate as notice to all who might subsequently thereto become creditors of, or purchasers from, the mortgagor. Otherwise the anomaly would be presented of having a creditor or purchaser affected by notice after the debt was contracted or the purchase made, when it would be difficult to understand what good the notice would do.

It seems to me, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Judgment modified.

In this case a petition for rehearing was filed by the unsecured creditors upon the ground that their counsel were absent at the hearing, because they had not expected the case to be reached as soon as it was; that they then applied for the appointment of a time when they might be heard orally, which the court declined, but gave them leave to file printed arguments.

December 2, 1885. The following order was passed—

PER CURIAM. It is not claimed that any material fact or principle was overlooked by this court in rendering its recent judgment in this case, the only ground stated in the petition for rehearing being that the petitioners had no opportunity for oral argument when the appeal was heard. It will be observed from the correspondence submitted with the petition that the court did not decline to hear oral argument in the case, but declined to fix a time for such hearing out of order, of which the petitioner had notice. The failure to hear oral argument, therefore, was not the fault of the court. Hence there is no ground for a rehearing. The petition is dismissed.

*WALTERS v. KRAFT.

(April Term, 1885.)

[Reported and annotated in 55 Am. Rep. 44.]

[1. Limitation of Actions ¶155.]

Where a principal and sureties gave their joint and several promissory note, upon which, after maturity, the principal debtor, from time to time, made several payments, the legal liability of all the parties to the note was discharged at the expiration of six years from its maturity, and thereafter action could be maintained only on the new promise implied from the partial payments credited on the note.

But as such subsequent promise constituted a new contract and a new cause of action, no one is liable except him who made it; the liability of the sureties was not continued by the payments and promises of the principal debtor.

[3. Limitation of Actions ☞155.]

The relation of agency does not exist between joint-debtors arising from community of interest; their community of interest is confined to the payment of the debt. Payment by a principal debtor cannot continue the obligation of a surety, beyond his consent, beyond the period fixed by the original contract.

4. Silman v. Silman (2 Hill, 416) is inconsistent with Smith v. Caldwell (15 Rich. 378), and was practically overruled by this later case. Mr. Justice McGowan, dissenting.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, April, 1885.

This was an action by Caroline Walters against P. W. Kraft and others, the makers of a joint and several promissory note. The judge refused several requests to charge made by the sureties, and did charge as follows:

1. That if P. W. Kraft had made a payment on the note within six years from its maturity, and this action was commenced within six years from that payment, the defense of the statute of limitations cannot avail the other defendants.

2. That the note carried with it a liability on all the makers for six years from the date of any payment made on it by any of the joint makers within six years from its maturity.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff against all of the defendants for $499.17.

From the judgment entered upon this verdict the defendants, Anna C. Kraft and the executors of Hei, duly appealed on exceptions, alleging error in the refusals to charge and the charge as made.

*Mr. LeRoy F. Youmans, for appellants. Messrs. Clark & Muller, contra.

November 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On May 29, 1872, P. W. Kraft, Anna C. Kraft, and E. F. Hei, executed their joint and several promissory note, whereby they promised to pay to the plaintiff or bearer thirty days after the date thereof five hundred dollars, with interest at two per cent. per month if not paid at maturity. The interest was regularly paid each year by P. W. Kraft, the principal debtor, the other two parties being his sureties, the last two payments of interest being dated, one on June 1, 1877, and the other on June 1, 1878, the latter being acknowledged to be for interest to January 1, 1879, on which day there was another payment by P. W. Kraft on account of the principal. The action was commenced on the note on February 21, 1880, and in the complaint the several payments endorsed on the note were set out, and judgment was demanded for the balance after deducting said payments, together with the interest on such balance. Pending the action the said E. F. Hei died testate, and the same has been regularly continued against his executors.

The defense relied upon by the sureties was the statute of limitations, and the only question raised by the appeal is whether the payments made by the principal debtor, before the statutory period as to the note had expired, would take the case out of the statute as to the sureties. There is no doubt that at one time the courts of this State held that a payment made by one of several joint makers of a note, whether before or after the statutory period had expired, would take the case out of the statute as to the others. Beitz v. Fuller, 1 McCord, 541 [10 Am. Dec. 693], following the famous case of Whitcomb v. Whiting, Doug., *629; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas., 318. Subsequently, however, this doctrine was modified, so that while payment made by one of several joint contractors before the statutory period had run out, might have the effect of taking the case out of the statute as to the others, yet that a payment made after the expiration of the statutory period would *have no such effect. Steele v. Jennings, 1 McMull., 297; Goudy v. Gillam, 6 Rich., 29; Smith v. Caldwell, 15 Rich., 365.

Again, it is manifest that in the earlier decisions the statute of limitations was, in disregard of the terms of the statute, regarded as raising a presumption of payment, and therefore anything that went to rebut such a presumption was regarded as sufficient to take a case out of the statute. Aiken v. Benton, 2 Brev., 330; Pearce v. Zimmerman, Harp., 305; Beitz v. Fuller, supra, and other cases of that class. But the later decisions, giving effect to the express language of the statute, which declared that the action shall be commenced within the time limited, "and not after," treat the statute as an absolute bar to the recovery of the debt, unaffected by any presumption that the debt was actually paid. Reigne v. Desportes, Dudley, 118; Smith v. Caldwell, supra. From this it logically followed that when the statutory period from the maturity of a note has run out before any action is commenced upon it, and reliance is placed upon a subsequent promise, whether express or implied, the action must be upon such promise, whether it is made before or after the expiration of the statutory period, and not upon the note.

As is said by O'Neill, J., in Reigne v. Desportes, at page 124: "The statute directs that the action of debt on simple contract and assumpsit shall be brought within four years next after the cause of said action or suit, and not after: the words of the statute are of plain and obvious meaning, and to give it effect only two questions need be asked: When did the cause of action accrue? Is the suit brought within four years from the accrual of the cause of action? * * * If more than four years intervenes between the time at which the party by his contract had the right to demand the payment and the institution of the suit, the bar of the statute is complete and effectual, and the cause of action is gone. But the old debt, as a past consideration, will support a new promise, for notwithstanding it cannot be legally enforced as a cause of action, yet if it has not been paid, the party who contracted it is in honesty * * * bound to pay it. This obligation of honesty and morality is a good consideration, and the new promise founded upon it will be enforced; but it is a new cause of action, not as the revival of the old one. For if *not regarded as a new cause of action, the words of the statute would prevent it from enabling the party to recover. Regard it as a new contract, a new cause of action, and the case is not affected by either the intent or the words of the statute." He then goes on to show that a contrary impression had grown up, from the fact that under the old form of pleading in assumpsit, a new promise could be treated as the real cause of action under the general counts in the declaration, and from "many loose expressions * * * to be found in the opinions of some of the most learned judges."

So in Smith v. Caldwell, supra, Wardlaw, J., in laying down certain propositions which are held to be settled, uses this language: "1. That the statute of limitations does not operate by raising a presumption of payment, but by creating a legal bar to the action. * * * 2. That where the statutory period, counting from the original accrual of the cause of action, expired before commencement of the suit, a promise shown for the purpose of opposing the plea of the statute, is itself the true cause of action; and this, whether such promise was made before or after the expiration of the period just mentioned. If before, the legal liability was its consideration: if after, the moral obligation. This proposition, under the general form of pleading which is allowed, is, in practice, unimportant, where the declaration is in assumpsit upon an executed consideration; but it is material in the declaration of the rights of parties wherever the new promise, and that alone, stands unaffected by the statute; and from this proposition it follows that payment, admission, and the like are but evidence of a promise to pay, and that whatever is said to revive a debt must operate through a promise expressed or implied."

It will be observed that these principles, announced by these two distinguished judges in the cases last cited, are deduced from the terms of the former statute of limitations, which required actions to be commenced within the time limited, and not after; but we think that the language of the present statute—"civil actions can only be commenced within the periods prescribed in this title"—is equally imperative, and requires the same construction. It follows, therefore, that this action, not having *been commenced within six years from the maturity of the note, cannot be maintained on the note, and the only question, assuming the action to be upon the subsequent promise implied by the payments, about which no question seems to have been raised, is as to whether the appellants are bound by such promise.

If this question be considered apart from authority, we do not see how there could be a doubt about it. If it be true, as we have shown it to be, that the legal liability of all the parties on the note is forever discharged by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to bring her action within six years from the maturity of the note, and that the plaintiff's only cause of action is the subsequent promise implied by the partial payments made by the principal debtor, P. W. Kraft, and credited on the note, then nothing would seem to be clearer than that no one is bound by such promise except the person who made it. If the subsequent promise, as we have seen, constitutes a new contract and a new cause of action, then certainly no one can be held liable to the performance of such new contract, except him who made it.

This is, and must necessarily be, conceded, but it is said that the act of one of several joint debtors, especially the act of making a payment on the note upon which they are all liable, is the act of all, as it enures to the benefit of all, and that the relation of agency exists between them, arising from community of interest. We are, however, unable to discover any just foundation in the nature of things for such an idea. Their community of interest is confined to the payment of the debt, and cannot be extended beyond that. There is certainly no reason why a payment by one of several joint contractors, which enures to the benefit of all, should carry with it the idea that the one who makes the payment has the authority to make a new contract for all. An agency to pay, implied from the common obligation, does not necessarily, or even naturally, involve the idea of an agency to make a new promise whereby the common obligation is continued for a longer period than that fixed by the original contract, in which all the parties joined. For that would practically amount to an alteration of the original contract by extending its legal effect beyond the time when its legal obligation would cease. And when we remember the well settled rule that any alteration *of the original contract by the creditor and principal debtor, without the assent of the surety, will discharge the surety, it would seem to follow necessarily that a payment made by the principal debtor, even before the statutory period has expired, cannot have the effect of continuing the legal obligation of the original contract beyond the period originally fixed for its duration, because that would be an alteration of one of the terms of the original contract.

A surety, when he signs a joint and several note with his principal, knows that unless the creditor brings his action on the note within six years from its maturity, his legal liability is discharged by the operation of the statute of limitations, and we are unable to see by what authority his liability can be extended beyond that period without his assent. One may be willing to assume a legal liability for another for a definite period, but it does not by any means follow that he would be willing to assume such liability for an indefinite period, dependent wholly upon the act of the other, to which he has not assented, and of which oftentimes he has no knowledge. So that it seems to us that it would be in violation of well settled principles to hold that a principal debtor can, by any promise of his own, either express or implied, without the assent of his surety, extend the legal obligation of such surety beyond the period originally fixed for its duration.

This notion that one of several joint debtors may, by his own act, without the consent of the others, defeat the operation of the statute of limitations upon the original contract, manifestly rests upon what is now conceded, and we believe universally conceded, to be an erroneous view of the statute, and is wholly inconsistent with the later and more correct view of the statute. As long as it was held that the statute operated "by raising a presumption of payment," and not "by creating a legal bar to the action," it was very natural that anything which went to rebut that presumption should affect all the parties to the contract alike, and hence any act of any one of those parties tending to show that the debt was not in fact paid, was held sufficient to defeat the plea of the statute, which was then, in effect, a plea of payment, inasmuch as it was assumed that motives of self-interest would deter every one of the parties to the contract from any act or omission which would show that the debt was not paid, if in fact it was paid.

Accordingly we find that originally no distinction was drawn between mere admissions or positive promises, and no distinction was drawn between promises, either express or implied, made before or after the expiration of the statutory period on the original contract. In fact, the whole question was regarded as one of payment, and therefore anything which went to defeat the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of the time fixed by the statute, was considered sufficient to defeat the plea of the statute. But when the later and more correct view of the statute became well settled—when it was definitely determined that the statute did not operate "by raising a presumption of payment," but "by creating a legal bar to the action;" and when it was distinctly decided "that where the statutory period, counting from the original accrual of the cause of action, expired before commencement of the suit, a promise shown for the purpose of opposing the plea of the statute, is itself the true cause of action; and this, whether such promise was made before or after the expiration of the period just mentioned," a different rule must necessarily be adopted; otherwise the anomalous result would follow that a man might be made liable upon a contract which he never made or authorized, and which in many, if not most, cases he knew nothing of. If, after the expiration of the statutory period, from the maturity of the note the statute is a legal bar to an action on the note, and resort must be had to a subsequent promise, either express or implied, as a new cause of action, it follows necessarily that no recovery can be had on such new cause of action against those who did not join in the subsequent promise which gave rise to such cause of action.

It is true that the conclusion at which we have arrived is in conflict with the decision in the case of Silman v. Silman, 2 Hill, 416; but it will be observed that in that case Judge O'Neill says that "the decisions that the promise of one joint contractor would take out of the statute a debt which would be otherwise barred, have been altogether founded in mistake," and in deciding otherwise only yields to what he calls "the unbroken *current of authorities," and yet he modifies those former decisions by drawing a distinction, which had first been clearly pointed out in Young v. Monpoe (2 Bail., 278), between a promise made before and one made after the expiration of the statutory period on the original contract, and confines the decision to cases in which the new promise was made before the expiration of the statutory period, for the reason that in such a case the new promise operates as a continuance of the original liability for four years from the date of such promise; but that where the new promise is made after the expiration of the statutory period, "the debt is gone, and the new promise or acknowledgment must show a sufficient cause of action to entitle the plaintiff to recover," meaning, doubtless, that the legal remedy for the collection of the debt is gone, and the action can only be maintained on the subsequent promise as a new cause of action.

Thus stood the law when the case of Smith v. Caldwell, supra, came before the late

Court of Appeals for decision, when we think the foundation upon which Silman v. Silman rested was swept away, and the case was practically overruled. This was the manifest view of the Circuit Judge, and at least one of the judges of the Court of Appeals, and what was the opinion of the other two does not very clearly appear: for according to the view which they took it was not necessary either to affirm or disaffirm the case of Silman v. Silman, but the principles or propositions which they declared settled are clearly inconsistent with the ground upon which Judge O'Neill placed the case of Silman v. Silman. For, as we have seen, judge O'Neill, drawing a distinction between a promise made before and one made after the expiration of the statutory period on the original contract, based his decision upon the idea that where the promise was made before the expiration of the original statutory period, it operated as a continuance of the then existing liability for another period of four years from the date of such promise; but this idea is clearly repudiated in the case of Smith v. Caldwell, and is entirely inconsistent with the conclusion there reached.

In that case, before the statutory period on the note had expired, Neuffer, the principal debtor, made one payment, and within four years after such payment he made another payment, *but the first was more than four years before the commencement of the action, and the second more than four years from the maturity of the note, but, deducting the time during which the statute of limitations was suspended by one of the sections of the stay law, within four years from the commencement of the action; and yet the court held that the action against Caldwell, the surety, was barred. Now, it is manifest that if the court had recognized the doctrine upon which Silman v. Silman was based, to wit, that the first payment operated as a continuance of the then existing liability of both parties for another period of four years from the date of such payment, the statute could not have been successfully pleaded, for during the second period of four years, over which, according to Silman v. Silman, the defendant's original liability had been extended, another payment was made, which, upon the same principle, ought to have extended his liability for another period of four years, within which the action was commenced. It is clear, therefore, that the decision in Smith v. Caldwell is entirely inconsistent with the principle upon which the case of Silman v. Silman was decided, and that it was practically overruled by that case, though the majority of the court did not deem it necessary so to declare in express terms, and we are not aware of any case in which it has been subsequently recognized.

Under this view the other question as to the effect of the provisions of the code of procedure cannot arise, and need not be considered.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court against Anna C. Kraft and the executors of E. F. Hei be reversed, and that the case, as to them, be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN, dissenting. I cannot concur in this judgment. It was held in the case of Silman v. Silman (2 Hill, 416) that "where the statute of limitations has not run out, the promise or acknowledgment of one of two joint makers of a note will prevent its operation against both; but where the bar of the *statute was complete, a promise or acknowledgment by one will only be obligatory on himself, and will not revive the demand against the other." &c. This decision was rendered in 1834, and has since been regarded as the settled law in South Carolina. In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge O'Neill said that he felt "constrained to yield to the unbroken current of authorities." The case has frequently been recognized and followed. Goudy v. Gillam, 6 Rich., 30; Bowdre v. Hampton, Ibid., 218; Smith v. Townsend, 9 Rich., 44. It does not seem to me that the case of Silman v. Silman was overruled by that of Smith v. Caldwell (15 Rich., 378), either directly or indirectly. It is certainly not claimed in the case itself, and Judge Inglis did not concur in the judgment, for the reason that he could not make the decision consist "with the yet acknowledged law, as authoritatively ascertained and announced in Silman v. Silman, 2 Hill, 416."

But if anything held in Smith v. Caldwell, supra, was inconsistent with the well-established doctrine of Silman v. Silman, this court, as late as 1883, in the cases of Shubrick v. Adams (20 S. C., 56) and Pyles v. Bell (Ibid., 369), reaffirmed the doctrine of Silman v. Silman, and held as follows: "In regard to the statute of limitations, the rule is well settled that after the debt is barred, nothing short of an express promise, or what is equivalent to such promise, will suffice to take a case out of the statute; but before the bar of the statute is complete, mere acknowledgments, as shown by part payment or otherwise, are sufficient to keep the original debt alive, by giving at each acknowledgment a new starting point for the running of the statute. Rucker v. Frazier, 4 Strob., 94; Lomax v. Spierin Dudley, 367; Bowdre v. Hampton, 6 Rich., 212." The case of Lomax v. Spierin was an acknowledgment by one of two executors, and it was announced that the principle drawn from all the cases was "that the debt is not barred if there has been a sufficient promise to pay at any time within four years from the commencement of the action."

This has certainly been considered the settled law, and, it seems to me, is correct in principle. A simple acknowledgment before the action is barred is sufficient to keep alive the original *obligation with all its incidents, and there is not in this any violation of the contract of the surety, for it was the law when he became surety, and he must be taken to have contracted with reference to the law as it existed. I greatly fear that the new rule now established will operate as a surprise upon parties and affect retroactively and disastrously the rights of creditors who have relied upon the rule as heretofore established.

New trial granted.

23 S. C. 588

GARDNER v. GARDNER.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Principal and Surety ¶105.]

A surety has the right to stand upon the contract as he made it, and if altered in any respect, it is no longer the contract that he made, and he cannot be bound by it. A valid agreement between the creditor and principal debtor, extending the time of payment, is such an alteration, and will discharge the surety even though not prejudicial to him.

[2. Principal and Surety ¶104.]

Where a creditor receives from the principal debtor payment of interest in advance on a past due note, an agreement to give time is necessarily implied, and the creditor thereby debars himself of suing meantime on the note, and the surety is therefore discharged—unless the creditor can show mistake, or, possibly, an agreement that the right of suit should not be suspended.

3. The question whether a sealed note which matured in 1860, and was credited with payments by the principal debtor down to 1865, should be presumed paid as to the sureties in 1884, raised but not considered. Mr. Justice McGowan dissenting.

Messrs. Allen J. Green and Abney & Abney, contra.

*November 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The questions raised by this appeal grow out of the following state of facts: On February 3, 1859, one E. W. Geiger executed his note under seal, with Samuel Gardner and J. H. Threewits as sureties, whereby he promised to pay Jacob Geiger, and A. W. Geiger, administrators of Godfrey H. Geiger, deceased, or bearer, the sum of $1,583.53, on February 3, 1860, with interest from date, payable annually. On this note sundry payments are endorsed as follows: February 3, 1860, interest to date; February 3, 1861, interest to date; February 3, 1862, interest to date; June 29, 1863, interest to date and $583.53 on the principal; March 3, 1865, interest to June 29, 1865. It is conceded, however, that the date of this last payment is erroneous, and that the true date is April 27, 1865. All of these payments were made by E. W. Geiger, the principal debtor, to Jacob Geiger, who seems to have had entire charge of the money matters of the estate of his intestate, and the credits endorsed are all signed by him. These payments were all made during the life-time of Samuel Gardner, who died in 1883. Jacob Geiger and Threewits, the other surety, are also dead.

This action was commenced on January 29, 1884, by the plaintiff, who had become the lawful owner and holder of the note above mentioned some time in 1870, against the administrators and heirs at law of Samuel Gardner, deceased, in the nature of a creditor's bill, and the fundamental inquiry is whether the estate of Samuel Gardner is still liable on said note. The defendants rely upon two defenses. First, the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time. Second, the discharge of the surety by reason of a change in the original contract, arising from the receipt by the creditor from the principal debtor of interest in advance, after the maturity of the note, which, it is contended, necessarily extended the time of payment to the day to which the interest was paid in advance. The Circuit Judge held that the presumption of payment could not arise, because twenty years had not elapsed from the date of the last payment to the time when the ac-evidence of a contract to give further time to the principal debtor, which would discharge the surety, and in the absence of other evidence would be conclusive; yet if there be other evidence, then it is a question of fact, upon all the evidence, whether there was such a contract. He then says: "There is other evidence in this case, and the facts and circumstances of this case rebut the idea that there was any contract to give further time," and accordingly found, as matter of fact, that there was no such contract. He therefore rendered judgment that the estate of Samuel Gardner was still liable on the note. From this judgment the defendants appeal, alleging error in each of the findings of the Circuit Judge.

We propose to consider, first, the question of the discharge of the surety. There can be no doubt that any alteration of the contract, without the assent of the surety, will discharge him from liability. It is equally certain that any valid agreement between the creditor and the principal debtor, whereby the former legally binds himself to extend the time of payment for any length of time, is such an alteration of the contract as will discharge the surety. It is a mistake to suppose, as has been argued, that the alteration, to be effectual as a discharge to the surety, must be to the prejudice of the surety. The surety has a right to stand upon the contract as he made it; and if it is altered in any respect, it is no longer the contract which he made, and he cannot be held bound by it. As is said by Mr. Justice Story in Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat., 703 [6 L. Ed. 189]: "Nothing can be clearer, both upon principle and authority, than the doctrine that the liability of a surety is not to be extended by implication beyond the terms of his contract. To the extent, and in the manner, and under the circumstances, pointed out in his obligation, he is bound, and no further. It is not sufficient that he may sustain no injury by a change in the contract, or that it may even be for his benefit. He has a right to stand upon the very terms of his contract; and if he does not assent to any variation of it, and a variation is made, it is fatal." These views are referred to with approval in Martin v. Thomas, 24 How., 317

[16 L. Ed. 689], and in Smith v. United States, 2 Wall., 234 [17 L. Ed. 788]. See, also, the notes to the case of Rees v. Berrington, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. (W. & T.), 974.

The cases cited by counsel for respondents to sustain the position that the alteration of the contract must be such as would be injurious in order to operate a discharge, do not establish any such doctrine. The case of McLemore v. Powell (12 Wheat., 554 [6 L. Ed. 726]) merely decides that an agreement to extend the time of payment, without consideration, will not discharge the endorser, for the simple reason that in such a case there is no valid agreement. The case of the United States v. Hodge (6 How., 279 [12 L.

Ed. 437]) simply decides that the taking of a mortgage as collateral security, in which time is given for the enforcement of such collateral security, where there is no valid agreement to give time to the principal debtor personally, does not discharge the sureties on the original debt.

In that case the action was on a postmaster's bond for twenty-five thousand dollars, given in 1836, and the defence was that the principal in the bond had, on August 15, 1837, given a mortgage to secure to the post-office department payment of a sum not exceeding sixty-five thousand dollars, or such sum as might be found due on a settlement, from and after six months from the date of the mortgage, and it was claimed that time having thus been given to the principal the sureties were discharged. But the court said, "Giving time for payment, to discharge the endorser, must operate upon the instrument endorsed by him. Now, if the post-office department had, by the mortgage, suspended the right of action on the bond for the time limited in the mortgage, it might have released the sureties. But no such condition is expressed, and none such can be implied." Here the principal entered into two obligations, and as the latter in no way affected the former, it could not, of course, have the effect of altering the contract evidenced by the bond upon which the sureties were sued, and their contract not having been changed, they could not claim to be discharged. As the court said: "The remedy on the collateral instrument is wholly immaterial, unless it discharges or postpones that on the original obligation. There is no such condition in the mortgage under consideration, and consequently it can in no respect affect or suspend the remedy of the post-office department on the bond."

The cases of Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C. 197, and Rosborough v. McAlley, 10 S. C. 235, have also been cited to sustain respondents' position, but an examination of those cases will show that they afford no support to the idea that the alteration of the contract, which will discharge a surety, must be such an alteration as will be injurious to the surety. In making the quotation from the former case to sustain the position contended for, the significance of the words "either" and "or" seems to have been overlooked. The language quoted is as follows: "That in order to discharge the surety, the creditor must do some act of positive character, either by entering into a valid contract with the principal debtor, varying the terms of the obligation by extending the time for its performance, or otherwise, or by doing some other act prejudicial to the interests of the surety, or he must omit, after demand from the surety, some duty imposed upon him whereby loss results to the surety, is a proposition too well settled to admit of dispute."

Now, the obvious meaning of this language is, that there are three things which will discharge a surety: First, a valid contract between the creditor and principal debtor, "varying the terms of the obligation by extending the time for its performance, or otherwise." Second, "doing some other act prejudicial to the interests of the surety." Third, omitting, "after demand from the surety, some duty imposed upon him (the creditor), whereby loss results to the surety." So that when a surety claims his discharge upon the first ground, it is only necessary for him to show that the contract into which he entered has been changed, either by extending the time for its performance, altering the rate of interest, or in any other way, and it is wholly immaterial to inquire whether such alteration is prejudicial to him, for the simple reason that a man cannot be made liable upon a contract different from that which he entered into. In the language of Judge Story: "He has a right to stand upon the very terms of his contract." But if he claims a discharge upon either of the other two grounds, then he must show that the *creditor has done or omitted, after demand, some act which has resulted injuriously to him.

In the case of Rosborough v. McAliley, nothing was said as to the discharge of a surety by an alteration of the contract, the question there being whether the creditor had done a positive act to the prejudice of the interests of the surety. Nor do the cases of Hampton v. Levy, 1 McCord Eq., 107, and Lang v. Brevard, 3 Strob. Eq., 64, likewise relied upon, touch the point here under consideration, for in those cases the discharge of the surety was not claimed upon the ground of the alteration of the original contract, but upon the ground that the creditor had omitted to record the mortgages given to secure the debt.

Our next inquiry is as to the effect of the act of the creditor in receiving payment in advance of the interest after the maturity of the debt. Does this necessarily imply an agreement on the part of the creditor to extend the time for payment to the day up to which he has received the interest, or is it, as the Circuit Judge held, merely prima facie evidence of such agreement, which may be rebutted by other evidence? This is a new question in this State and the decisions elsewhere are conflicting. It seems to us that where a creditor receives from the principal debtor after the maturity of the note or other obligation, payment of interest in advance, this necessarily implies an agreement on the part of the creditor to give time to the principal debtor, and that he thereby debars himself of the right to sue upon the original contract until the time arrives, up to which he has received interest in advance.

Interest for money is defined to be "the compensation which is paid by the borrower to the lender, or by the debtor to the creditor, for its use." 1 Bouv. Law Dict., 652.

Hence when a creditor receives interest on his debt up to a certain period, he receives from his debtor compensation for the use of the money by the debtor up to that period, and until that period arrives he cannot demand payment of the money, for by receiving compensation for its use by the debtor for a specified time, he has, by necessary implication, agreed that the debtor shall have the use of the money for which he has paid for the time specified; for the payment of the money certainly constitutes such a considera*tion as will make the agreement valid and legally binding. There can be no question of intention, for parties are presumed to intend the necessary legal effect of their acts.

If, therefore, a creditor knowingly receives from his debtor interest in advance on a note, after maturity, he is necessarily presumed to have extended credit to his debtor during the period for which he has voluntarily received compensation for the use of the money then due. Otherwise a creditor who should, after the maturity of his note, receive the interest on it for twelve months in advance, might, the very next day, bring suit against his debtor, and in due course of law recover judgment and enforce the payment of the very money the use of which for twelve months the debtor had already bought and paid for before the period had elapsed during which the debtor had by purchase acquired the legal right to its use. Surely, no court of equity would allow this; and hence we think that by such a transaction the creditor necessarily ties his own hands and debars himself, by a valid agreement, from the right of action for a specified time, which it is conceded would discharge the surety.

These views are well supported by the authorities cited in the argument for appellants, especially in the case of Blake v. White, 1 Younge & C. Ch., 420. In that case the bond became due in 1818, and in October of that year the creditor received the interest up to January 1, 1819. Lord Abinger said: "Could he then in the interim have been allowed by a court of equity to bring his action on the bond? I think not. It is admitted that in the case of a principal only, without a surety, if the debtor had given six months' interest in advance, a court of equity would interfere to stop the action. If in such a case the time for payment of the interest could be explained consistently with the action, that would alter the state of the case; but if it appeared simply that the six months' interest had been given, what could the imagination suggest but a contract ip-sissimis verbis that the creditor should not sue for that time? Besides, the interest being paid, would a court of equity endure that the creditor should put the interest into his pocket and next day sue for the principal? If that be so as between the principal debtor and the obligee, the same principles will apply to the surety. The question here is *whether the party did not preclude himself from suing on the bond by receiving by anticipation the interest due between October and January. The shortness of that period cannot affect the question." And it was in effect held that the surety was discharged by such extension of time to the principal.

It may well be that if, through mistake, the creditor should receive more interest than was then due, or if, possibly, at the time the interest was paid in advance, it should be made to appear that it was agreed between the debtor and creditor that this should not have the effect of suspending the creditor's immediate right of action, the necessary implication resulting from the payment of interest in advance would not arise, but this it is incumbent upon the creditor to show. What facts and circumstances the Circuit Judge relied upon as rebutting the idea that there was a contract to give further time do not appear from his decree. We think his error was one of law in not holding that the receipt of interest in advance was conclusive evidence of such contract, unless the creditor showed that it was a mistake, or that there was a special agreement at the time that his immediate right of action on the note should not be suspended. There certainly was no evidence of any such special agreement, and we do not think there was any evidence of a mistake.

The credit endorsed on the note shows unmistakably that the creditor knew that he was receiving interest in advance, and all the circumstances point to the same conclusion. The money was undoubtedly received on April 27, 1865, as shown by the date of his letter to E. W. Geiger, but at what particular time the last credit was endorsed upon the note does not appear. This endorsement was proved to be in the handwriting of Jacob Geiger, the creditor, and the terms in which it is expressed leave no doubt of the fact that he intended to receive that money as interest up to a future period. He no doubt knew that the preceding payment, which bears date June 29, 1863, had reduced the balance due on the note to one thousand dollars, and we cannot doubt that, when the money was offered to him in April, 1865, his intention was to receive the simple interest on that sum for two years, one hundred and forty dollars, the amount acknowledged in his letter written the day the money was paid.

*We think, therefore, that the surety was discharged, and the plaintiff not being a creditor of the estate of Samuel Gardner, cannot maintain this action against his representatives.

Having reached the conclusion that the surety was discharged in 1865 by the act of the creditor in giving time to the principal debtor, the other question as to whether the note should be presumed paid from lapse of time cannot arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, dissenting. E. W. Geiger, together with his sureties, Samuel Gardner and J. M. Threewits, executed a sealed note to Jacob Geiger and A. W. Geiger, as administrators, for $1,583.53, which was due February 3, 1860, with interest from date, and payable annually. On this note there were endorsed receipts of payments as follows: February 3, 1861, interest to date; February 3, 1862, interest to date; June 29, 1863, interest to date, and $583.53 on the principal; March 3 (really April 27), 1865, interest to June 29, 1865. It seems, therefore, that on April 27, 1865, the "annual" interest for two years—from June 29, 1863, to June 29, 1865, was received. At the time the money was received the two years had not actually expired by two months, as to which two months, May and June of 1865, the interest was received in advance; and it is now contended that such receipt of the interest alone must be construed into a contract on the part of the creditor not to sue during those two months, which, although in no way injurious to the sureties, discharged them and absolutely absolved them from all obligation to pay the note. In this I cannot concur for several reasons.

First. It is well settled that mere indulgence will not release the surety. In order to have that effect there must be a valid agreement for indulgence between the creditor and the principal debtor, obligatory on the creditor. Witte v. Wolfe, 16 S. C., 274, citing Parnell v. Price, 3 Rich., 121, and other cases. I *think no such contract was shown in this case, either expressly or by proper implication. The mere receipt of the interest in advance was surely not a contract to forbear suing, even for the two months covered by the interest received. To constitute a contract intention is necessary, and it is not claimed that there was any such express contract; but it is said that there was such implied contract—that the receipt of the interest necessarily showed that there was such a contract. It seems to me that in no sense could that be more than evidence tending to prove such a contract, and evidence only through a process of reasoning which probably was not in the minds of the parties, viz., that as the receipt of interest in advance prevents suit for the period covered by it, therefore he who takes it presumably intended to make such a contract.

It strikes me, when we consider the very serious consequences of absolving sureties from their solemn contract, that this whole view is strained; manufacturing a contract, which is matter of intention, by a process of logic that most probably never entered the heads of the parties assumed to have made it. But assuming that it was evidence bearing upon the question of contract, it certainly could not be more than prima facie evidence and rebuttable by other evidence. The parties might assuredly, by express declaration, negative the inference of such a contract, and why may it not be negated by other proof as strong as an express declaration? The rule, in reason, cannot be stronger than as stated by Mr. Brandt: "The general rule is that the reception of interest on a note is prima facie evidence of a binding contract to forbear and delay the time of payment, and no suit can be maintained against the maker during the period for which interest has been paid, unless the right to sue has been reserved by the agreement of the parties. The payment of the interest in advance is not of itself a contract to delay, but is evidence of such a contract; and while this evidence may be rebutted, yet, in the absence of any rebutting evidence, it becomes conclusive." Brandt Sur., § 305, and authorities.

Second. The Circuit Judge held that "there is other evidence in this case, and the facts and circumstances of the case rebut the idea that there was any contract to give further time. I therefore, upon full consideration of all the evidence in this case, am clearly of opinion, and conclude as matter of fact, that there was no such contract. It follows as a conclusion of law that Samuel Gardner, the surety, has not been discharged, and is still bound." In this finding I entirely concur. In brief, the facts were as follows: In April, 1865, the war was in its last agonies. Everything was in utter confusion. The courts were disorganized, and there was actually on the statute book a stay law, forbidding the service of any process for the collection of debts. This very note, along with other papers, was lying buried in order to escape robbery, and was therefore not in the possession of the creditor. But the debtor, E. W. Geiger, like most debtors at that time, was anxious to pay his debt in worthless Confederate currency. He did not go himself to see his creditor, Jacob Geiger, but he sent by one "Donald a roll of Confederate money to pay the debt." Jacob Geiger said that "he would take the interest, but he had no use for the balance, and to carry it back to Edward" (E. W. Geiger).

The note was not before them to ascertain precisely what interest was due, but knowing that it was payable "annually," he consented to take $140, and at the same time he wrote to his cousin as follows: "Before the Yankees came here, I sent the notes and bonds off that was in my possession, including your note, and as soon as I receive the notes again I will give you credit on your note for the amount which I received to-day from Mr. David Donald, which was one hundred and forty dollars. If you stand in need of this money which you sent to-day, send back for it, as I could do without it," &c. It does not appear when the note was brought back from its place of hiding, or the exact time of entering the last receipt on it, but it was probably some time afterwards (possibly after June 29), as it was made by mistake as being received on March 3, instead of April 27, 1865.

These were the circumstances under which the worthless Confederate money was shoved upon the creditor in payment of the interest, and it seems to me that the imagination can hardly conceive of any stronger to negative the idea of a contract not to sue until after June 29, 1865. How can we presume that the creditor by receiving the interest promised not to do what was *already forbidden by the law as it stood upon the statute book, and which from the absence of courts was simply impossible? Even if such contract necessarily arose by implication, it is at least doubtful whether the worthless article received as money could constitute a good and sufficient consideration to make it obligatory. See Cornwell v. Holly, 5 Rich., 47, as to usury.

Third. But has this court the right to review and reverse the finding of the Circuit Judge upon a question of fact? We certainly would not have any such right if the case were a simple action at law to recover the note, which it really was in substance. It is true that the surety, Gardner, being dead, the proceeding was thrown into the form of an action to marshal the assets of his estate, which is equitable in its nature. I cannot, however, see clearly how this accidental circumstance should change the nature of every issue that may arise in the case, such as the alleged payment or discharge of a note presented. I am inclined to think that when such issue arose, the parties, notwithstanding the form of the proceeding, had a right to the finding of a jury. "When the trial is before a jury, this court in no case has the authority to review questions of fact." Wait Anno. Code, 662; Parker v. Jervis, 3 Keyes [*42 N. Y.] 271. Where such a question, by the consent of parties, is decided by a judge, his decision should stand as a special verdict. The nature of the issues are not always determined by the form of the proceeding. See Johnson v. Clarke, 15 S. C., 80.

But passing this, and assuming that the issue was one really "in chancery," I am not able to see that instead of an issue of fact it was one of law. Whether the other proof and circumstances are sufficient to overthrow a prima facie case, is surely a question of fact. Judge Wallace so considered and decided in this case, and it seems to me that his decision should stand. "Where the testimony is conflicting, and the Circuit Judge has, upon weighing it, reached a conclusion which can be supported by the testimony, we will not interfere, although there may be other testimony in the case pointing to a different conclusion. We are not to substitute our judgment for that of the Circuit Judge as to the comparative weight of the testimony. It is only where there is no testimony to support his conclusion, or where *manifest error is proven, that this court will undertake to overrule a finding of fact by a Circuit Judge." Gary v. Burnett, 16 S. C., 633.

In the view that the Circuit Judge was right both as to the law and the facts, his judgment should be affirmed.

Judgment reversed.

NOTES OF CAUSES

Decided during the period comprised in this Volume, and not reported in full

23 S. C. *601

*No. 1709. STATE v. AULTMAN. April Term, 1885. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter in 1878, and sentenced to be confined in the State penitentiary at hard labor for life. Between October, 1884, and April, 1885, defendant (who had been in the penitentiary since his sentence) appealed. Held—

[1. Homicide ⇨354.]

That the defendant could not be sentenced for a longer term than thirty years, and the sentence was therefore erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 731; Dec. Dig. ⇨354.]

[2. Criminal Law ⇨1069.]

That at the time of the conviction there was no law of force in this State limiting the time within which a party might appeal from a sentence in the Court of General Sessions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2691-2699; Dec. Dig. ⇨1069.]

[3. Criminal Law ⇨913.]

The error being in the sentence only, defendant is not entitled to a new trial, but only to a resentence. State v. Trezevant, 20 S. C., 364 [47 Am. Rep. 840].

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 686; Dec. Dig. ⇨913.]

[This case is also cited in State v. Knotts, 70 S. C. 402, 50 S. E. 9, without specific application.]

Opinion by Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, May 25, 1885. W. S. Monteith, for appellant. Bonham, solicitor, contra.

No. 1713. SHEPPERD v. TRADERS' NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON. April Term, 1885. Plaintiff made a contract with Shepperd & Co., to obtain for them orders for cotton-ties, at an agreed commission. One Nichols, acting in concert with Shepperd & Co., purchased the ties in England with funds obtained on a letter of credit furnished him by defendant, and they were consigned to defendant with bills of lading drawn to defendant's order. Defendant reshipped to Charleston to its own order, with an understanding with Nichols that the ties were to remain the property of defendant until paid for. To the bills of lading on this second shipment were attached drafts of Shepperd & Co. on the parties in Charleston who had ordered them. These parties refused to pay, upon the ground that the ties were in bad order. Correspondence ensued between the defendant and its Charleston correspondent, which ended with storing the ties in a warehouse. The Circuit Judge (Hudson) granted a non-suit. On appeal, held—

[1. Trial ⇨139.]

That the judge erred in granting a non-*602

suit; for while *there may have been no testimony to show that Shepperd & Co. were in the outset agents of the defendant, there was some testimony tending to show an appropriation of the purchases procured by plaintiff and a recognition of plaintiff's agency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 333, 338-341, 365; Dec. Dig. ⇨139.]

[2. Pleading ⇨343.]

That judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings could not be directed, as his case rested on allegations of agency which were denied in the answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1048-1051; Dec. Dig. ⇨343.]

[3. Trial ⇨59.]

It is well settled in this State that the time when testimony may be introduced must be left to the discretion of the Circuit Judge, to be governed by the particular circumstances of each case, and that in some instances the courts have permitted a plaintiff to introduce other evidence even after a motion for a non-suit has been made and argued.

No. 1731. SMALLS v. BENEVOLENT SOCIETY OF THE TABERNACLE CHURCH OF BEAUFORT. April Term, 1885.

[Appeal and Error ⇨854; Judgment ⇨139, 143, 148.]

This was a motion by certain members of the defendant corporation to be relieved from judgments obtained by default against the defendant, the motion being based upon the ground of excusable negligence in failing to put in an answer. The Circuit Judge (Aldrich) held that there was no excusable negligence, and refused the motion. On appeal, held, that the motion was addressed to the discretion of the Circuit Court, and that there was no abuse of discretion in this case, as the summons and complaint were served upon the president of the defendant corporation, its duly accredited officer, and there was no evidence of any collusion between such officer and the plaintiff; and if such officer was guilty of negligence in not making and prosecuting a defence, the plaintiff is not responsible; and, further, as the motion was not made by the defendant corporation, but by individual members thereof, without authority from the defendant as a corporation. If the judge erred in expressing his opinion as to the merits of the defence, that would not avail appellants, for it is the duty of this court "simply to inquire whether there is any error in the judgment rendered, and not whether the reasons given to support it are sound."

*Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, July 20, 1885. Verdier & Talbird, for appellants. Elliott & Howe, contra.

No. 1732. STATE v. TERRY. April Term, 1885.

[Homicide ⚡224.]

The defendant being on trial under an indictment for murder, his counsel proved by the magistrate who held the inquest that a paper produced was the testimony taken at the inquest and was correct, and that Bond (a witness who had been just examined in behalf of the State) was present at the examination. The judge ruled that as this paper had been introduced without objection, both sides could use it, and that it could not be limited by the defence to so much only as contained the testimony of Bond. On appeal, this ruling was held not to be erroneous. State v. Campbell, 1 Rich., 124.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 467; Dec. Dig. ⚡224.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 20, 1885. Perry, Perry & Heyward, for appellant. Orr, solicitor, contra.

No. 1738. FITZSIMONS v. THE GUANAHANI COMPANY. April Term, 1885.

[Courts ⚡8.]

This case was tried upon the same pleadings and evidence as at the first trial of the case, reported 16 S. C., 192. The Circuit Judge (Hudson), feeling bound by the statement of this court on that appeal, that "plaintiff had based his right to sue on the ground that he was an inspector under the statute of Georgia, and that the action could not be sustained under said statute," charged the jury that if they found that the services had been rendered outside of that State, the plaintiff could not recover. On appeal the court say that the Circuit Judge overlooked the fact that while this expression was found in that opinion, yet that this was not the question raised in the appeal, nor was it the point upon which the judgment was there reversed; nor was the second opinion of this court in this case (21 S. C., 599) brought to the judge's attention, in which this court attempted to correct the misapprehension as to the point decided in the first, and which gave rise to the demurrer at the second trial.

While the plaintiff cannot recover for services in this State under any contract raised by a Georgia statute, he could for services rendered at a stipulated price agreed upon between the parties, independent of such statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 18, 19; Dec. Dig. ⚡8.]

Judgment reversed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 30, 1885. W. J. Verdier, for appellant. William Elliott, contra.

No. 1739. NICHOLS v. RAILROAD COMPANY. April Term, 1885.

Plaintiff sued defendant, the Wilmington, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company, in a trial justice's court, for damages in killing a cow. The trial justice gave judgment, upon the verdict of a jury, for $40. Defendant appealed, and the Circuit Judge (Cothran) dismissed the appeal. Defendant then appealed to this court on the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor erred in failing to sustain the appeal from the trial justice's court upon the grounds stated in said appeal.

2. Because his honor erred in failing to reverse the finding in the court below on the testimony in the case.

3. Because his honor erred in holding as matter of fact that it was such negligence in the appellants to run their train around the curve at the rate of speed shown by the testimony as to make said company liable for damages for killing the cow in question.

1. The first ground cannot be considered, especially so, as the respondent invokes the protection of the rule of court.

[2. Appeal and Error ⚡1094.]

The second ground points out no specific error, and besides raises only a question of fact, of which this court has no jurisdiction in a case like this.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4322–4352; Dec. Dig. ⚡1094.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⇨1008.]

The third exception points out no error of law, but only one of fact upon which the judge, acting as a jury, has passed, and this court cannot review it.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Thomson v. Dillinger, 35 S. C. 609, 14 S. E. 776; Greene v. Tally, 39 S. C. 343, 17 S. E. 779; Henderson v. Wendler, 39 S. C. 555, 17 S. E. 851.

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, July 30, 1885. J. H. Rion, for appellant. C. A. Woods, contra.

No. 1741. GRAY & CO. v. HILL. April Term, 1885.

[Execution ⇨351, 353.]

This was an action on four notes, and the defence was payment. Verdict for defendant. Plaintiffs appealed upon three grounds, two of which raised only questions of fact. The third imputed error to the Circuit Judge (Cothran), in charging the jury that defend*ant was entitled to credit for certain cotton of defendant, seized by the sheriff under plaintiffs' lien, and at their instance, and sold, and the proceeds, upon claim of a third party, paid over to the clerk of court, and by him to such third party, if the jury thought that such cotton really belonged to the defendant. This court saw no error in this charge. "It is well settled that a levy under an execution or other process is prima facie satisfaction pro tanto, and until the plaintiffs showed, as they failed to do, that this cotton was not applicable to their claim, they were bound to account for its value."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1075; Dec. Dig. ⇨351, 353.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, August 1, 1885. J. C. Haskell, for appellant. Holmes & Simpson, contra.

In this case there was a petition for a rehearing, which was refused.

No. 1748. MOWRY v. MOWRY. April Term, 1885.

[Partition ⇨48.]

Plaintiff, claiming to be the only living issue of an intestate, brought this action against the widow for partition. The defendant denied the legitimacy of the plaintiff's father, who was the intestate's son, and alleged that the paternal grandmother of plaintiff had never been the wife of intestate, but that she, defendant, was his only wife. Plaintiff, while willing to let the defendant have one-third of the land involved, denied that she was the lawful wife of intestate, and insisted that his grandmother was lawfully married. The Circuit Judge (Witherspoon) decreed in favor of plaintiff, giving to him one-third of the land, and defendant appealed. But as it appeared from the evidence that defendant had three children by intestate, one at least of whom was living, this court declined to pass upon the merits of the case until these children were made parties, as they were necessary parties, and had a right to be heard upon the issue involved. And to this end the judgment below was reversed without prejudice, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to plaintiff to amend by making such additional parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 118-129; Dec. Dig. ⇨48.]

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, September 14, 1885. G. W. Brown, for appellant. Ward & Nettles, contra.

AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES OF COURT

23 S. C. *606

*Rule XX. of the Supreme Court. On January 26, 1886, the Chief Justice read the following order of the court:

It is ordered that the second paragraph of Rule XX. be altered and amended so as to read as follows:

"On application to either of the justices at chambers, an order may be granted for a further stay of the remittitur for such time as he may deem proper, not beyond the third day of the ensuing term, subject to the order of the court; provided a petition for that purpose be presented, stating specifically the grounds of such application with a certificate from some counsel not concerned in the cause, that there is merit in such grounds, accompanied with a consent in writing signed by the parties and not by their counsel that the stay of the remittitur shall be granted upon condition that the status of the property involved in the case shall not be disturbed until after the final determination of the case."

*BANKER v. HENDRICKS.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Deeds ⇨ 68.]

A woman, 82 years of age, and very ill, not expected to survive a day, executed to a stranger a deed of conveyance of her entire real estate, worth $2,500, for the alleged consideration of $2,000, but no money was paid or agreed to be paid, the grantee averring that the real consideration was that he should support the grantor and her husband (who was then over 70 years of age) for the remainder of their lives. Two weeks afterwards, upon the expressed consideration of such support, this old woman and her husband executed a bill of sale of all their personal property to this same grantee, who then executed a bond for $2,000, and a mortgage of the lands conveyed to him, to secure such support, and handed the mortgage to his attorney to be recorded, which was not done. In action by this old woman to set aside and cancel this deed and bill of sale, held, that the plaintiff was imposed upon by defendant, while she was in an extremely feeble condition, mentally and physically; that the consideration was, under the circumstances, grossly inadequate; and that both instruments must be canceled. Mr. Chief Justice Simpson, dissenting.

All the issues of law and fact having been referred to a referee, and no testimony introduced to sustain the allegation in the complaint of damages done to the property by defendant while in his possession, that question cannot be again raised in the cause.

Before Aldrich, J., Pickens, September, 1884.

Action by Charlotte S. Banker against William A. Hendricks, commenced March 5, 1884. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Child & Boggs, for appellant.

Messrs. M. F. Ansel and J. H. Newton, contra.

November 2, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The object of this action is to set aside a deed and bill of sale, whereby the plaintiff conveyed and transferred to the defendant every vestige of her property, both real and personal, even including all her household furniture, beds and bedding, upon the ground of fraud and imposition practiced upon her at a time when she was so enfeebled by age and disease as to be incapable of transacting such business.

It seems that the plaintiff is a very old lady, in the eighty-third year of her age, living with her husband, a feeble old man, who has passed the age of three score and ten, with no children, and no relatives, except a brother and some nieces. The defendant was her tenant, in no way related to or connected with her, represented to be a young man of some thirty-five or forty years of age. On November 21, 1883, the deed for the real estate was executed while the plaintiff was very low indeed, so much so as to create the belief in the minds of her neighbors and herself that she could not live more than twenty-four hours, and her husband was also sick at the same time. The consideration mentioned in the deed is two thousand dollars, though it is not pretended that any money was paid, or intended to be paid; the claim on the part of the defendant being that the real consideration was that he was to support these old people during their *lives, though it does not appear that anything was said about it at the time the deed was executed. The person who drew the deed, and who was present when it was executed, though not a subscribing witness, testified that he told the parties that "there had to be a money consideration mentioned in the deed," but he also said: "Nothing was mentioned about the consideration of the deed but the two thousand dollars on the day the deed was executed."

The old lady was so very feeble on the day when the deed was executed that she had to be assisted from her bed to the chair in which she sat when she signed the deed, and had to be assisted in signing her name by the witness, Richey, who was carried to the plaintiff's house by the defendant for the purpose of drawing the deed. The two subscribing witnesses to the deed both testify that the deed was not read to the plaintiff in their hearing, though Richey, who drew the deed, said he read it over to her "two or three times and took particular pains," and added: "Deed was read in presence of witnesses. Called one of them in the room, I don't know whether Frank Smith (one of the subscribing witnesses) was there all the time the deed was being read; but I rather think both of them were there." The old lady did little or no talking the day the deed was signed, and was moaning or groaning most of the time as if in great distress. Richey, however, testified that "Mrs. Banker was sitting up in a chair when I went in.

* * * I told her I had come to fix up the papers; she told Mr. Banker to get the papers; she told him where the papers were." Again he says: "Old man did a good deal of the talking, seemed to be active in the matter; he or she one said the other writing they would fix themselves, in answer to my question if there were any other paper to fix up."

Mrs. Mary Oats testified that Richey told her he had been down drawing up the papers between Mrs. Banker and Mr. Hendricks: "I told him she was not fit to make papers; I told him she was not the evening before. He said he reckoned she was, but that she was very low and the least thing would take her out; it would not do to excite her." Richey does not deny this positively. He says: "Had conversation with Mrs. Oats; don't remember whether she said Mrs. Banker was not fit to fix papers; *don't think I had the conversation mentioned by Mrs. Oats. Don't think I told her a little excitement would take her out." Folger, another witness for the plaintiff, testified to a conversation with Richey at Easley as follows: "Mr. Richey said he had his doubts as to the propriety or legality of the deed, from the fact that he had to hold the old lady's hand." This likewise Richey does not deny positively. His language is: "Don't think I said anything to Newton Folger about the legality of the deed or holding her hand, at Easley; don't remember if I did."

Mrs. Mary Smith testified that "I heard a conversation between plaintiff and defendant about three weeks before deed was made. He offered to buy four acres of land. She told him she would not sell it at any price. He offered to give her fifty dollars an acre; he told her he would take care of her for her property. She told him, No; as long as she kept her right senses he should not have anything she had. Mr. Hendricks called at my house and said for us to be good to the old people and he would pay for it. He said he did not have time to stay over there, as he would have to gather up her corn and things; said if he did not do it before she came to her right mind, he would not get it, for he had tried it enough to know." This witness on her cross-examination stated that her husband was not upon good terms with Hendricks, and that about a month after the deed was made she told Mrs. Oats that she knew something in favor of Hendricks, but would not tell it, but Mrs. Oats testified that this was said by Mrs. Smith in a joke when they were "rummaging on in fun about the trial," though a witness for defendant said he was present when this remark was made by Mrs. Mary Smith, and "he did not consider that she was talking in a joke; they were laughing and talking, but I meant what I was saying."

Mrs. Mollie Hinton, a cousin of the defendant, and living with him, testifies to a good deal that Mrs. Banker said on the day the deed was executed, which none of the other witnesses present at the time seem to have remembered. She says: "Mr. and Mrs. Banker sent Mauldin Smith after Mr. Hendricks. The morning before Mr. Hendricks got there, and before the deed was made, Mrs. Banker told me she was going to make her property *over to Wm. Hendricks to take care of her. She told Mr. Richey this too, and said she did not intend the Claytons nor her brother to have it, for her brother had gone through her mother's property and had no home, and she did not intend for him to have hers. Some of the Claytons were her nieces: she said they had mistreated one of her sons. This occurred the morning before the deed was made. She told me after the deed was made that she had heard that Mr. Banker owed money in Wallhalla, and they were coming on her property after she died to pay it, and she did not intend it. This was about a week after the deed was made. She said the Claytons and Mr. Atkinson, her brother, would be mad, but it was her property and she would do as she pleased with it. She said she would not give her property to any one who asked her for it, and Mr. Hendricks never had, and he was the only one could get it." Another witness for the defendant, Mrs. Nancy Gunter, who had been hired by Hendricks to wash for the plaintiff, testified that she had a conversation with the old lady a few days after the deed was made in which "she said she had made her property over to Mr. Hendricks: that she wanted Mr. Hendricks to have it, as he had been a playmate of her son Cicero, and he would take good care of her: said she had been intending to do it some time, but had let it go on; that she thought it best to do so while she was in her right mind."

The plaintiff and the defendant were both examined, and, as was to be expected, their testimony is very conflicting. If the plaintiff's testimony is to be believed, then it is very manifest that this old lady was grossly imposed upon: but, on the other hand, if the testimony of the defendant is to be given full credence, then though the transaction would still appear to be a very singular and unusual one, yet there would be no ground to impute fraud or imposition to him. The old lady denies in toto the conversation detailed by Mrs. Mollie Hinton, and the defendant in like manner denies the conversation detailed by Mrs. Mary Smith. There is, however, one point of concurrence between them, and that is, that but a short time before the deed was made Hendricks offered to buy four acres of the same land conveyed by the deed at a very high price, and that the plaintiff *refused his offer. It seems, too, that very soon after the deed was made the defendant carried off all of the old lady's personal property except her household furniture, and, so far as the testimony discloses, contributed nothing towards her support except one hog and part of another, and employed a woman to do her washing.

The deed for the real estate was promptly put upon record the day after it was executed, and about two weeks afterwards, to wit, on December 7, 1883, Mr. and Mrs. Banker executed a bill of sale to the defendant of all their personal property, of every kind and description whatsoever, in consideration of the comfortable support and maintenance of these two old people, but what was the value of the personal property thus transferred does not appear. On the same day the defendant executed to Mr. and Mrs. Banker a combined bond and mortgage of the real estate conveyed to him by the above mentioned deed, conditioned for the comfortable support of the said Bankers, but this paper was never put into the possession of either Mr. or Mrs. Banker, and was never recorded.

What occurred on the day these last mentioned papers were signed will best be learned from the testimony of Mr. Child, the attorney for the defendant in this case. He says: "I went to Mr. Banker's on the 7th of December last. Mr. and Mrs. Banker had been sued by Mauldin Smith; I was employed to defend them. I went in and they were sitting in the house. They told me about the deed she had made to Mr. Hendricks, and that he was to take care of them. They asked me how to fix the papers so that if Mr. Hendricks should die, they would be taken care of. I told them to take a bond and mortgage from him to secure their support. I prepared the papers; Mr. Hendricks signed, and I brought them and turned them over to Mr. Lewis to be recorded. I suggested that they both sign the deed to the personal property, which they did. From what I heard and saw there I am satisfied she was as competent then to transact her own business as she is now. Mr. Banker did most of the talking. Now, I don't pretend to distinguish what Mrs. Banker said in particular during the conversation. I don't know whether the note was given to me at the house or at Easley. The mortgage *was not recorded; I took it and the bill of sale out of the clerk's office, after there was a talk of this suit." According to the testimony of the plaintiff, she remembers nothing of what occurred when Mr. Child was at her house, and the probability is that she had very little to say in the matter as it appears from Mr. Child's testimony that "Mr. Banker did most of the talking."

Soon after the old lady recovered from the attack of sickness under which she was laboring at the time the deed was executed, she says that she applied to the defendant to restore to her her property, saying that she was ruined and would be turned out of doors. Upon his refusal so to do, this action was commenced, and the case was referred to a referee "to hear and determine the issues of fact and law involved in said case." The referee found as matter of fact that the real value of the land was twenty dollars per acre: that the plaintiff, at the time of the execution of the deed, "was extremely ill and physically weak, but not so weak in mind as to render her non compos or disqualified to transact business;" that she was about 83 years of age, and the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the grantor and grantee, "but the testimony fails to satisfy the referee that circumvention, fraud, or undue influence was practised upon the plaintiff by the defendant;" that she was "not laboring under mental disqualification at the time" the bill of sale was executed; that on the 7th day of December, 1883, the defendant executed a bond and mortgage to the plaintiff conditioned for the support of herself and husband, and the payment of two thousand dollars, but the same has not been recorded and turned over to the plaintiff; that said deed was read over to plaintiff before she signed it, and that the plaintiff offered no testimony as to damages." And as matter of law, he found that the deed and the bill of sale were valid; and "that the defendant should be required to execute notes and mortgages to the plaintiff for the value of the land and personal property, or at least a sufficient amount, not less than two thousand dollars, the consideration expressed in the deed, for the comfortable and easy support of the plaintiff and her husband during their natural lives. The old lady should be protected by a court of equity, and it is *against good conscience that her property should pass out of her hands and this court not render the proper relief."

To this report both parties excepted, and the case went before the Circuit Judge to be heard on the report and exceptions, together with the testimony, which is fully set out in the "Case." While he concurred with the referee "that the plaintiff was not non compos mentis," which he explains as meaning "bereft of all sense," at the time of the transaction in question, yet he says: "I am perfectly satisfied that she was in such a condition of physical and mental weakness as to be entirely unfit for the transaction of business of any kind, especially of so serious a nature as the transfer of her whole estate;" and the concluding language of the referee's last finding of law would seem to indicate that he too was impressed with some such notion. The Circuit Judge also found that the plaintiff was imposed upon while in this extremely weak and feeble condition, and improperly induced to transfer her whole property to a stranger in blood, not allied to her by any ties of affection, while she had relatives living, some of whom at least would most naturally be the objects of her bounty. He therefore rendered judgment that the deed and bill of sale be cancelled, and that the referee "inquire and report what damage the plaintiff has sustained by the felling of her timber, the removal of her personal effects, and the killing of her stock."

It is impossible to read the testimony in this case without concurring with the Circuit Judge in view which he has taken of this case. The testimony is too long to be incorporated in this opinion, and therefore only extracts have been given. There was no little conflict amongst the witnesses as to the old lady's mental condition at the time the deed was executed, and there certainly was amply sufficient testimony to support the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge as to that matter. It is true that the referee seemed to have been of different opinion, but, as we have said, he evidently was of the opinion that the plaintiff had not been dealt with fairly, and that there was something in the case which, in equity and good conscience, called for the interposition of a court of equity. He doubtless assumed, what we shall presently see is a mistake, that it was necessary to show *that the plaintiff was non compos mentis, absolutely "bereft of all sense," in order to warrant the court in setting aside the deed. Hence his conclusion that the plaintiff was not in such a mental condition as would disqualify her from transacting business does not carry with it the weight which it might otherwise carry.

But be that as it may, we think the weight of the testimony is in favor of the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge. The idea that this old lady should, of her own free will and accord, strip herself of every vestige of property, even down to the bed upon which she rested her aged and feeble body, in favor of a mere stranger, who, so far as we can see from the testimony, had no claim upon her whatever, is so utterly inconsistent with the motives which ordinarily prompt human actions as to be utterly incredible, and could only be sustained by the clearest and most satisfactory evidence of the good faith of the transaction. This old couple had the most abundant means to insure their comfortable support during the very short period which they could, under the most favorable circumstances, expect to live. The plaintiff could not have been in any immediate need of ready money, for, a very short time before the deed in question was signed, she had an offer from the defendant to buy only a very small portion of her land, at a very high price, which she peremptorily refused, although the amount would probably have been sufficient to have provided for her wants during the brief remainder of her life; and the idea that she should, within a few days afterwards, have been willing to convey her entire property, which, according to the testimony, was worth something over twenty-five hundred dollars, to an entire stranger, solely for the consideration that he would provide for the support of herself and husband during their lives, then drawing so rapidly to a close, is utterly incredible.

When to this is added that at the time when the pretended deed was signed the old lady was apparently in extremis, not expected to live longer than twenty-four hours; that she was at the time so extremely weak and enfeebled by old age and disease as to be incapable of doing anything, even signing her name, without assistance, and suffering so much as to be unable *to express herself except by groans—as one of the subscribing witnesses said, “she seemed to be very bad off from the way she was groaning; she did not talk any;” or, to use the language of the other subscribing witness, “was groaning, but did not say a word”—and when, in addition to this, we find from the testimony of another witness that she heard a conversation between the plaintiff and defendant, but a very short time before she became so ill, in which the old lady not only refused the defendant’s offer of a very high price for a small part of land, but also refused his offer to take care of her for her property, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the transaction in question cannot receive the sanction of a court of equity.

Then, too, the conduct of the defendant does not present itself in a very favorable light. In his answer, he says that the plaintiff “earnestly and persistently besought the defendant to allow her (plaintiff) to execute to him a deed of conveyance of all her property in consideration of her support and the support of her husband (Girard Banker) during their natural lives;” but when examined as a witness, subject of course to the ordeal of a cross-examination, he does not venture to put it so strong. He simply says that on the day before the day the deed was signed he got a message from these old people to go and see them, and they told him to go after Mr. Folger, or any other suitable person, to fix up the papers; that he did get Mr. Richey, who was told by them what they wanted done. “He done up the deed as they told him to. I was to support them. This was the consideration of the deed.” But Richey, when examined, does not say anything of his being told that the consideration of the deed was that Hendricks was to support these people. On the contrary, he says: “Nothing was mentioned about the consideration of the deed, but the two thousand dollars.”

Again, if this was an honest, straightforward transaction, why was it that some security or obligation was not given to the plaintiff by the defendant to secure the performance of his part of the contract? Not a word seems to have been said about that; but Hendricks is very careful and prompt to have the deed recorded the very next day, and it is not until more than two weeks afterwards that we hear of any talk about the defendant *entering into any obligation for the support of these people. What occurred in the meantime to prompt the conscience, or perhaps the fears, of Hendricks, we are not informed. All that we know is that sixteen days afterwards, when Mr. Child is at the house of the plaintiff on other business, he is called upon to draw, and does draw, the combination bond and mortgage set out in the “Case,” whereby Hendricks binds himself, under a penalty of two thousand dollars, to provide for the support and maintenance of Mr. and Mrs. Banker, which, however, was never turned over to them, but was carried off by Mr. Child and deposited in the clerk’s office to be recorded; but which was never recorded, and was taken out of the office as soon as there was talk about bringing this suit.

On the same day a bill of sale was executed transferring every vestige of the plaintiff’s personal property to the defendant, the consideration expressed therein being the support and maintenance of Mr. and Mrs. Banker. Why the old lady should have been required to transfer her personal property to the defendant, when, according to his own testimony, he already held her deed, duly recorded, for all her real estate, proved to be worth upwards of twenty-five hundred dollars, which he himself said was executed in consideration of his supporting this aged couple, the testimony does not inform us. Surely, the value of the land was amply sufficient to compensate the defendant for any probable, or we might say, any possible, outlay which he would be called upon to make for the support of these two old people just tottering on the brink of the grave. No witness, not even the defendant himself, has testified that it was any part of the original arrangement on the day the deed for the land was signed that the personal property should also be transferred to the defendant as a part of the price paid for the support of the plaintiff and her husband. On the contrary, as we have said, the defendant distinctly testified that in consideration of the deed for the land he was to support them. Now, if that was a valid transaction, the plaintiff had already, by the execution of the deed for the land, secured a support for herself and husband, and there remained no reason why she should, to secure the same end, transfer all of her personal property.

The natural inference is *that the plaintiff was so much under the control and influence of the defendant that she was ready to sign, and did sign, any paper that he might place before her. She certainly could not have been prompted to do so by a desire to secure a support for herself and husband, for, according to the claim of the defendant, that had already been secured by the deed.

But without going any further in the discussion of the testimony, we think that there is quite sufficient to support the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge, that the plaintiff, while not absolutely non compos mentis, was in such an extremely weak and feeble condition, both physically and mentally, as to render her an easy subject to be imposed upon, and that while in this condition she was imposed upon by the defendant.

This being our conclusion as to the facts, the law is clear that she is entitled to the re-relief asked for. In 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 221, passing from a general notice of cases of fraud, arising from a misrepresentation or concealment of material facts, it is said: "We may now pass to the consideration of some others, which, in a moral as well as in a legal view, seem to fall under the same predicament, that of being deemed cases of actual, intentional fraud, as contradistinguished from constructive or legal fraud, * * * and in special manner, all unconscientious advantages or bargains obtained over persons disabled by weakness, infirmity, age, lunacy, idiocy, drunkenness, coverture, or other incapacity, from taking due care of or protecting their own rights or interests." Again, in section 235, after referring to the remark of a learned judge, that if a weak man give a bond, and there be no fraud or breach of trust in obtaining it, equity will not set aside the bond only for the weakness of the obligor, if he be compos mentis, the learned author proceeds to say: "But whatever weight there may be in this remark, in a general sense, it is obvious that weakness of understanding must constitute a most material ingredient in examining whether a bond or other contract has been obtained by fraud, or imposition, or undue influence; for although a contract, made by a man of sound mind and fair understanding, may not be set aside, merely from its being a rash, improvident, or hard bargain; yet if the same contract be made with a person of weak understanding, there does arise a *natural inference that it was obtained by fraud, or circumvention, or undue influence." In section 238, it is said: "The doctrine, therefore, may be laid down as generally true that the acts and contracts of persons who are of weak understandings, and who are thereby liable to imposition, will be held void in courts of equity if the nature of the act or contract justify the conclusion that the party has not exercised a deliberate judgment, but that he has been imposed upon, circumvented, or overcome by cunning, artifice, or undue influence."

In Butler v. Haskell, 4 Desaus., at page 637, Chancellor Desaussure, in delivering the opinion of the court, after an elaborate review of the authorities, says: "I consider the result of the great body of the cases to be, that wherever the court perceives that a sale of property has been made at a grossly inadequate price, such as would shock a correct mind, this inadequacy furnishes a strong, and in general a conclusive, presumption, though there be no direct proof of fraud, that an undue advantage has been taken of the ignorance, the weakness, or the distress and necessity of the vendor." See, also, the case of Bunch v. Hurst, 3 Desaus., 273 [5 Am. Dec. 551], where a deed made by a very weak man, though capable of understanding the ordinary transactions of life, and though there was no direct evidence of fraud, was set aside.

The fact, therefore, that the plaintiff in this case has not been found to be absolutely non compos mentis, is not sufficient to deprive her of the relief which she demands. There can be no doubt but that, from her advanced age and from disease, she was extremely weak, both mentally and physically, and not in a condition to look after her own interests properly, and that the consideration for which she conveyed away her entire property to a mere stranger, not allied to her by any ties, either of blood or affection, was grossly inadequate, considering her extreme old age and infirmity, and that, under all the circumstances, the transaction was not such an one as can receive the sanction of a court of equity.

We think, however, that the Circuit Judge erred in directing the referee to inquire and report what damages the plaintiff had sustained, for the question of damages was one of the issues *raised by the pleadings, and when, by the original order of reference, the referee was required to hear and determine all the issues of law and fact, and the plaintiff failed to offer any testimony as to damages, it is too late now to reopen that question. The judgment below must therefore be modified in so far as it requires the referee to inquire and report as to the damages sustained by the plaintiff.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, except as modified herein, be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, dissenting. It is admitted that the property embraced in the papers which the plaintiff seeks to annul by the action below belonged to the plaintiff. Nor is it denied that she had the legal right to execute said papers and thereby to convey said property to the defendant, if such was her will and desire. Nor is it denied or doubted that said papers were executed by her, and with all the formality necessary to make them valid, as to their mere execution. Such being the fact, all the presumptions are in their favor; and being thus prima facie valid, they must stand until it is shown by satisfactory testimony either that the plaintiff was incompetent at the time of their execution, or that she was induced thereto by the fraud, artifice, or undue influence of the defendant. Has such a showing, one or both, been made, is the question in the case.

I have thoroughly and closely examined the testimony as reported, biased somewhat, it may be, in favor of the plaintiff, and yet I must say that, after analyzing and sifting said testimony fully, and excluding therefrom all hearsay and gossip, in which it abounds, it seems to me to be utterly destitute of the necessary facts to impeach the instruments in question upon either of the grounds mentioned. There is certainly no direct or positive evidence reported on the question of the plaintiff's competency. No expert was examined, nor were there any facts testified to by other witnesses showing either general incapacity in the plaintiff or that she did not understand this particular transaction or the nature and character of the instruments which she executed. It is true she was quite old and feeble, and was not expected to live *more than twenty-four hours when the deed was executed. It is also true that she had to be lifted from bed and her hand had to be held and guided in affixing her signature thereto, but the evidence is silent as to the extent to which her mind and understanding had been impaired by her physical weakness and disease, and it will not do to say that old age and physical weakness merely are sufficient to disqualify one from disposing of his property.

Besides this, it is in evidence that, some two weeks after the execution of the deed, she recognized its existence and made a second paper, the bill of sale of her personal property, in harmony with and in furtherance of the scheme upon which the deed had been previously executed, to wit, the comfortable support and maintenance of herself and husband during their lives, to secure which she took a bond and mortgage from the defendant covering the property conveyed to him. The papers were drawn by Mr. Child, an attorney of standing, by the direction of the plaintiff; Mr. Child testifying to these facts, and saying "that from what he heard and saw, the plaintiff was as competent to transact her own business then as she is now." In the face of this testimony, I cannot see how it can be claimed that the plaintiff did not understand what she was doing.

It appears to me, too, that the testimony is destitute of facts impeaching the conduct of the defendant as to any improper agency in procuring these papers. He had no special control of the plaintiff. Nor does it appear that he exercised, or attempted to exert, any influence over her, either by threats, importunity, fraud, or imposition of any kind. It is true that Mr. Richey, who drew the deed, was carried to the house of plaintiff by the defendant. Why should he not have done so? If the plaintiff had made up her mind to execute the deed in favor of defendant, and he was informed of that fact, it was more in accordance with the idea of fair dealing that he should have a suitable person to prepare the papers, openly and personally, than to stand in the background, working entirely through others. True, too, that he had the deed properly recorded. What is there in this to excite suspicion? The paper was of a character which in law should have been recorded. Such being the fact, its record was *in accordance with law, and just what most business men would have had done. The law requiring this deed to be recorded, if the defendant had withheld its record, that fact would have needed explanation, rather more than the fact of recording, and would have been much more damaging to the conduct and character of the defendant.

It is said that the bond and mortgage was not recorded. This, however, was explained by Mr. Child, and the defendant was in no way responsible for the non-record of these papers. Nor did this occur from any want of understanding in the plaintiff as to her rights thereunder. If any one is to blame for this, it was Mr. Child himself; certainly not the defendant. Upon the whole, I have not been able to find any direct testimony in the case either impeaching plaintiff's mental capacity or showing that she was overreached by the circumvention, artifice, or undue influence of the defendant, or of any one in his behalf.

It is said, however, that while there is no direct evidence showing absolute incapacity in the plaintiff, nor imposition, perhaps, on the part of the defendant, yet when the age of the plaintiff is considered, and also her extreme feebleness, in connection with the remarkable character of the papers, transferring, as they did, her entire estate, real and personal, to the defendant, the inference, both of incapacity and imposition, is irresistible, and it is upon that ground that the papers should be declared void. The legal principle under which this is claimed is no doubt correct, and it is true that great mental weakness, yet short of absolute incapacity, may sometimes be a sufficient ground to invalidate instruments in which unconscientious bargains have been obtained, or where the inadequacy of consideration is so gross as to be explained in no other way, except from the imbecility of the grantor or the imposition of the grantee. But such cases are rare, and before this principle can be applied, the facts should be undoubted and overwhelming.

Now, can such an inference be drawn fairly from the facts of this case? What are those facts? The plaintiff at the date of the deed was an aged lady—nearly 83. She was sick, and thought to be near her end. Her husband was perhaps older than herself; he was certainly beyond "three score and ten." *They had no children. The plaintiff owned a small tract of land, I suppose about 125 acres, worth, it is said, upon valuation $20 per acre, or in the whole, $2,500, and some personalty, value not mentioned. These two aged people were living to themselves, the plaintiff's only relations being a brother and perhaps some nieces, with whom it seems she had no association. They were alone in the world, in possession of the property mentioned and with no other means of support, so far as it appears. Now, it is manifest that this aged couple, sick and feeble as they were, could not have been able to make even a scanty support by their own labor on the land which the plaintiff owned. Nor could they have done so by hired labor under their supervision and direction. An attempt to do so, in either of these ways, would no doubt have soon resulted in crushing debt, and finally in starvation or the poor house. The relations of the plaintiff were not present, giving aid and comfort. They themselves were absolutely powerless to provide for their necessities in their declining years. What need had they for this little tract of land and their household personalty, but through it to obtain an easy and comfortable living during the years before them? They could not take it with them beyond the grave. They could only use it while they lived, and the relations of the plaintiff had no claim upon them, or at least no such claim as demanded that they should not make all necessary use of it while they were alive for their comfort and support, even if this use required its entire destruction, leaving nothing to go to said relations.

Under these circumstances, the arrangement which the old lady made with the defendant, if fairly carried out by him, does not strike me as so remarkable and strange—certainly not so strange as to indicate irresistibly incapacity on her part, or imposition on the part of the defendant. She bargained for a comfortable and easy support both for herself and her husband during their respective lives, and she secured the enforcement of this obligation on the defendant by a mortgage of the land. True, she had refused to sell to the defendant a short time before this a small portion of this land at $50 per acre. In this she acted wisely, as she no doubt knew that the money received would soon go, while the land was permanent. The arrangement which this old lady made, when all the circumstances are duly considered, though somewhat unusual, certainly cannot be said to be devoid of sense or reason, and if it was faithfully carried out by the defendant, fully and honestly, in all probability would be the best for the plaintiff and her husband. The bond and mortgage afford the means to her of having such faithful enforcement to the full extent of the property.

That it should have been made with a stranger is not of itself sufficient to avoid it. In this country the owners of property have the right to make their own disposition thereof, and while it is more in accordance with nature that relations should be preferred to strangers, yet the courts have no right to control parties in this respect. There are often reasons, facts, and motives beyond the reach of the court, sufficient to influence the party, or if even within its reach, yet beyond its legal power to set aside or suspend. If the arrangement which the plaintiff made had been made with her brother, under all the circumstances surrounding her, could its wisdom be fairly impeached? Does the fact that it was made with a stranger to her in blood make it less wise—especially when she secured its enforcement so completely?

For the reasons given above I am unable to concur in the opinion of the majority.

Judgment modified.

24 S. C. 18

AGNEW v. CHARLOTTE, COLUMBIA & AUGUSTA R. R. CO.

(April Term, 1885.)

[Mortgages ↔ 295.]

A debtor gave to his surety a mortgage of land to secure the debt and to indemnify the surety; afterwards another creditor obtained judgment against this debtor; and after that, such surety being required to pay the debt, the debtor conveyed some of this land to such surety, the conveyance stipulating that it was made subject to said mortgage, which was to remain open to protect the surety against dower, liens, and encumbrances. The judgment creditor then levied, sold, and purchased a portion of the land so conveyed, and brought action for its recovery. Held, that the express agreement of the parties prevented a merger, that the mortgage remained open, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the land. *Before Wallace, J., Richland, December, 1884.

This was an action by John Agnew against the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company, commenced May 30, 1884. The opinion states the case. The Circuit Judge rendered the following judgment:

The issue presented for me to decide is as follows: The plaintiff claims that the tract of land, having been conveyed by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, the equity of redemption and the legal estate became merged; and the mortgage, upon the bond being paid, became extinguished. The defendant claims that the intention expressed in the conveyance from Hoffman to defendant kept the mortgage open and prevented its extinguishment.

The general rule of law is, that where the mortgagee purchases the land mortgaged to him, the equitable and legal estates, becoming thus united in him, are merged and the mortgage thereby extinguished. The courts of most of the States and of England and the United States Supreme Court hold that where it can be shown that it was the intention of the parties, or where this intention can be inferred from it being the interest of the grantee, to keep the mortgage open, then the mortgage will not be extinguished. Insurance Company v. Murphy, 111 U. S., 744 [4 Sup. Ct. 679, 28 L. Ed. 582]. This, however, seems not to be the law in South Carolina, as I interpret Devereux v. Taft, 20 S. C., 555.

But no case has been cited from the decisions of this or any other State, where a court has held that when the intention to keep the mortgage alive is written in the deed of conveyance of the land and duly recorded, in such case the mortgage is extinguished. Dr. Pomeroy, in his admirable work on Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, pp. 248—9—50—1, tells us that the rule is universal, that where the intention is expressed in the conveyance, the mortgage remains open, and is not extinguished. The cases cited by the Supreme Court in the case of Devereux v. Taft (nor any cited by counsel here) do not involve or consider the question when there is an express stipulation that the mortgage shall be kept open to protect against liens and encumbrances. The case now under consideration by me illustrates how great injustice would result from a departure from the rule last stated by me.

*This case is of novel impression in South Carolina, yet I have no hesitation in making my decision. I find the issues presented before me in favor of the defendant; and it is therefore adjudged and decreed that the complaint be dismissed with costs for the defendant.

Mr. E. C. Haynsworth, for appellant.

Mr. J. H. Rion, contra.

November 27, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action to recover 210 acres of land under the following circumstances: On September 9, 1872, James M. Rutland and James H. Rion, as executors, conveyed to one G. P. Hoffman a tract of land containing 1,159 acres, which included the small tract in dispute. Hoffman gave his bond for the purchase money, with the defendant corporation as surety, and on the same day executed to the said railroad company a mortgage of the premises, to indemnify them against loss as such surety. On May 11, 1882, the plaintiff, Agnew, recovered a judgment against the said Hoffman and issued execution thereon. On October 27, 1882, the railroad company, as surety, having been required to make payments on the purchase money, settled with Hoffman, who assigned certain choses in action, paid a sum in lumber, and conveyed 560 acres of the land mortgaged to them, including the 210 acres now in dispute, towards payment of the mortgage debt.

This conveyance contained the following clause: "All of said tracts being portions of a tract of 1,159 acres purchased by me of James M. Rutland and James H. Rion, as executors, &c., on September 9, 1872, payment secured by my bond with the aforesaid company as surety, and a contemporaneous mortgage of the premises for joint security of grantors and surety; this grant, bargain, sale, and release being made with the consent of James H. Rion as a conveyance of the said three tracts of land, the same having been paid for by said railroad company; and hence I do hereby grant, bargain, sell, and release the said land subject to a *mortgage to said company, which is to remain open to protect against claim of dower, liens, and encumbrances, together," &c.

On March 3, 1884, the sheriff, under plaintiff's execution, sold the tract of 210 acres, and the plaintiff, becoming the purchaser, brought this action for the land. Trial by jury was waived, and Judge Wallace dismissed the complaint. The plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following grounds: "1. Because his honor did not find, in his fifth finding of fact, that on October 27, 1882, the said G. P. Hoffman and the defendant herein came to a settlement, in which said G. P. Hoffman assigned some choses in action and paid the defendant $205 in lumber, and conveyed to the defendant, in settlement of the balance due by him, 568 9-10 acres, it being a part of the original tract, and consisting of three tracts, of which the tract of 210 acres mentioned in the complaint is one. 2. Because his honor held that there being an express stipulation in the deed of conveyance that said mortgage should remain open, the conveyance from Hoffman to the defendant did not operate to merge or satisfy said mortgage as to the land conveyed to the defendant. 3. Because his honor did not hold that said mortgage was merged or satisfied by such conveyance, and that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of said tract of land. 4. Because his honor did not hold that even if said mortgage was not merged or satisfied, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the possession thereof, subject to the lien of said mortgage," &c.

It is true that under our law a mortgage of real estate is merely a security for the debt, the legal title remaining in the mortgagor. The conveyance of the land by Hoffman to the railroad company was subseto the recovery of Agnew's judgment against Hoffman, and, therefore, that conveyance alone could not stand in the way of title acquired under Agnew's judgment. The answer to this, however, is, that there was a lien upon the land when Agnew's judgment was recovered, viz., the mortgage of the railroad company, and that the land was conveyed to the company in payment of the debt secured by that senior lien. But to this it is replied that the conveyance of Hoffman, the mortgagor, to the company, the mortgagee, operated, by way of merger, to extinguish not only the whole mortgage debt, but the mortgage itself, leaving the land subject to the next lien, precisely as if the *mortgage had never existed; so that the question is whether the court must apply the technical legal doctrine of merger, and thereby declare the mortgage extinguished, notwithstanding the stipulation of the parties, expressed in the conveyance itself, that the mortgage should "remain open" to protect the purchaser, who had paid the debt, against liens subsequent to the mortgage, but prior to the conveyance of Hoffman to the railroad company.

In this State the legal doctrine of merger has been applied to the case of a mortgagee purchasing from the mortgagor, or under legal process against him, the interest known as the equity of redemption. See Devereux v. Taft, 20 S. C., 558. The general doctrine as stated by Chancellor Wardlaw in the case of Allen v. Richardson (9 Rich. Eq., 53), is, "that a mortgagee, who buys the estate under mortgage, not under process of foreclosure of his lien, extinguishes the debt or claim with lien on the land," &c. It will be observed that the rule as here announced excludes from its operation a case, where the mortgage premises are sold to pay the mortgage debt, under process of foreclosure. In such case the mortgagee may purchase and take good title. So far as title to the premises is concerned, it is somewhat difficult to draw a distinction in principle between a sale for the purpose of paying the mortgage debt under proceedings of foreclosure and one for the same purpose by the mortgagor himself. It is at least intelligible how such a purchase might be held as an extinguishment of any portion of the mortgage debt which the conveyance of the land failed to pay. But it is not equally clear why a private sale for the same purpose should be considered as placing the matter in the same condition as if neither the mortgage debt nor the mortgage had ever existed. It would seem that a conveyance in part payment of the debt secured should at least carry good title to the extent of the payment made upon the debt. Such is undoubtedly the result when the sale is made under proceedings to foreclose the lien.

But, assuming the rule to be as stated, none of the cases in our books deal with any of the exceptions and qualifications of the general rule; as, for instance, the case of an express written agreement by the parties that there should be no merger, but that the mortgage shall remain open for the protection of the *purchaser. Although this precise point has never before arisen in this State, it seems that the general law upon the subject is well settled. Mr. Pomeroy states the doctrine as follows: "When the owner of the fee becomes absolutely entitled in his own right to a charge or encumbrance upon the same land, with no intervening interest or lien, the charge will at law merge in the ownership and cease to exist. Under like circumstances a merger will take place in equity, where no intention to prevent it has been expressed, and none is implied from the circumstances and interests of the party. Generally the same results follow, whether a mortgagee assigns a mortgage to the mortgagor or the mortgagor conveys the land to the mortgagee." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 790. And in the sections following he further says: "If there is no reason for keeping it (the mortgage) alive, then equity will, in the absence of any declaration of his intention, destroy it; but if there is any reason for keeping it alive, such as the existence of another encumbrance, equity will not destroy it. In short, where the legal ownership of the land and the absolute ownership of the encumbrance become vested in the same person, the intention governs the merger in equity. If the intention has been expressed, it controls," &c. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 791, and authorities in note; Jones Mort., § 848; Insurance Company v. Murphy, 111 U. S., 744 [4 Sup. Ct. 679, 28 L. Ed. 582].

We agree with the Circuit Judge, that in this case the express agreement of the parties prevented a technical merger, and the senior mortgage of the company is still open. The plaintiff, Agnew, only purchased the equity of redemption, and he is not entitled to recover possession of the land in this action. Possibly he may, upon tender of the mortgage debt, have his action to redeem, but upon that subject we rule nothing in advance.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court in this case. The general rule, as established in this State, undoubtedly is, that where *the mortgagee buys the mortgaged premises, except under a sale for a foreclosure of the mortgage, the mortgage debt is extinguished. Snell v. Schroder, Bail. Eq., 334; McLure v. Wheeler, 6 Rich. Eq., 343; Allen v. Richardson, 9 Rich. Eq., 53;

Deveraux v. Taft, 20 S. C. 555, recognized, also, in Trimmer v. Vise, 17 S. C., 499 [43 Am. Rep. 624].

It is claimed, however, that to this admitted general rule there is at least one exception, viz., that where there is an express stipulation to the contrary, at the time the mortgagee acquires the title to the mortgaged premises, no extinguishment will take place. There is no doubt that there are strong authorities elsewhere, some of which are cited in the opinion of the majority of the court, which not only fully sustain the view there taken, but go much further, and establish the doctrine that in equity it is always a question of intention, and that even where such intention is not expressed, it may be inferred from the fact that it is to the interest of the mortgagee to keep the mortgage alive, as, for example, where there is an intervening encumbrance. But these authorities, while entitled to the highest respect, are not, like the decisions in this State, binding upon this court, whose duty it is to determine what is the law of this State. Now, it is not pretended that there is any case in this State which establishes or even recognizes any such exception as that contended for, to the well settled general rule. On the contrary, in all of the cases above cited, there were intervening encumbrances, which made it to the interest of the mortgagee that the mortgage debt should not be extinguished, and yet there is not the slightest intimation in any one of them that that circumstance could affect the result.

Indeed, it may be doubted whether the doctrine of merger, upon which the rule, with its exceptions, is rested by the authorities elsewhere, is applicable to a mortgage in this State. Merger applies to an estate, and as, since the act of 1791, a mortgage here is not the conveyance of an estate, but is simply a security for a debt, it may lead to confusion if such a doctrine be applied to a mortgage. The principle upon which the rule here is based is well stated by Mr. Chief Justice Simpson in Trimmer v. Vise, 17 S. C., at page 501 [43 Am. Rep. 624], as follows: "The right of the mortgagor *to redeem being the only interest that can be sold by a judgment junior to the mortgage, the purchaser at such sale, whether he be the mortgagee or a stranger, is supposed to give the amount of his bid for that interest, over and above the mortgage debt, leaving the land, when purchased by a stranger, still subject to be sold for the mortgage debt, and when purchased by the mortgagee to be applied in satisfaction of his debt, which by operation of law is thereby extinguished." Or, as is said by Mr. Chief Justice Moses, in Edwards v. Sanders, 6 S. C., at page 334: "All the right reserved by the mortgagor is transferred to the mortgagee, who then holds in the premises the interest both of the creditor and debtor, and there is nothing left on which the lien of the mortgage can operate. Where the sale is under a junior judgment, a third party purchasing must not only pay the bid which he has made for the only interest which the sheriff can sell, but, to enjoy an unencumbered estate in the land, he must satisfy the mortgage which still retains its lien. If the mortgagee purchases, to whom is such payment to be made? Not only is the lien destroyed but the debt also."

I am, therefore, unable to find any warrant for saying that there is any such exception as that contended for to, what I understand to be, the well settled rule in this State: nor do I see any reason why such an exception should be engrafted on the rule, inasmuch as a mortgagee always has it in his power to protect himself by the ordinary proceeding for the foreclosure of his mortgage.

It is said, however, that in this case there was an express agreement, entered into in writing, between the mortgagor and mortgagee, at the time of the purchase, that the mortgage was "to remain open to protect against claim of dower, liens, and encumbrances," and that, as there is no case in this State where the general rule has been applied, in which there was any such agreement, the question is now an open one, and we are at liberty to follow the authorities elsewhere. This is all true, but how such an agreement can affect the rights of third persons not parties to it, is difficult to understand. But in addition to this, the fact that the intention which, according to the authorities relied on, determines the question of merger, is expressed in writing, cannot be *decisive. It may facilitate proof of its existence, but it cannot give it an effect which it would not otherwise have. According to those authorities, if the intention that there shall be no merger is ascertained, whether by express proof or implied from the circumstances, it controls. I do not see how it is possible that the mode in which it is ascertained can affect its nature or effects. It is true that there are some things which are required to be in writing, as, for example, a contract for the sale of land, which have no efficacy unless so expressed; but this is not of that class. It does not seem to me, therefore, that the fact that the intention that the mortgage should not be extinguished, was expressed in writing, takes this case out of the operation of the rule as settled in this State.

There is no doubt that at the time the defendant bought the land from Hoffman now in controversy it was covered by two liens—the mortgage to the railroad company and the judgment in favor of the plaintiff—and there is as little doubt that if any one else had been the purchaser, he could not have acquired an unencumbered title without satisfying both of those liens, as against those who held those liens he could not retain the land unless he paid the debts secured by such liens. How does the fact that the mortgagee was the purchaser alter the case? To hold the land, it must pay or satisfy both of the liens; and being thus liable to pay the mortgage debt due to itself, the company united in itself the character of both debtor and creditor, and, according to a well settled rule, when this is the case, the debt was paid by operation of law, and the only remaining lien on the land was the judgment in favor of the plaintiff. This lien being senior to the title which the defendant acquired by purchase from Hoffman, any sale under it must give the purchaser at such sale the better title, and hence it seems to me that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover the land. Of course, I do not mean to say that the mere fact that the purchaser has bought the mortgaged premises makes him absolutely liable, in all events, to pay the mortgage debt, but I do mean to say that before he can retain the land he must pay, or in some other way satisfy, the mortgage debt; and hence, if he insists upon retaining the land, he thereby becomes liable for the mortgage debt.

*It may be a hard case that the company should lose its debt as well as the land which it received in payment of such debt, but it only adds another to the numerous cases in which parties have incautiously bought and paid for property covered by liens, the enforcement of which subsequently has deprived them of the property. In this case, however, it appears that the parcel of land here in controversy does not constitute the whole of the land covered by the mortgage, and it may be, under the case of Trimmer v. Vise, supra, that the defendant may yet enforce its mortgage upon the balance of the land. Be that as it may, however, it does seem to me altogether anomalous that the defendant, after acquiring the fee simple title to the land in controversy, should still hold a mortgage upon it—a lien upon its own land.

But if I am wrong in these views, and the defendant still retains its mortgage lien on the premises, still I do not see why the plaintiff cannot recover the land and hold possession of it until it is sold under proper proceedings to foreclose the mortgage. If a person other than the mortgagee had bought the land at private sale from the mortgagor, he could only have bought the mortgagor's interest therein, called the equity of redemption, and such interest would still be liable, in the hands of such purchaser, to levy and sale under the plaintiff's judgment; and if sold under that judgment and bought by the plaintiff, he, certainly, could recover from such purchaser the possession of the land and hold it until it was sold under a proceeding to foreclose the mortgage. How does the fact, that the purchaser at private sale was the mortgagee, alter the case? The mortgagee by such purchase acquired, and could only acquire, the equity of redemption, which, in its hands as well as in the hands of any other purchaser, would be liable to levy and sale under the plaintiff's judgment; and when so sold and bought by the plaintiff, it seems to me that he is entitled to recover the possession and hold it until the defendant sees fit to have it sold under its mortgage.

It may be said that this would lead to circuity of action, and involve the necessity of instituting another action, when the whole matter could be determined in the present proceeding, or rather in the action which the plaintiff ought to have brought, viz., an action to redeem, which it was argued was the plaintiff's only *remedy. This course would be open to two objections: first, it would force a plaintiff to advance from his own pocket the whole amount of the mortgage debt, which might in many cases prove to be very inconvenient, if not impracticable, whereas if the land is sold at public outcry, and it is really worth more than the mortgage debt, the plaintiff's interests would be very much better protected. Indeed, to allow the mortgaged premises, subject also to a junior lien, to be transferred to the mortgagee by a private arrangement between the mortgagee and mortgagor, would open the door to collusion between these parties, which might work serious detriment to the holder of the junior lien, but where the premises are sold at public sale under the mortgage, the supposition is that they will bring their full value and the interests of all parties are protected. Of course, I am not to be understood as intimating that there was any collusion in the present case, as there is no ground for such an intimation; but I am only looking to the general principle.

The second objection to the remedy by action to redeem, suggested as the plaintiff's only remedy, is that it would deprive the plaintiff of the right to throw the mortgagee upon the balance of the mortgaged premises, upon the principle that where there are two creditors of a common debtor, one of whom has a claim or lien upon two funds, and the other upon only one of these funds, the latter has an equity to require the former first to exhaust the fund upon which he has no claim or lien. It appears that the mortgage covered 1,159 acres, and the portion here in dispute is only 210 acres. What has become of the balance of the land does not appear. All that we know is that 568 9-10 acres, embracing the tract in dispute, has been conveyed to the defendant. If the remainder of the 1,159 acres is still in the hands of the mortgagor, then clearly the defendant ought to be required to go upon that for the mortgage debt, to the relief of the 210 acres claimed by the plaintiff. This, however, could not be required if the plaintiff's only remedy is an action to redeem. But even if this objection should not prove to be practically applicable to this particular case, yet it is sufficient to illustrate my objections to the conclusion reached by the majority of the court.

It seems to me, therefore, that in any view of the case the *plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the land in controversy.

Before Aldrich, J., Union, June, 1884.

This was an appeal from the following decree:

"The petitioner, as widow of John Broxie Jeter, in behalf of herself and their two minor children, has asked this court for a writ of mandamus to require the master of this court to appoint commissioners to assign and set apart a homestead to the petitioner and her children.

"It seems that a case has been and still is pending in this court involving, in part, the settlement of the estate of J. Broxie Jeter, deceased, a marshalling of his assets, &c. J. Broxie Jeter held his lands under a bond for titles, and one of the claims presented against his estate was a balance on the note given for the purchase money. The cause came on for a hearing before Judge *Wallace, who considered the question of the right of the widow and children to a homestead in the lands in question, and held that she was not entitled to a homestead. From this decree no appeal has been taken. Under this decree a part of the lands were sold. Afterwards Judge Kershaw, by consent of all the parties of record, ordered a sale of the remaining tract of land, which is the tract now claimed as homestead. Before the sale Augusta A. Jeter, in behalf of herself and children, filed her petition with the master of this county to have a homestead assigned and set apart to herself and children. The sale was had and petitioner became the purchaser thereof at the price of $800, but she has never complied. Since said sale the master has heard the petition for homestead and declined to appoint commissioners to assign it. From this decision the petitioner has appealed to this court, and in the same paper asks for the writ of mandamus above stated.

"It appears to the court that the question of Mrs. Jeter's and her children's right to a homestead in these lands of her deceased husband, was presented to Judge Wallace and passed upon by him in his decree, and I will not interfere with his decision. I regard his decree as conclusive upon this point. The appeal from this decision of the master is dismissed, and the application for a writ of mandamus refused."

November 30, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. John Broxie Jeter died intestate in 1880, leaving a widow, Augusta A. Jeter, and two infant children, Grace and Mabel. James Munro, Esq., as clerk of the court, administered upon his estate, and instituted these proceedings for several purposes, not necessary to be mentioned now, and among them, to marshal the assets of the estate. It appeared that the estate was insolvent; that the intestate at the time of his death left his widow and children aforesaid living on *a tract of land (272 acres) for which he never had legal title, but had gone into possession under the following circumstances: the said tract of land was a part of 752 acres which William Munro, Esq., had several years before purchased for one B. A. Jeter, who had agreed to sell the same to the intestate, giving him bond for titles upon the payment of the purchase money. The intestate was let into the possession. He sold 248 acres of the land to Kate Busby Jeter for $500, and also 232 acres to his mother for $500, leaving the remainder, 272 acres, in his possession, upon which he with his family lived until his death, at which time there was still due a portion of the purchase money, $511.63.

The cause was heard by Judge Wallace, who, on October 9, 1882, rendered a decree, in which, among other things, he said: "The only point at all contested before me was the right of Mrs. Augusta A. Jeter and her children to a homestead in the land upon which they are now living; but the case of Garaty & Armstrong v. DuBose (5 S. C. 493), is direct authority against this claim and binding upon me." And accordingly he ordered so much of the land sold as it was supposed would be sufficient to pay the aforesaid balance of the purchase money, and also the other debts of the intestate; but leaving out that part of the land on which stood the residence of the family.¹ There was no appeal from this *decree, and the portion of the land included in the order was sold and the proceeds applied in the payment of the debts. The aforesaid balance of the purchase money for the land was paid in full, but it turned out that the proceeds of this ¹The order of sale was as follows:

It is therefore ordered and decreed, that the land heretofore described as having been purchased by Kate Busby Jeter be vested in her and her heirs for ever, and that the Beaver tract be vested in the infant children of James J. Jeter, deceased, to wit, Maud, Eula, Eugene, Ernest, and Virgie, and their heirs for ever; that the J. Broxie Jeter tract of 272 acres be subdivided into two tracts, as nearly equal in size as is practicable, without prejudice to the value of each subdivision as a separate tract; that the Sarah C. Jeter tract (exclusive of the Beaver tract) and that subdivision of the J. Broxie Jeter tract which does not contain the dwelling house and outbuildings, be separately sold by James Munro, Esq., as clerk of this court, or as master, as the case may be, on salesday in November next, or on some convenient salesday thereafter, upon the following terms, to wit, one-third cash, balance in equal instalments in one and two years, with interest from day of sale, to be secured by bond of the purchaser with one or more sureties and a mortgage of the property; that the costs of these proceedings be charged one-half against the proceeds of the sale of the Sarah C. Jeter place and one-half against the proceeds of the sale of the J. Broxie Jeter place. That if the amount sale were not sufficient to pay the other debts of the estate, all of which were contracted since the adoption of the constitution allowing homestead.

Afterwards, as it would seem, with the consent of all the parties of record, Judge Kershaw ordered a sale of the remaining portion of the land, upon which stands the residence, in which the intestate had lived and his wife and children still live. But before the sale of this second parcel was actually made, the widow, Augusta A. Jeter, filed a petition before the master, James Munro, to have homestead in her deceased husband's estate set off to her and her children. The land, however, was offered for sale as ordered, and bid off by the widow for $800, but she declined to comply with the terms of sale. After this sale, the master formally dismissed the petition for homestead. From this refusal of the master to have homestead set off, the petitioner appealed to the Circuit Court, praying also for a writ *of mandamus requiring the master to appoint commissioners to lay off the homestead. Judge Aldrich refused the application and dismissed the appeal, holding that the matter was res adjudicata by the decree of Judge Wallace, in the proceedings in the Common Pleas.

From this order the widow and children appeal to this court upon the following grounds: "I. For that his honor held that the question of the right of homestead of Augusta A. Jeter and her children was concluded by the decision of Judge Wallace, denying the right of homestead; whereas he should have held that Judge Wallace had no jurisdiction to determine the question in the proceedings before him. II. For that his honor held that the question of the right of homestead was concluded by the decision of Judge Wallace; although since the said decision the purchase money of the land, out realized to the estate of J. Broxie Jeter from the sales above ordered be sufficient to pay its proportion of the costs and also debts due by the said estate, together with the expenses of administration, that then the remaining subdivision of the J. Broxie Jeter place, with the dwelling house and other improvements thereon, be vested in Augusta A. Jeter, Grace Jeter, and Mabel Jeter, their heirs and assigns for ever, share and share alike; but if such amount so realized be insufficient to pay such claims and demands, that the said dwelling house subdivision be then sold on salesday in November next, or on some subsequent salesday, by the same officer and upon the same terms as is above directed as to the other two tracts. * * *

That the proceeds of the sale of the J. Broxie Jeter lands, after payment of its proportion of costs, together with the interest of said Broxie in his mother's lands, be applied first to the payment of five hundred and eleven and 63-100 dollars, with interest from this date, balance due to Thomas B. Jeter, administrator of B. A. Jeter, or other party entitled to the same, and the remainder of the proceeds to the expenses of administration and the debts ascertained and adjudged against the estate of J. Broxie Jeter; the remainder, if any, to be paid to his widow and children, to each one-third.—REPORTER.

of which homestead is claimed, has been paid off and the decedent's estate has become entitled to receive a legal title. III. Because his honor held that a widow and minor children were not entitled to homestead in a tract of land held by the deceased husband and father under a bond for titles; although the purchase money thereof has been fully paid, and the said land been in possession of such husband and father and of his widow and children for more than ten years."

Notwithstanding the numerous decisions upon the subject, it seems that new questions are constantly arising under the provisions of the constitution and laws respecting homestead.

There can be nothing in the fact that the land had been in the possession of the intestate and his family for more than ten years. The possession of the widow and children come through the intestate, who entered under an agreement to purchase, and consequently his possession was not adverse.

We do not see that the question of the right to homestead on the part of the widow and children was conclusively adjudged against them by the decree of Judge Wallace, which was rendered in an equity proceeding originally filed in the Court of Common Pleas, without any special reference to the question of homestead. That question, however, seems to have been made before the judge, who held, upon the authority of Garaty & Armstrong v. DuBose, supra, that the widow and children were *not entitled to homestead, for the reason that the land was held by the intestate under a contract to purchase, which gave only an equitable title, not the subject of levy and sale. It is true the question of the right of the widow to homestead did not arise before Judge Wallace upon a regular application to have homestead laid off, in the manner prescribed by law, but in an action to marshal the assets of the estate, and for that purpose to sell land, in aid of the personal property. He had no jurisdiction as an original question made in that case to have homestead laid off; for that purpose, the law did not give him the proper machinery. But it is not necessary in this case, and we would not be willing to hold that the Court of Common Pleas, in a proceeding to marshal the assets of an insolvent estate, has not jurisdiction to decide the question simply of the right to homestead. In marshalling assets it may become necessary to decide that question.

But assuming this to be so, Judge Wallace only adjudged and could only adjudge that question, according to the facts as they then existed. At that time, the whole of the purchase money had not been paid, but afterwards it was paid; and when this proceeding was instituted on November 19, 1883, to have the homestead laid off, the question was presented under a different state of facts, and should have been determined according to the state of facts as they then existed. As was said in Chafee & Co. v. Rainey (21 S. C., 11): "The real question is, does the condition of things exist under which the constitution forbids the use of the process of the courts in enforcing the collection of debts?"

It is obvious that the condition of things now is different from what it was when Judge Wallace rendered his judgment. Then the land, as to which the exemption was claimed, was held only under a contract to purchase, where a part of the purchase money was still due; now the purchase money has been fully paid. There the legal title was in the vendor under a trust first to secure the payment of the remainder of the purchase money, and then to convey to the vendee; now the only trust is to convey to the vendee or his heirs. Until the whole purchase money was paid, it could not be known with certainty whether the trust to convey would ever become operative, or whether it might not be *necessary to sell the whole of the land to satisfy the primary trust; but now that uncertainty no longer exists, and the vendee has an absolute right to a conveyance. It is not unlike the case of one who sets up a claim of homestead which is adjudged against him, upon the ground that he is not the head of a family, and afterwards and before a sale of the land is made, he does become the head of a family and again makes application to have homestead set off to him under this new state of facts. We suppose there can be no doubt that the first judgment would not be held as adjudging conclusively, as a bar to his claim, based upon a wholly different condition of things. We do not think that the right to homestead was res adjudicata.

The question, then, being res integra, were the widow and children of John Broxie Jeter entitled to homestead in the remaining tract, upon which he was living at his death, and they still live? When the petition for homestead was filed (November 19, 1883) no part of the purchase money remained unpaid, and they could have demanded the legal title. All the debts then existing were contracted after the constitution, and if the legal title had been executed, there can be no doubt that they would have been entitled to homestead; and the question now is, whether the fact that such title was not executed should deprive them of homestead, upon the ground that there cannot be homestead in land held only by an equitable title. Is this the law? Going back to the fountain-head, we do not see anything in the constitution, or in the amendment of 1880, or in any of the acts of the legislature in pursuance thereof, which necessarily restricts the right of homestead to land in which there is legal title, or which requires, as in respect to dower, that there should be legal seizin. The constitution makes no reference whatever to the character of the title to land in which homestead is given. Section 20 of article I. simply declares that "a reasonable amount of property as a homestead shall be exempt from seizure and sale," &c. Section 32 of article II. declares that "the family homestead of the head of each family residing in the State, such homestead, consisting of dwelling house, * * * shall be exempt from attachment, levy, or sale on any mesne or final process, issued from any court," &c.;

and the phraseology of the amendment of 1880 is that "the general assembly shall make such laws as will exempt from attachment and sale under any mesne or final process issued from any court to the head of any family residing in this State, a homestead in lands, whether held in fee or any lesser estate," &c. We fail to see in any of these provisions anything which excludes homestead in land held by an equitable title; but, on the contrary, they all seem to contemplate the exemption without regard to the title.

This court has held that the homestead provision does not undertake to deal with the estate of the debtor; that the right is neither a lien nor new estate, but a mere negation of the ordinary remedies of the creditor as to certain property for certain purposes, an "exemption," dealing merely with the means of enforcing the contract and leaving the title of the property untouched. Being a mere "exemption" from judicial process, what difference can it make whether the title to the property be legal or equitable? From the very nature of the right, the object being to secure a shelter, a home, it would seem to have reference rather to the physical state of the property itself than to the nature and quality of the title. The right, of course, must always be subject to the payment of the purchase money; but, as we understand it, that is entirely independent of the nature of the title, and is equally necessary whether the estate be legal or equitable. We do not see why there may not be homestead in lands held only by an equitable title.

This view is certainly sustained by a great preponderance of authority. Most of the States of the Union have homestead laws, which, while differing from each other in various particulars, are very much the same in their general scope. Nearly all of these States hold the doctrine that homestead is allowable in lands held only by equitable title. Mr. Thompson lays it down as follows: "Will an equitable estate support a homestead right? This question must be answered in the affirmative. Thus an equity of redemption will support a homestead right. In such case the mortgagor, though he holds subject to the mortgage debt, holds his homestead paramount to his other creditors. * * * And so will possession under a verbal contract of purchase support the homestead right. And so will possession under an unexecuted written contract of purchase," &c. Thomp Homest., § 170, and notes, citing authorities from at least ten States, viz., Vermont, Minnesota, Iowa, Michigan, Kansas, Illinois, Wisconsin, Texas, Mississippi, and North Carolina. In MacManus v. Campbell (37 Tex., 267), the doctrine is stated as follows: "The homestead rights attach whenever the property is dedicated to that purpose. This dedication may be made even before the fee passes, or the whole of the purchase money is paid, subject only to the vendor's lien"—that is, the payment of the purchase money where the vendor's lien is not allowed. In Allen v. Hawley (66 Ill., 173), it is stated thus: "The residence was on the west half, and it is insisted that because Hardy only had an equitable title to that part of the quarter section, the right of homestead did not attach. I do not see how the proposition assumed can be maintained. * * * Mrs. Hardy was entitled to a homestead in the premises as against all the indebtedness of her husband, except for the purchase money or improvements."

But it is urged that the question has been settled in this State in the case of Garaty & Armstrong v. DuBose, 5 S. C., 493. It is true that the syllabus of that case does indicate that the question was there made and decided. We think, however, that a careful examination of the case as reported will disclose the fact that it is at least doubtful whether the exact point in question was there made at all. R. M. DuBose was a bachelor, who kept an establishment with furniture, employees, and hired servants on a tract of land which he held under an unexecuted written contract to purchase, with one-third of the purchase money still unpaid. The sheriff, under executions against him, levied this land and his personal property, and being ruled for not selling, he made return "that DuBose, the defendant in execution, claimed homestead and exemption of the articles of personal property, and that the defendant had no such interest in the land as that it could be levied and sold. The plaintiffs insisted that the defendant was not 'the head of a family,' and therefore not entitled to homestead or exemption." Really, the only two questions in the case were, first, whether DuBose was the head of a family. If so, he was entitled to homestead in the personalty; but if not, then, second, whether he had a leviable interest in the land, and if not, the levy was void. These were certainly the only questions argued. The court held that DuBose was not the head of a family in the sense of the constitution and laws, and therefore not entitled to homestead at all.

That was necessarily the end of the whole matter, except as to the ulterior question, whether the defendant in execution had a leviable interest in the land. Upon that question the court held that a mere equity was not leviable under execution, which was the point made; but the court went further and held the unnecessary point, which had not been argued, that because DuBose had no leviable interest in the land, therefore he would not have been entitled to homestead in it, even if he were (which he was not) the head of a family. The chief justice said: "If the claim to a homestead by the respondent, DuBose, was founded only on his interest in the land of which he is the occupant, it would be enough to say that he does not hold it by any legal title, and only to such does the homestead provision apply. The constitution (art. II., sec. 32) expressly refers to the real estate of the head of a family, subject to sale "under mesne or final process issued from any court. It presupposes a title capable of transfer by such a sale. The respondent here has no legal title to the real estate. He has but an equitable interest. It can never ripen into a legal title until the full consideration agreed to be paid has been satisfied. The constitution and the several acts of the legislature in their various provisions in regard to the homestead exemption, all look to an interest in the land, which can be transferred by a judicial sale. The mere equitable interest which the claimant holds in the real estate does not entitle him to its benefit," &c.

But if we must assume that the question was fairly before the court and decided in the case of DuBose, it does not follow that it should necessarily be conclusive of this. In this case the equitable interest has substantially "ripened into the legal title." Besides, the case of DuBose arose in connection with the enforcement of an execution, and, as appears from the judgment itself, was decided under the law as it stood before 1873. Up to that time certainly it seemed to be considered that process was an indispensable prerequisite to the assertion of the claim of home*stead. In that view, it was easy to conclude that the questions of homestead and of having an estate leviable under execution were identical, and that there could be no homestead where there was no legal estate capable of being levied and sold under execution. But in 1873 the legislature passed an act (15 Stat., 372) which gives the right to the widow and children of a deceased debtor to petition the probate judge (now master or clerk) to have homestead set off to them, "although no process has been lodged with any officer against the homestead," thus in such case disconnecting the question of the right to homestead from the enforcement of process or any inquiry as to the character of the estate. It seems to us that it is enough to entitle the parties to the exemption if a homestead has been established upon the land, and it may be attached, levied, or sold under proceedings or "process of any court" either in law or equity; always, of course, subject to the payment of the purchase money.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the conclusions herein announced.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to abate an alleged nuisance and for damages against the defendant Switzer for erecting on his land immediately below and adjoining the lands of the first named plaintiff a dam across a stream known as North Raburn Creek, in Laurens County. The plaintiffs, R. Y. and P. M. Hellams, as tenants in common, owned one tract of land immediately above the land of the defendant, and each of the other nine plaintiffs, viz., W. L. Hopkins, J. R. Brownlee, G. W. Anderson, J. R. Childress, D. D. Harris, Hannah Babb, William Hellams, L. R. Babb, and Gideon Yeargin, owns a separate and distinct parcel of land on the creek above the aforesaid dam, and none of them has any interest in the lands of either of the others named.

The plaintiffs all unite in one complaint and in stating one cause of action as follows: "III. That the defendant, John R. Switzer, has recently, against the wishes and the solemn protest of these plaintiffs and manifold other citizens of the community surrounding these farms, erected upon his lands immediately below and joining the lands of the first plaintiffs, R. Y. and P. M. Hellams and W. L. Hopkins, a considerable dam across the body of the said North Raburn Creek, and thereby has and is obstructing the flow and the necessary drainage of the said lands by means of the channel of the said creek, causing the said channel *to fill up with sand and other rubbish above the said dam and along through the lands of these plaintiffs so as to materially injure the lands of these plaintiffs and render them useless for agricultural purposes. IV. That these plaintiffs are damaged by the said overflow of water and sand upon their land and the obstruction of their proper drainage, by reason of the said dam erected by the said defendant, in the sum of five thousand dollars. V. These plaintiffs further allege that the said dam, obstructing the water of the said creek and causing it to spread out over so much land in and above the pond, is the cause of chills, fevers, and other malarial diseases in the country around, and makes it dangerous for their families to remain upon the premises, and that the said dam is a source of inestimable injury and damage to these plaintiffs; that said dam is a nuisance, hurtful and injurious to the health of the families and tenants of these plaintiffs, and a great damage to other property," &c. And the said plaintiffs pray that the aforesaid nuisance may be abated; that the said defendant be required to remove the said dam forthwith, and all other obstacles placed by him in said creek, and for a perpetual injunction, and for $5,000 damages, &c.

The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground "that several causes of action were improperly united in this, that it appears upon the face of the complaint that the several plaintiffs are owners of separate and distinct tracts of land, and that one plaintiff has no interest in the lands of the others," &c. On the trial of the cause, the defendant interposed the further oral demurrer "that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

On hearing the cause, Judge Pressley passed the following order: "It is ordered and adjudged, that the first ground of demurrer be overruled. It is further ordered and adjudged, that the second ground of demurrer be sustained, with leave to the plaintiffs to amend their complaint if they desire to do so."

The plaintiffs and defendant both appeal—the plaintiffs on the ground that his honor erred in holding that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; the defendant on the ground that his honor erred in overruling the *written demurrer of the defendant, and in not holding that several causes of action had been improperly united.

First. As to the alleged misjoinder of several causes of action. There is no doubt that there may be more than one cause of action in a complaint. Indeed, under the reformed procedure there may be causes of action either legal or equitable, or both, and to any number; but they must be harmonious. The code prescribes the character of those which may be thus united in the same complaint. Section 188 declares that "the plaintiff may unite in the same complaint several causes of action, whether they be such as have been heretofore denominated legal or equitable, or both, where they all arise out of (1) the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action; or (2) contract express or implied; or (3) injuries with or without force to person and property, or either, &c. * * * But the causes of action must all belong to one of these classes, and, except in actions for the foreclosure of mortgages, must affect all the parties to the action, and not require different places of trial, and must be separately stated," &c.

These provisions plainly indicate that there is a limit to this authorized union; and when the complaint contains more than one cause of action, the very important question may arise whether they are of such a character as may be joined in the same action. But, of course, there must be more than one cause of action stated in the complaint before that question can arise; and to be a cause of action, the matter must be stated separately—"that is, each must be set forth in a separate and distinct division of the complaint, in such manner that each of these divisions might, if taken alone, be the subject of an independent action." Pom. Rem., § 442; Hammond v. Railroad Company, 15 S. C. 10. If the plaintiff endeavors to state more than one cause of action, and merely fails to give them, in form and manner, distinct and separate existence, it is considered a vice in pleading; but the remedy is not by demurrer, but by notice to make the pleadings more definite and certain by separating and distinctly stating the different causes of action. Pom. Rem., § 447.

Now, as to this case, are there two or more causes of action *stated, or attempted to be stated, in the complaint? It seems to us not. True, there are several plaintiffs, each of whom owns a particular tract of land, without having anything in common with the other plaintiffs, other than alleged injury to health and property arising from the same cause. There is no effort to give any one of these plaintiffs a separate and distinct cause of action, alleging injury to himself, and stating the amount of damage done to him separately. On the contrary, while the complaint does state the separate ownership of the different parcels of land, it is all done jointly in the same paragraph or division, stating one single cause of action, as if they were tenants in common of the different tracts, and claiming for all together damages in solido, to the extent of five thousand dollars, without indicating what part of the common damage was the share of the plaintiffs respectively. The plaintiffs having made no effort to state, perfectly or imperfectly, several causes of action, but all having joined in one, it seems to us that this is not a case for the application of the rules which govern the joinder of actions, but rather of those which apply to the joinder of parties. If so, the written demurrer of the defendant complaining of a misjoinder of causes of action does not reach the point which the defendant manifestly intended to make, in reference to the separate ownership of the lands by the different plaintiffs in the united action. Whether the several plaintiffs, owning the different parcels of land claimed to be damaged, could be united in one joint action, is a different question, which we will now proceed to consider.

Second. Did the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? We have just seen that it did not undertake to state more than one cause of action, and the question now is, whether that one was properly and legally stated, and, as we indicated before, that must be determined with reference to the law as to the joinder of plaintiffs.

In order to have a clear view of the principles involved, it will be proper to settle one or two preliminary points. So far as these plaintiffs are concerned, the alleged nuisance must be considered as private in its character, for, if a public nuisance, the only proper remedy was by indictment, unless in addition to the public offence they had alleged special damage to themselves, *which they did not do. McLanchlin v. Railroad Company, 5 Rich., 583; State v. Rankin, 3 S. C., 447 [16 Am. Rep. 737].

The action being for damages on account of a private nuisance and to abate the same, must be considered to be an action at law, such as, under the old procedure, would have been called "an action on the case." It is true that the code has destroyed the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and abolished the forms of action requiring that there shall be but one form of action for the enforcement of private rights; but the code did not undertake to destroy the inherent differences between legal and equitable rights, or to affect the primary right or the remedies, which the municipal law creates and confers. The mere formal differences between actions are abolished, while the substantial differences remain as before. The facts determine the nature of the action as being legal or equitable. The complaint does pray not only legal but equitable relief as by injunction, &c., but it will not be forgotten that one of the standing admonitions of text writers upon the codes is, not to confound the cause of action with the nature of the relief sought. They have no necessary connection. The question of nuisance or no nuisance is legal in its character, which the defendant has the right to have passed upon by a jury. In fact, as a general rule, an original action will not lie on the equity side of the court to enjoin a nuisance, unless the matter complained of is itself a nuisance per se. "When the thing sought to be restrained is not in itself noxious, but only something which may, according to circumstances, prove to be so, the Court of Equity will refuse to interfere until the matter has been decided at law by an action." See Kennerty v. Etiwan Phosphate Co., 17 S. C., 411 [43 Am. Rep. 607].

Being, then, an action at law, it is perfectly plain that, according to the old procedure, it would be a misjoinder to unite in one action two or more plaintiffs, having separate and distinct rights in parcels of land claimed to be injured by the same cause. Mr. Pomeroy says: "The requirements of the common law rules that all persons jointly interested shall unite as plaintiffs in any action brought to maintain the interest, and that in the case of a several right, each separate holder of it should sue alone, was very peremptory, and upon these were based the form, extent, and even *possibility of the judgment to be rendered. * * * Persons jointly entitled, or having a joint legal interest in the property or other rights affected by a tort, must join in actions brought to recover damages therefor. On the other hand, when the interest and right and the damages are both several, each person who has suffered the wrong must sue separately. In accordance with this principle, two or more plaintiffs cannot in general sue for torts to the person or character, such as assaults, libels, slander, and the like," &c. Pom. Rem., §§ 184, 189.

But the code has changed in some respects the modes of procedure, and the question now is, whether it has so changed the law in relation to parties, as to allow a number of plaintiffs, having no interest in common, but separate and distinct rights, to unite in one action for damages in bulk, to their respective rights of person and property, alleged to proceed from the same cause. A careful examination of the code will disclose the fact that it does not in terms repeal the old law as to parties, which, as we suppose, is still the law wherever it has not been superseded or repealed by necessary implication. The question is really one of construction as to how far the code has abrogated or modified the old rule upon the subject. Section 138 provides that, "All persons having an interest in the subject of the action, and in obtaining the relief demanded, may be joined as plaintiffs, except as otherwise provided in this title." And section 140 declares, "Of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants; but if the consent of any one, who should have been joined as plaintiff, cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint; and when the question is one of a common or general interest of many persons, or where the parties are very numerous, and it may be impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of the whole," &c.

These provisions are certainly very vague and indefinite. The object, doubtless, was to simplify the procedure, but it seems to us that, in this instance at least, it was not attained. There is certainly upon this point as much confusion and obscurity now as before the adoption of the code. These sections of our code are substantially the same as those of the code of New York, and, *indeed, of most of the States, which have adopted the reformed procedure. We might, therefore, have expected to find some uniformity in the decisions, but such is not the case. No parts of the codes have excited more discussion or difference of opinion in the courts. These provisions as to parties were manifestly modelled upon the old practice in equity, which, from the nature of its issues and especially the mode of trial, was flexible, allowing the chancellor to decide the rights of all parties whether they were before him as plaintiffs or defendants; and, therefore, while it was important to have all the parties in interest before the court, it was not considered necessary to distinguish nicely as to the nature and extent of their interest, or whether they were plaintiffs or defendants. For this reason, probably, it was soon found that there was no serious difficulty in applying the new rules of the code to proceedings which were purely equitable in their character and prayed only equitable relief. And it will be observed that the section from Pomeroy (269), cited by the plaintiffs as authority for the joinder in this case, is found under the head of parties "plaintiff in equitable actions."

But great difficulty arose in the application of the code rules taken from equity to law cases for enforcing legal rights, in which the decision is not by the chancellor, but by the jury, with less liberty of action and without the power to apportion damages among joint plaintiffs. See Bannister v. Bull, 16 S. C., 230. This difficulty was felt from the beginning, and at least three States (Ohio, Indiana, and Wisconsin) still hold that the provisions of the code as to parties were not intended to apply to law cases, involving rights purely legal, but only to continue the same practice which had prevailed before, in proceedings equitable in their nature, after the code prescribed one form of action for all alike. Pom. Rem., §§ 213 and 215. But the code does not make any such exception, and it seems that in conformity with its terms the weight of authority is in favor of applying the provisions, so far as practicable, to all actions alike, legal as well as equitable.

It does not, however, follow that the rules of the code abolish entirely the common law requirements in actions strictly legal. "It must be observed, in this connection, that in a vast number *of actions strictly legal the equitable theory of parties, as stated in these clauses, would determine the proper parties thereto, in exactly the same manner as the common law theory." Pom. Rem., § 122. This is certainly not a case under the "common or general interest" clause, in which one or more might sue for the benefit of all. Warren v. Raymond, 17 S. C., 204. It is a case in which the inquiry is, whether all the plaintiffs have such "an interest in the subject of the action and in the relief demanded" as authorize them to unite in a joint action for joint damages and to abate the alleged nuisance.

Without going into the learning upon the subject, or endeavoring to reconcile the conflicting decisions, it will be sufficient for the purposes of this case to quote the rule as laid down by Mr. Pomeroy, the greatest expounder of the codes and an enthusiastic defender of its principles and procedure. In reference to actions by persons having several rights arising from personal torts, he says: "Where a personal tort has been done to a number of individuals, but no joint injury has been suffered and no joint damages sustained in consequence thereof, the interest and right are necessarily several, and each of the injured parties must maintain a separate action for his own personal redress. It follows, therefore, that when a tort of a personal nature, an assault and battery, a false imprisonment, a libel, a slander, a malicious prosecution, and the like [nuisance, we suppose] is committed upon one or more, the right of action must, except in a very few special cases, be several. In order that a joint action may be possible, there must be some prior bond of legal union between the persons injured, such as a partnership relation, of such nature that the tort interferes with it, and by virtue of that very interference produces a wrong and consequent damage common to all. * * * The doctrine above stated has been fully recognized and asserted by the courts since the codes were enacted. A fire company, a voluntary association, having been libelled, a joint action by its members to recover damages against the libeller was held improper: not being partners, and not having any community of legal interest whereby they could suffer a common wrong, the right of action was several and each must sue alone. The same rule has been applied in the case of two or more persons, not partners. *suing jointly to recover damages for a malicious prosecution: the action cannot be maintained." Pom. Rem., § 231; Giraud v. Beach, 3 E. D. Smith [N. Y.], 337; Hinkle v. Davenport, 38 Iowa, 355; Stepanek v. Kula, 36 Id., 563; Rhoads v. Booth, 14 Id., 576.

In the last case cited, three plaintiffs sued jointly for a malicious prosecution. Wright, justice, said: "As a rule, it is only when two or more persons are entitled to, or have a joint interest in, the property affected, or to the damages to be recovered, that they can unite in an action. Therefore, several parties cannot sue jointly for injuries to the person, as for slander or battery or false imprisonment. For words spoken of parties in their joint trade, or for slander of title, they may sue jointly; but not so when two or more sue for slanderous words which, though spoken of all, apply to them all separately; or in a case of false imprisonment or a malicious prosecution, when each, as individuals, are imprisoned or prosecuted. The principle underlying is, that it is not the act, but the consequences, which are looked at. Thus, if two persons are injured by the same stroke, the act is one, but it is the consequences of that act, and not the act itself, which is redressed: and, therefore, the injury is several. There cannot be a joint action, because one does not share in the suffering of the other." The court further held that the objection might be taken at the trial.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed; that the plaintiffs may amend by striking out all the plaintiffs but one, or otherwise, if so advised.

Before Cothran, J., Edgefield, June, 1884.

This was an action by R. H. Quattlebaum against J. C. C. Black, assignee of R. H. May & Co., and others. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. B. W. Bettis, Jr., for plaintiff.

Messrs. Sheppard Bros., for O. O. Barr.

Messrs. A. S. Tompkins and Ernest Gary, for J. W. Tompkins.

December 5, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage against J. Wesley Barr under the following circumstances: On July 13, 1872, the said Barr executed a note to the plaintiff for $7,500, and to secure it executed a mortgage of five hundred acres of land, which was duly recorded. Quattlebaum removed to Orangeburg, but about March 1, 1873, he returned to Edgefield, and certain negotiations were had in reference to taking up the mortgage. Warren, Wallace & Co. of Augusta were the factors of J. W. Barr, and they were appealed to. The parties were present at Edgefield on March 1 and 3, and J. W. Carwile, the agent in Edgefield for Warren, Wallace & Co., was with them; for there is on the original mortgage, in the handwriting of Carwile, but signed by Quattlebaum, an indorsement in these words: "I acknowledge the receipt of fifty-one hundred dollars on the within mortgage. This 1st of March, 1873," and the same amount is acknowledged and entered by Quattlebaum on the margin of the copy of the mortgage on the record. That credit left due on the mortgage $2,500, and for that amount Carwile drew a draft for J. W. Barr to sign (bearing date March 3) on Warren, Wallace & Co. in favor of Quattlebaum, who on the next day, March 4, went to Augusta and received the money, and on the next day, March 5, J. W. Barr executed to Warren, Wallace & Co. a mortgage to secure that loan of the very land which had been embraced in the Quattlebaum mortgage. The formal part of this mortgage, all but the amount, was also in the handwriting of Carwile. The original note of J. W. Barr to Quattlebaum was also credited with the fifty-one hundred dollars as of March 1, 1873, but the figure 1 was evidently written over the figure 3. Across the face of the copy mortgage on the record is written in large letters "Set," as if the first syllable of the word "Settled," and the principal question in the case was, whether or not the draft of March 3 for $2,500, paid by Warren, Wallace & Co. to Quattlebaum, was the payment in full of the note and mortgage of Quattlebaum, to clear the way for that of Warren, Wallace & Co., and the former should have been at that time marked "settled."

On January 28, 1874, J. W. Barr executed and delivered to one Samuel Baker an absolute conveyance of the premises for the consideration expressed of $10,000. The said Baker, as it afterwards appeared, at the same time executed to J. W. Barr a bond to reconvey the land upon the payment of $1,500, which was really the money then due on a subsisting debt. The deed was put on record regularly, but the defeasance was not.

On April 17, 1874, J. W. Barr confessed judgment to Jennings, Smith & Co. for something over $3,000, and soon after other judgments were entered against him in favor of Robinson, R. H. May & Co., et al. In June, 1883, J. W. Barr was still living on the premises, and when Jennings, Smith & Co. endeavored to enforce their judgment, he claimed homestead in the land, but at the time the commissioners went to lay it off, he disclaimed the ownership of any real estate, saying that he had sold and conveyed the land to Samuel Baker, &c.

On August 6, 1883, the interest of J. W. Barr in the premises was sold by the sheriff under executions in his office and purchased by J. W. Tompkins, who took sheriff's title, and commenced an action for possession against J. W. Barr, when O. O. Barr, his son, had himself made a party defendant, and claimed *that he was the owner of the premises and in possession thereof under a deed from the representatives of the said Samuel Baker, who in the meantime had died; and besides, that he had an interest as assignee in the Quattlebaum mortgage to the amount of $1,593.41, money alleged to have been paid by him to Quattlebaum in part payment of a contract to purchase the mortgage. In this action there was at first a verdict for the defendant, but Judge Aldrich ordered a new trial, and upon the second trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff.

While this action of J. W. Tompkins against J. W. Barr and O. O. Barr was pending on the law side of the court, the plaintiff, Quattlebaum, a brother-in-law of J. W. Barr, instituted these proceedings on the equity side of the court to foreclose upon the premises the old mortgage of 1872, alleging that there was still due the original sum of $7,500, "less the sum of fifty-one hundred dollars paid on the 1st day of March, 1873." The complaint admitted that O. O. Barr had paid plaintiff, at two different times, some money on the mortgage, but claimed that he, the plaintiff, "is the lawful owner and holder of the said note and mortgage." The complaint also merely suggested that J. W. Tompkins and O. O. Barr (the other persons named were stricken from the record) "claimed an interest in the land," &c., and prayed judgment of foreclosure.

J. W. Barr answered, merely echoing the statements and prayer of the complaint. O. O. Barr did the same, with the addition of making claim that he was substantially assignee of the mortgage to the extent, at least, of the payments made by him to Quattlebaum; and again reiterating his claim to the premises under the deed of his father to Baker and thence to him. J. W. Tompkins answered, alleging and charging that the Quat-tlebaum mortgage had been paid in full, and should have been marked satisfied, when the record was credited with $5,100 on the first of March, and the balance of $2,500 was paid on March 3, by the draft on Warren, Wallace & Co.; and, also, that "the pretended contract of the plaintiff with O. O. Barr, as to transferring a part of the mortgage to him, was collusive and fraudulent, and the allegation was made for the purpose of defeating, delaying, and hindering the just creditors of J. W. Barr," &c.

*It appears in the "Brief" that at this sale notice was given that the Quattlebaum mortgage was unpaid.—REPORTER.

*It was referred to E. A. Glover, Esq., as special referee, to take the testimony and ascertain the priorities of the different liens against J. W. Barr. There was much testimony, including the records in the homestead proceedings and in the action of ejectment of J. W. Tompkins against J. W. Barr and O. O. Barr for this same land, which is all in the "Brief" and may be referred to as occasion requires. The cause came on to be heard by Judge Cothran, who considered that there were involved three questions: first, was the Quattlebaum mortgage paid off and satisfied by J. W. Barr? second, if not, has O. O. Barr acquired an enforceable interest in it, by reason of payments made on his father's account, to the extent of such payments? and, third, should the Baker claim set up by O. O. Barr be sustained? Upon the evidence, the judge held adversely upon the second and third questions, disallowing the claims made in them respectively. But as to the first, he held, with some hesitation, that the mortgage debt was not paid in full on March 3, 1873, when J. W. Barr's draft on Warren, Wallace & Co. was given for what was represented to be, and really appeared to be, the balance in full of the mortgage debt. This was held, as the judge says, "against his earlier and strong impressions," upon the force of the testimony of the plaintiff himself and of J. W. Barr, to the effect that the draft for $2,500 upon Warren, Wallace & Co., of date March 3, had been in fact, by anticipation, included in the receipt for $5,100 two days before, on March 1, entered on the mortgage, and also on the margin of the record in the register's office, and also on the note.

The Judge says: "The evidence to show payment, both circumstantial and recorded, is very strong, but I cannot say that it is sufficient to prevail against the most direct and positive assertions of parties whose character for veracity has not been questioned, and who, of all others, being the payee and payer of the debt in question, must have best known the fact. But suppose they are not mistaken, and that only $5,100 was paid—it is insisted that such conclusion must, upon obvious principles well recognized in the administration of justice, be excluded. * * * It may be that in his eagerness to get the $2,500, Quattlebaum was willing to say, and Barr to assent to it, that $5,100 had been paid, and *that he would trust his debtor, a brother-in-law, to make it all right, and this not having been done as yet, consists with their assertions that only $5,100 was paid in all by J. W. Barr on the mortgage, and this would reconcile much conflicting testimony in the case. The real question thus presented is, does this amount to an estoppel? for it is familiar law, and goes without the citation of authorities, that parol evidence is admissible to explain the terms of a receipt in writing, and there is nothing more than that. And although iterated and reiterated, it remains but a receipt still, &c. Technically speaking (for all law is technical, and that of estoppel is especially so), I am forced to contend [conclude] that this is not a case for the application of the doctrine. It is very nearly such, but one of the essential qualities to make out an estoppel is fatally wanting, and that is privity between the defendant, Tompkins, and Warren, Wallace & Co., whose agent was imposed upon by Quattlebaum and J. W. Barr in the transaction at Edgefield on March 3, 1873." &c. From this decree both parties appealed.

Exceptions of J. W. Tompkins.—I. "Because the Circuit Judge erred in concluding that the acknowledgment of a credit of $5,100 was entered on the margin of the registered mortgage by Quattlebaum on the 3d day March, 1873, and in concluding that said entry was made at the time of the entry on the original mortgage in the handwriting of Carwile.

II. "Because his honor erred in holding that it was competent for the plaintiff, Quattlebaum, to deny and falsify his acknowledgment of the receipt of $5,100, the same having been acknowledged by him four times in writing, and at three different times, viz.: 1st. On the margin of the record in the register's office. 2d. On the note and mortgage: and, 3d. In the allegation of his complaint, after the same had been proved by all the answers admitting the same, thereby falsifying the records of the court, viz., the record in the register's office and his own complaint.

III. "Because his honor erred in concluding and decreeing that the plaintiff, Quattlebaum, is entitled to have payment for any sum on said mortgage debt.

IV. "Because his honor erred in not holding that said mortgage and debt had been paid in full, and ordering the same marked settled and cancelled.

V. "Because his honor erred in not directing the overplus arising from the sale of the land in question, after satisfying the mortgage debt of Quattlebaum, should be paid directly to the defendant, J. W. Tompkins, he having title to said premises, and being the assignee of the judgments against J. W. Barr."

Exceptions of O. O. Barr.—I. "Because his honor erred in deciding that the payments made by O. O. Barr to R. H. Quattlebaum of $348.09 and $1,245.32, made on October 27, 1879, and December 27, 1870, respectively, were made with the funds of J. W. Barr.

II. "Because his honor erred in refusing to allow the said O. O. Barr judgment for the amounts paid Quattlebaum as aforesaid, in the foreclosure of the mortgage set forth in the complaint herein.

III. "Because his honor erred in deciding that the money paid by O. O. Barr to Samuel Baker and to his administrator and heirs at law, was derived from the property of J. W. Barr.

IV. "Because his honor erred in deciding that if the said payments made on the Baker claim were made with the money of O. O. Barr, that the said payments were a contrivance on his part to defeat the creditors of his father, J. W. Barr.

V. "Because his honor erred in refusing to allow O. O. Barr judgment for the amounts of the said payments made by O. O. Barr on said Baker claim.

VI. "Because his honor erred in deciding that the circumstances enumerated in said decree tended 'but too plainly to show on the part of the Barrs repeated and most desperate efforts to defraud, delay, and defeat the just claims of creditors.'

VII. "Because his honor erred in deciding that the claims set up by O. O. Barr were fraudulent as to creditors of J. W. Barr, when no such issue was presented in the pleadings or properly before the court."

The claim of O. O. Barr, known as the "Baker claim," originated in the deed of J. W. Barr to Samuel Baker, bearing date January 28, 1874, and really we cannot see how it can be properly adjudicated in this case. This is an action for the simple *and single purpose of foreclosing the Quattlebaum mortgage, in which the plaintiff impleaded not only the mortgagor, J. W. Barr, but also O. O. Barr and J. W. Tompkins, on the vague ground that they "claim an interest in the land." The interest claimed by Tompkins is as purchaser of the land under junior judgments against the mortgagor, J. W. Barr, and he antagonized the foreclosure of the Quattlebaum mortgage. But O. O. Barr set up no interest adverse to that of the plaintiff, Quattlebaum; but, on the contrary, he joined in the prayer for foreclosure. The interest which he claimed in the land made an issue only with his co-defendant, Tompkins. By the rules of pleadings a defendant is required to answer the allegations of the complaint, but not those of the answer of a co-defendant, of which he may be ignorant.

It is true that the Court of Equity may decree between co-defendants; but the limit to the power is laid down by Lord Redesdale in the case of Chalmey v. Lord Dunsany (2 Sch. & Lef., 710), and approved by our own court in Motte v. Schult (1 Hill Eq. 146 [26 Am. Dec. 194]), where it is said that "the Court of Equity may decree between co-defendants, but it must be on evidence arising from pleadings and proofs between plaintiffs and defendants." Now, in this case, if we regard O. O. Barr, the assignee of the Baker claim, as substantially a junior mortgagee, and as such a proper party to the action, it was not alleged in the complaint that he was such mortgagee, and therefore Tompkins had no opportunity to contest that claim. If there had been a distinct allegation in the complaint to that effect, the defendant, Tompkins, would have had an opportunity to contest. As stated, there was only a vague allegation in the complaint, which was not notice to Tompkins. The claim as mortgagee first appeared in the answer of O. O. Barr, and therefore it seems to us that the question of the validity of Barr's claim as mortgagee was not properly in issue before the court, and should not have been considered or adjudged.

Then the question in the case is, whether the mortgage was satisfied on March 3, 1873, and should have been so marked. We agree with the Circuit Judge that "the evidence tending to show payment, both circumstantial and recorded, is very strong." *It is certain that if the facts were as represented, the whole mortgage debt was paid on that day, for there was on the margin of the recorded mortgage an acknowledgment of the mortgagee that $5,100 had been paid two days before, on March 1, and on that day, March 3, a draft was drawn and delivered for what appeared to be the exact balance, $2,500. It would seem that the official certificate of satisfaction might have been then and there entered, as indeed was contemplated, as shown by the entry across the record of the large letters "Set," which was probably the first syllable of the word "Settled," left incomplete for the moment, it may be, for the reason that the draft then given was not actually paid.

There are many circumstances which support this view, and among them the acts of the parties themselves. Up to this transaction in the register's office, the mortgagee, Quattlebaum, had not shown himself remiss in seeking payment of his debt; but from that time (1873) he seems to have made no effort to enforce his mortgage for any balance which might be due, until Tompkins sued his mortgagor for the land in 1883, a period of ten years, although during that time his mortgagor had not only mortgaged the same land to Warren, Wallace & Co., but had sold and conveyed it by an absolute deed to Samuel Baker, and, becoming deeply involved, had been sold out by the sheriff. If there was a balance still due, as alleged, on his debt, it is difficult to understand why Quattlebaum should have remained inactive even after his mortgagor had sold and conveyed the land covered by his mortgage. But both the creditor, Quattlebaum, and the debtor, Barr, testified positively before the referee that the representations made by the parties, and placed on the record on March 1, 1873, were not true; that the amount of money which had been actually paid was not $5,100, but $2,600, the difference being made up by including in anticipation the amount of the draft on Warren, Wallace & Co., not given until two days after, on March 3.

It is always desirable, if it can be done, to take such view as consists with the testimony of witnesses, whose character for truthfulness has not been impeached. Assuming, then, that the statement now made, although in conflict with the facts as represented in 1873, is true, the question is whether they are estopped from falsifying their own representations as then committed to writing and placed on the record. We suppose, if Warren, Wallace & Co. were before the court enforcing their mortgage, there could not be the least doubt that the parties would not be heard to contradict the acknowledgment on the registry of $5,100 on March 1, for the very good reason that it was upon the faith of that representation that W. W. & Co. acted in advancing $2,500 to satisfy the balance of the debt, and in taking a mortgage of this same land to secure it. Carwile testified that "this draft ($2,500) was given for the purpose of getting money to settle the mortgage that Quattlebaum had against Barr. I think that this money is no part of the first credit of $5,100, the acknowledgment of which I have said was in my handwriting. I am satisfied that it is no part of it. I was at the time the authorized agent of Warren, Wallace & Co.; I never had any instructions from them to take mortgages on any encumbered property, but to take unencumbered property. As their agent I would not have negotiated a loan from them to J. W. Barr, if I had thought the property was encumbered." Mr. John W. Wallace, connected with the firm of Warren, Wallace & Co., testified that "the $2,500 was to relieve the property from the mortgage of Quattlebaum, which would free the premises from all liens. And to our knowledge this Quattlebaum mortgage was the only encumbrance on the place. If there had been any other, we certainly would not have advanced the money. The funds advanced by the firm of Warren, Wallace & Co. to Barr, was for no other purpose than to satisfy the Quattlebaum mortgage," &c. So that it is perfectly clear that Warren, Wallace & Co. were imposed upon to their injury by the representations of March 1, 1873, in writing and on record.

It is, however, urged that J. W. Tompkins is not in privity with Warren, Wallace & Co., and therefore is not entitled to the estoppel which clearly exists as to them; that as Tompkins does not hold under Warren, Wallace & Co., the aforesaid misrepresentations in their effect do not reach to Tompkins, but as to him they were nothing more than an ordinary receipt between creditor and debtor, which, under the law, may be explained or even *contradicted. This point is certainly not free from difficulty. It is undoubtedly true, that generally a mere receipt for money is not conclusive between the parties; but it seems to us, that in this respect, there may be a difference between a simple receipt for money on a note, and a receipt on a mortgage deed of land, especially when the acknowledgment is entered on the registry of the deed, thereby giving notice of the fact to the world, and partaking somewhat of the nature of satisfaction of the lien. There is such a thing as privity in estate. True, Tompkins does not hold under Warren, Wallace & Co., but he does hold the land, in reference to which (or to a lien on it) the misrepresentation was made. Whatever touches the existence of a lien on land, must affect the interest of a purchaser of that land. Suppose, instead of $5,100, the acknowledgment had been of the whole debt and interest; whether true or false, it would have been the duty of the register to enter satisfaction on the mortgage, which would have cancelled the lien as to all the world. If so, does it not follow that the acknowledgment on the record of the receipt of $5,100 was, in effect, satisfaction of the mortgage to that extent?

As was said in Wood v. Seely, 32 N. Y., 105: "Estoppels by record or by deed, as is well known, run in favor of and against the privies in estate of the immediate parties to the estoppel, as well as for and against the parties personally; and I see no reason why estoppels in pais should not be within the rule, as they clearly are within its principle. Cases of dedication often rest upon the principle of estoppel in pais, it being considered fraudulent on the part of one dedicating his land to public uses, to retract to the prejudice of parties who have purchased on the faith of such dedication. It has frequently been held that the estoppel attaches itself to the land and can be asserted on behalf of the grantee of the immediate purchaser," &c. Big. Estop., 449. The acknowledgment on the registry was a continuing representation to all concerned, and must be considered as made, not only to Warren, Wallace & Co., but to any one who might purchase the land. Ignorance of the true state of facts, still wrapped up in the breast of the parties, placed Tompkins in a position somewhat analogous to that of a purchaser for valuable *consideration without notice. It will be found, upon a careful examination of the authorities, that wherever the rights of other parties have intervened by reason of a man's conduct, he will then not be permitted to disturb the state of things, whatever may have been his rights at first. See Big. Estop., 508, and notes.

But if we are mistaken in this, and the acknowledgment on the record should be regarded merely as a "receipt in parol" for so much money on the note, we do not think it necessarily follows that the parties now must be heard to contradict it. The rule that a receipt is not conclusive between the parties is not without exceptions. From the peculiar nature of the transactions, it has been held not to apply to warehouse receipts and for premiums upon a policy of marine insurance, and some others. Mr. Bigelow states the doctrine as follows: "The general rule that an acknowledgment of receipt in a sealed instrument may be controverted, is, we apprehend, only a rule of interpretation, and not an arbitrary doctrine of the law, even in cases where there are no extraneous circumstances to make the admission binding. There is no reason why the parties should not be able to agree that there shall be no disputing the admission; and if the parties should, by apt terms in the instrument, promise not to question the receipt, the courts could not fail to consider the acknowledgment as binding." Bigelow, p. 284, and notes.

Now, we think there are "extraneous circumstances in this case to make the admission binding." The single fact that the receipt was not only entered on the note and the mortgage, but acknowledged on the registry, shows that it was intended to be something more than a simple receipt for so much money, which appeared abundantly by the indorsements on the note and mortgage. It is not usual to enter receipts in part payment of a note upon the record of the mortgage given to secure it. Ordinarily the record is not touched unless to make some entry looking towards satisfaction. The note is for the debt, and the mortgage is a lien upon property to secure it. It appears that the entry on the record was made at the instance of Mr. Carwile, who was there for the very purpose of clearing the office of all liens, in order to make way for the mortgage to be given to

*Warren, Wallace & Co.: and it would seem that the object of the parties in making the entry on the record was to clinch the matter and make it an absolute verity, beyond all possible doubt or future cavil. Whatever may have been the understanding or the rights of the parties as between themselves, this was their solemn declaration made on the public registry, and it seems to us that they thereby estopped themselves from now retracting it; and that to allow them to withdraw or qualify it now, after the land mortgaged has been transferred to another, would operate as a fraud upon rights which have been acquired upon the faith of it.

This view of the main question makes it unnecessary to consider whether the defendant, O. O. Barr, had an enforceable interest in the mortgage.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court as to the claim of O. O. Barr be set aside without prejudice; and that the judgment as to the mortgage of Quattlebaum be reversed, and the complaint dismissed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, April, 1885.

[For subsequent opinion, see Charlotte, Columbia & A. R. Co. v. Gibbes, 27 S. C. 385, 4 S. E. 49.]

The opinion fully states the case. Upon the points considered by the court, the arguments were as follows:

Mr. C. R. Miles, attorney general, for appellant.

The amount paid by the plaintiff corporation to the county treasurer, and which this action is brought to recover, was a liability to the State, imposed by an amendment of its charter, as a condition upon which it shall exercise its corporate franchise of operating a railroad within the State, accepted by it; and was therefore not illegally or wrongfully collected; and the plaintiff cannot maintain an action to recover it. Gen. Stat., §§ 1416, 1453; 18 Stat., 810. The Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company was established in 188 , and chartered under the provision of the general law, "to enable the purchasers of railroads to form corporations, and to exercise corporate powers, and to define their rights, powers, and privileges," approved March 24, 1876 (16 Stat., 160), and is therefore expressly subject to the liabilities and provisions contained in the "general railroad law" *of the State, which, if inconsistent with its said charter, are to be taken as in alteration and amendment thereof. As to the inherent power of the State to subject corporations chartered by it to such new regulations as may, from time to time, be considered necessary for protection and safety of the public, without thereby violating the contract created by the charter, see Cooley Cons. Lim., 576.

The constitution of 1868, art. XII, sec. 1, declares that "corporations may be formed under general laws; but all such laws may from time to time be altered or repealed." Section 5 of the same article declares that "the legislature shall regulate the public use of all franchises, and limit all tolls, imposts, and other charges and demands under such laws." The provisions of the act of December 17, 1841, are incorporated in section 1361 of General Statutes, which declares that "it shall be deemed a part of the charter of every corporation created under the provisions of any general law, and of every charter granted, renewed, or amended by act or joint resolution of the general assembly (unless such act or joint resolution shall in express terms declare the contrary), that such charter and every amendment thereof shall always remain subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by the general assembly." This section was construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hoge v. Railroad Co., 99 U. S., 348.

The legislature having created railroad commissioners, and made it their duty to exercise a "general supervision of all railroads in the State operated by steam, and to examine the same, and keep themselves informed as to their condition and the manner in which they are operated with reference to the security and accommodation of the public and the compliance of the several corporations with the provisions of their charters and the laws of the State;" and having declared that all the provisions of the general law on this subject shall apply to all railroads, and to the corporations or others owning or operating the same (Gen. Stat., § 1455), has required that the entire expenses of the said railroad commissioners in performing these duties, shall be borne by the several corporations owning or operating railroads within the State; and has made these several provisions a part of the charter of every corporation operating a railroad within the State over which it possesses the power of control.

Now, do not these several provisions of the general railroad law, made part of the charters of the plaintiff railroad corporation, "prescribe the way in which it shall exercise its corporate powers"? Do they not "require the compliance with these provisions as a condition upon which the corporation shall exercise the privileges granted it;" and having been accepted by the corporation, may they not be "exactcd, not because the legislature had a right to impose them, but because the corporation has agreed, as one of the conditions of its being, to assume them as matter of contract and for value"? Is the plaintiff entitled to recover back, as illegally and wrongfully collected from it, the amount which it has paid in discharge of its liability to the State imposed by these provisions of law, which it has accepted by acting under its charter? A constitutional provision designed solely for the protection of the property rights of a citizen may be reviewed. Cooley Cons. Lim., 185. Sedg. Stat. and Con. Law, 111.

Mr. J. C. Haskell, contra.

Is section 1453 an amendment of the charter of the railroad company? The answer to this claim is, I think, readily found by an examination of section 1361, General Statutes of South Carolina, which provides that "all charters and amendments, or renewals thereof, shall always remain subject to amendment or repeal or alteration by the general assembly." Now, if this gives the power to exact additional taxes to those which others bear, it means that the legislature has reserved to itself the right to confiscate; for if it can exact one extra dollar, it can exact all, and take the entire property of a corporation without compensation or process of law, in direct violation of article I., section 23, of the constitution of South Carolina. If it can amend or repeal as it will, it can act judicially and declare forfeited a charter, and so, by violating section 26, article I., of the constitution, it destroys or takes at will private property and that of corporations without process of law or that adequate compensation imperatively required by the constitution. It may be answered that corporations take their charters in full view of the reserved power of the legislature; but the legislature cannot reserve a power which it never possessed, nor even by the consent of a party assume a power prohibited by the constitution.

None will question that the forfeiture of a charter is a judicial act, or that the legislature is forbidden by the constitution to act judicially. No one will contend as an abstract proposition that the legislature can by act take private property or that of a corporation; and no one will deny that uncontrolled extra taxation is pro tanto confiscation. The fact that the amount is small does not effect the principle one particle, for there is no limit once the right is established, save the uncontrolled and fickle whims of each new legislature, and what to-day is comparatively a trifle may to-morrow be an overwhelming burden, breaking down and destroying both the rights of the owners and the security of creditors, who extended the credit in full view of ordinary taxes, but with no thought or possible foresight of extraordinary taxes, which, if unpaid, will take the whole of the property which is their security. They can, it may be said, protect themselves by paying the taxes. So they can, and must, as to ordinary taxes; but once let them become liable for extraordinary taxes, and their liability is practically unlimited, and the securities on which they have relied may at any time become worthless by reason of those arbitrary burdens which no prudence could foresee and against which they have the right to expect full protection from the law.

The question then may arise, What can the legislature do under section 1361? And the answer is, it can act as it will in all special rights conferred by the charter where such action does not conflict with the constitution, and no consent of the corporation can extend or amplify its powers as to points covered by the constitution. The acceptance of the charter subject to section 1361 only estops the corporation from claiming that the special and extraordinary corporate rights granted by the charter are matters of contract and not special grants which are subject to modification by the very terms of the act granting them. But section 1361 cannot, nor can any other legislative act, take from a corporation the right to the protection of the constitution; and whenever an act of the legislature infringes upon constitutional rights, whether of an artificial or of a natural person, such act is pro tanto absolutely null and void. When a corporation is created, the act, says Kent, clothes bodies of men with the qualities and capacities of one single being. "The object of incorporation is to bestow the character and properties of individuality upon a collective and constantly changing body of men." Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet., 561.

Once let a corporation be formed and it at once by the mere act of its creation acquires the rights and powers of natural persons, except as limited by the act of its creation. The act which creates a corporation prescribes usually the way in which it shall exercise its corporate powers, but at the same time it invests it ipso facto with personal rights and obligations. The first the legislature can under section 1361 amend; the second it can only alter in such matters as are not controlled by the constitution; and any act which in its direct effect impairs a constitutional right or immunity is as unwarranted as one which directly takes it away. In the exercise of its corporate powers, a corporation acts under a special grant. In its rights, obligations, and immunities as an artificial person, it acts and exists under the general law of the land. The first, being special powers, can be affected by special act; the last only by an act of equal force with the constitution itself.

Section 1453 is no amendment of the charter—it does not claim to be so—and imposes no additional duties on it for the protection of the public; it simply takes from it so much of its property, without process of law, and in violation of the constitution. The power given to the legislature by article XII., section 5, of the Constitution, and reserved by section 1361, General Statutes, refers only to the special corporate powers of the company, and is no sanction of any act touching those rights which are protected by the constitution.

December 5, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The Columbia & Greenville Railroad Company, in paying their taxes to the defendant as treasurer of Richland County for the year 1884, paid, among others, an *item of $1,061.40, being the proportion of the expenses of the railroad commission of the State, assessed upon the said corporation by the comptroller general, and charged up against said corporation as directed by the appropriation act, approved December 24, 1884, which provides that, "For the salaries of the railroad commissioners, six thousand three hundred dollars; for the clerk of the railroad commissioners, twelve hundred dollars; for rent of office, if so much be necessary, four hundred dollars; and three hundred and fifty dollars to pay the contingent expenses of the office for the year 1885, if so much be necessary; to be advanced by the State, until the same shall have been collected from the railroad companies of the State, in the manner prescribed by law, and when collected the same shall be replaced in the State treasury." &c.

The item aforesaid was paid under protest, and this action was brought under the "act to facilitate the collection of taxes" (incorporated in the General Statutes as section 268), to recover back the sum so paid, on the ground "that the act, by virtue of which it was claimed and collected, is unconstitutional, null, and void, and said collection was wrongful and illegal." The defendant, Gibbes, as treasurer, answered, denying that the law under which the said item was assessed against and collected from the said corporation, is unconstitutional and void, or that the same was illegally and wrongfully collected.

The cause came on for trial before Judge Witherspoon, and the defendant made requests to charge as follows:

I. "That the presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of the acts of the legislature of the State, and the burden is upon the plaintiff to show beyond a reasonable doubt that they are unconstitutional.

II. "That the amount collected from the plaintiff, a corporation operating a railroad within this State, as its just proportion of the expenses of the railroad commission, having been apportioned upon its gross income proportioned to the number of miles in this State, if regarded as a tax, is not a tax upon property, but upon 'an occupation' or business, and being regulated according to the amount of business done as ascertained by its gross income, and being uniform and equal in its operation *upon all of that class without discrimination, was lawfully assessed and collected.

III. "That the amount collected from the plaintiff, a corporation operating a railroad within this State, being its proportion of the expenses necessarily incurred in the enforcement of the laws enacted by the State for the inspecting and regulating of the business carried on by the plaintiff for the safety and protection of the public and of the individual citizens of the State, was lawfully assessed and collected, under the police power of the State.

IV. "That the provisions of the general railroad law of the State, under and by virtue of which the amount was collected from the plaintiff, are part of the charter of said company, and the plaintiff cannot maintain this action to recover back the amount paid by it.

V. "That he should instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant."

The judge reports that "after hearing counsel for the plaintiff and attorney general for the defendant, I must conclude that the assessment made and the amount collected from plaintiff under section 1453 of the General Statutes is the imposition of an extra or additional tax, illegal and unjust, and in violation of the provisions of the constitution, above cited (sections 23 and 36, of article I., and also section 1, article IX.). This assessment is referred to as a tax, and the same means are provided for enforcing and collecting it as provided for collecting other taxes for the State." &c. Under this charge of the judge there was a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the ground of error in the charge.

The action was brought under section 268 of the General Statutes, to recover back "a tax wrongfully collected under protest," and cannot be sustained, unless it appears that the exaction complained of was unconstitutional. The appropriation was made in accordance with the act of 1879, "to create a railroad commissioner for the State of South Carolina and to define his duties" (16 Statutes, 789, and now section 1453 of the General Statutes), which, among other things, provides that "the entire expenses of the railroad commissioner, including all salaries *and expenses of every kind, shall be borne by the several corporations owning or operating railroads within this State, according to their gross income proportioned to the number of miles in this State, to be apportioned by the comptroller general of the State, who, on or before the first day of October in each and every year, shall assess upon each of said corporations its just proportion of such expenses, in proportion to its said gross income for the current year ending on the thirteenth day of June next preceding that on which the said assessment is made; and the said assessment shall be charged up against the said corporations respectively, under the order and direction of the comptroller, and shall be collected by the several county treasurers, in the manner provided by law for the collection of taxes from such corporations, and shall be paid by the said treasurers as collected into the treasury of the State, in like manner as other taxes collected by them for the State," &c.

The assessment was made by the appropriation act in accordance with this law. It is manifest that the provision requiring the State to advance the expenses and to be reimbursed by the railroad companies, was merely an arrangement of convenience, being substantially a requirement that the railroad companies of the State should pay the expenses of the railroad commission. The single question, therefore, is whether the aforesaid act of 1879, under and by authority of which the appropriation was made, is binding on the plaintiff corporation, or is wholly null and void as being unconstitutional. As we have several times had occasion to repeat: "It is an axiom in American jurisprudence that a statute is not to be pronounced void on this ground, unless the repugnancy to the constitution be clear and the conclusion that it exists inevitable. Every doubt is to be resolved in favor of the enactment. The particular clause of the constitution must be specified and the act admit of no reasonable construction in harmony with its meaning. The judicial function involving such result is one of delicacy and to be exercised always with caution. Township v. Talcott, 10 Wall., 673 [22 L. Ed. 227]."^{*} Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell & Co., 15 S. C., 533 [40 Am. Rep. 705].

The argument at the bar was able and took a wide range, embracing the questions whether the exaction complained of, was *merely an assessment imposing the expenses upon a railroad company for its own supervision and regulation, as it is sometimes required to bear the expenses of erecting and maintaining fences, enclosing their own right of way, and other like safeguards; or whether it was a technical tax for revenue, and if the latter, whether it was a tax on "an occupation" or a tax on property, and as such in conflict with section 1 of article IX. of the Constitution, requiring all taxes on property to be uniform; and also in conflict with sections 23 and 36 of the Bill of Rights, which require all property taxed to be taxed in proportion to its value, and denounce the taking of private property for public uses without the consent of the owner or a just compensation being made therefor. But it will be observed, that all these questions rest upon the view of prior vested rights as in an individual, and that they cannot arise in reference to a corporation, unless such rights have been already secured to it, by the law giving it existence. It seems to us, therefore, that there is a question lying further back as to whether the plaintiff corporation had any vested right, of which the exaction complained of was an infringement.

All corporations are artificial bodies, merely creatures of the State; and as the State may or may not call them into existence, so she may limit their existence and mould and form them in precise accordance with her view of what is right or politic. A corporation, therefore, is purely statutory. It has no physical existence, and its legal entity being invisible, its powers, duties, obligations, and immunities must be looked for alone in the laws which create it. In most essential matters, the terms upon which the franchise is granted appear in the charter and constitute a contract between the State and the corporations, which is under the protection of the provision in the Constitution forbidding the passage of a law impairing the obligation of contracts. But inasmuch as the State, one of the contracting parties, has the power of legislation and is charged with exercising that power for the welfare of her citizens, a very nice question often arises as to how far and in what particulars, she may amend a charter which she had previously granted. Without, however, going into that matter now, we merely say that, although the

State has the general power of legislation, she may grant a franchise in such manner as to confer vested rights and to exclude herself from afterwards abridging them by legislation. But for reasons most obvious, such grant, to have the effect of excluding legislation by the State, must be clear, explicit, and unconditional. If the State, in creating a corporation, expressly reserves to herself the right in future to amend the charter generally or in any particular indicated, and such charter is accepted, that corporation may not afterwards object to the exercise of that reserved power, subject to which the charter was accepted, thereby making it a part of the fundamental contract. See Big. Estop., 515, and authorities.

What, then, was the contract of the State as contained in the charter of the plaintiff corporation? In order to determine this, it will be necessary to ascertain the terms of the charter, interpreted in the light of the time and circumstances under which it was granted. The pleadings in the case are short, merely making the constitutional question, without undertaking to set out with particularity the date or terms of the plaintiff's charter. It is not stated in the complaint that the plaintiff, "The Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company," is a corporation under the laws of the State, but the answer admitted that the plaintiff was such corporation, without, however, stating when and where it became such. There is on the statute book no act expressly chartering such company, and it must therefore have become a corporation under the general law of 1876, to which more particular reference will be hereafter made. The proceedings by which the plaintiff secured its charter are not set out in the case, but it was stated at the bar, and as we understand conceded, that they took place in the year 1880; but whether it was so conceded or not, it was not made to appear that it was at an earlier day, and, as we conceive, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that it had corporate existence at the time of the passage of the act, which it claims to be unconstitutional.

The old "Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company" was chartered as far back as 1849, and, as the charter shows, was originally exempt from the provisions of section 41 of the act of 1841 (now section 1361 of the General Statutes), which declares that "every charter of incorporation granted, renewed, or modified, shall at all times remain subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by the legislature." But the old company afterwards (1869) consented, for a consideration, that their charter should be so amended as to make its property subject to taxation in conformity to section 2, article 12, of the Constitution of 1868, which declares that "the property of corporations now existing or hereafter created shall be subject to taxation except in cases otherwise provided for in this constitution." While its franchises and immunities were in this state and condition, the old company became involved, and the road was sold under orders of the court. At that sale it was purchased by certain persons, who formed a new company in the name of the "Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company," under the "act to enable purchasers of railroads to form corporations and to exercise corporate powers, and to define their rights, powers, and privileges," approved March 24, 1876 (16 Stat., 160, and now part of the general railroad law as sections 1420, 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the General Statutes).

That act provides "that in case of the sale of any railroad * * * by virtue of any mortgage or deed of trust, whether under foreclosure or other judicial proceedings, * * * the purchaser or purchasers thereof, or his or their survivors, representatives, or assigns, may, together with their associates (if any), form a corporation for the purpose of owning, possessing, maintaining, and operating such railroad * * * by filing in the office of the secretary of State of this State, &c. Such corporation shall possess all the powers, rights, immunities, privileges, and franchises in respect to such railroad, or the part thereof included in such certificate, and in respect to the real and personal property appertaining to the same, which were possessed or enjoyed by the corporation which owned or held such railroad previous to such sale under and by virtue of its charter and any amendments thereto, and of other laws of this State." &c. The charter granted to the new company under the provisions of this act could confer no other franchises and immunities than those which were possessed at the time of the sale by the old Greenville & Columbia Railroad Company, and contained no negation whatever of the power of the State to legislate upon the subject; and therefore it is clear, indeed it seemed to be assumed in the *argument, that the charter of the new company was taken subject to the law now embraced in section 1361 of the General Statutes, making it "at all times subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal, by the legislature."

But it is strongly urged upon us that the exaction complained of, being an assessment in the appropriation act of successive years for so much money, to pay the expenses of the railroad commission, cannot, in any proper sense, be termed an amendment, or successive amendments, of the charter of the plaintiff corporation; but, on the contrary, is an extra tax annually imposed, and as such, is in conflict with the provisions of the constitution before referred to. From the view which the court takes it will not be necessary to determine the precise character of the exaction assailed. The appropriation act which required its payment made no independent original levy, but was merely an assessment to carry out in execution the actual provisions of the general law of 1879, now section 1453 of the General Statutes, which required all the railroad companies of the State to pay the expenses of the railroad commission. Where objection is made to the specific appropriation of the year 1884, the question is thrown back upon the general act of 1879. If that act is binding upon the plaintiff corporation, it cannot object to the clause in the appropriation act of 1884, which was a mere specification under the general authority previously given. It may be that the general law of 1879 cannot be considered as an amendment of the charter of plaintiffs, for the very conclusive reason that it was in existence at the time the charter was granted; but, as it seems to us, it was more than an amendment—it was a part of the charter itself, or at least one of the conditions upon which the charter was granted and accepted.

The plaintiff corporation is undoubtedly bound by all the provisions of the act under which it was created, one of which was that it should have only the rights, franchises, and immunities which were possessed by the old Greenville & Columbia Railroad Company at the time of the sale "under and by virtue of its charter, or any amendments thereto, and of other laws of this State." As we understand it, this was an express contract that the charter was accepted subject to all the laws then of force *applicable to railroads. On November 22, 1880, when the secretary of State certified that the purchasers of the Greenville Railroad had formed a new corporation under the laws of the State, there was on the statute book of the State a general law, part of what is called the general railroad law of the State, declaring that every railroad company of the State should contribute its just proportion towards the payment of the expenses of the railroad commission then in existence. Under these circumstances, the charter to the plaintiff corporation was granted by the State, without any reference whatever to the aforesaid liability declared by law; and as the intention of parties must concur to constitute a contract, we are not at liberty to assume that the State intended to grant, or did grant, to the plaintiff any vested rights inconsistent with her own law then on the statute book. The purchasers who became corporators had notice of that law. They accepted the charter in full view of a public act of which all are bound to take notice, and it thereby became a condition of the charter—in a certain sense, a part of the contract—and they cannot afterwards be heard to object to the enforcement of that law. "In general, one who accepts the terms of a contract must accept the same in toto; he cannot accept part and disclaim the rest." Big. Estop. 514.

But it is said that the exaction is in itself unconstitutional, and, being such, the legislature could not assume a power prohibited by the constitution even with the consent of the parties concerned. We have endeavored to show that whether an exaction by the State upon a corporation is or is not constitutional must depend upon the character of the rights with which the State has endowed the corporation. If it has been invested with no rights of which the exaction would be an infringement, we do not clearly see how it could be called unconstitutional, any more than the provision in most railroad charters that the company shall at its own expense erect fences, cattle-guards, &c.

If the State were now to create a railroad corporation and insert in the charter in totidem verbis, the provision requiring that it should pay its just proportion of the expenses of the railroad commission, and the corporators should accept that charter and put the road into operation, we suppose there can be no doubt that they would be bound by all the provisions of the contract, and would not be heard to say that the one in reference to the payment of the expenses of the railroad commissioners was unconstitutional and void. In Hand v. Savannah and Charleston R. R. Co. (12 S. C. 314), the court held that a certain act of the legislature purporting to postpone a particular class of bonds was unconstitutional; but at the same time it was held that those who had by their conduct assented to the act were estopped from denying its validity as to them. In the judgment of the court the doctrine is announced in the following terms: "It is too clear for argument or the citation of authorities that one taking a provision made for himself by a statute must take upon the conditions upon which it is offered. The principle equally applies to express conditions, and such as may be fairly implied from the terms of the statute," &c.

No case upon the precise point under consideration has been brought to our attention; that of Atcheson, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. Co. v. Howe, as treasurer of the State of Kansas (32 Kans., 737 [5 Pac. 397]) is in no way inconsistent with the principles herein announced. The State of Kansas passed an act concerning railroads and other common carriers, and charged the expenses of the commission established, not upon all common carriers which were to be regulated by the act, but only on railroad companies, and therefore it was held that as a tax the exaction was unconstitutional, as not being uniform. In delivering the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice Hurd said: "It is evident that the legislature regarded this tax as a property tax, and not as a license or an inspection tax, because the tax is not assessed upon all the companies, corporations, and persons subject to be regulated by the provisions of the statute," &c.

It seems that the States which have created railroad commissions to inspect and regulate railroads differ as to the manner of providing for the payment of the expenses. Tennessee, Wisconsin, Ohio, Rhode Island, Michigan, Minnesota, Illinois, Missouri, and California each defrays the expenses of its commission directly out of the public treasury; while in New Hampshire, Maine, Vermont, Alabama, and perhaps other States, different methods are adopted to apportion the expenses among the railroads regulated.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the complaint dismissed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I dissent, but owing to the pressure of other official duties, I cannot now undertake to give the reasons why I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court.

A petition was filed by defendant asking for a rehearing, upon which the following order was passed December 16, 1885:

PER CURIAM. We have carefully read this petition for a rehearing. All the points made were considered before the opinion was filed, in which it was stated as follows: "The proceedings by which the plaintiff secured its charter are not set out in the case, but it was stated at the bar, and as we understand conceded, that they took place in the year 1880; but whether it was so conceded or not, it was not made to appear that it was at an earlier day, and, as we conceive, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that it had corporate existence at the time of the passage of the act which it claims to be unconstitutional," &c. In the view which the court took it was wholly immaterial whether such concession was made or not, for it was incumbent on the plaintiff corporation to show that its charter antedated the "act to create a railroad commissioner for the State of South Carolina and to define his duties," &c. Until that appeared, no case was made sufficient to raise the general question of the unconstitutionality of that act.

The question was necessarily limited to the corporation making it. This court cannot, even by the consent of parties, authoritatively determine general propositions. As was said in one of our cases: "The court does not sit for the purpose of determining mere abstract questions of law, but to determine whether the law, as applicable to a particular case, has been correctly stated," &c. The single question made in the pleadings was whether the *exaction upon the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company was wrongfully and illegally collected because the act by virtue of which it was collected was unconstitutional and void. That was the only "point fairly arising upon the record of the case," and it was considered and decided. No important fact or principle having been overlooked, there is no ground for a rehearing. The petition is dismissed.

OWENS v. WATTS.

(April Term, 1885.)

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇨100.]

Where a ward after his majority, by his attorney in fact, makes a settlement with his guardian and receives and receipts for a sum of money and a claim in judgment as a compromise and settlement in full, the statute of limitations then commences to run in favor of the guardian; and action for account, brought by the ward more than seven years afterwards is barred, he having sufficient information at the time of the receipt to put him upon inquiry as to all matters of fraud now claimed as an avoidance of the settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 488; Dec. Dig. ⇨100.]

[2. Witnesses ⇨175.]

In such action against the executor of the deceased guardian, plaintiff is incompetent to testify to communications made to him by the deceased upon the matter of the compromise and the value of the estate, notwithstanding returns of the guardian had previously been introduced in evidence by the executor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 711; Dec. Dig. ⇨175.]

Before Fraser, J., Laurens, April, 1884.

In this case, Honorable B. C. Pressley, the Judge of the First Circuit, sat in place of the Chief Justice, who had been of counsel in the cause.

To the statement of the case made in the Circuit decree, it will be necessary to add only that the receipt signed by W. G. Rudd, attorney, was not under seal, and that the returns of J. D. Williams, as guardian, were introduced by the executor—matters relied upon by counsel for appellants as bearing upon the points decided by the court. The Circuit decree was as follows:

The case came up on a report of M. A. Carlisle, to whom as special referee all the issues of law and fact had been referred, and exceptions by both plaintiff and defendant.

The deceased, *John D. Williams, was appointed guardian of the plaintiff in 1849, and entered into bond for the faithful discharge of his duties as such. He died in June, 1870, leaving a solvent estate, and the defendant is his surviving executor. Plaintiff was born September 20, 1847, and therefore came to the age of twenty-one years September 20, 1868. This action has been brought for a full and final accounting for the estate of the plaintiff, which went into the hands of the guardian, and for the payment of the amount found due. The action was commenced November 11, 1876.

The defendant answering, admits that John D. Williams was the guardian as stated, and took possession of the estate of his ward; but alleges that on December 11, 1868, the guardian paid to his said ward, represented by W. G. Rudd as his attorney in fact under a power executed after he became of age, the sum of $3,440.55 in money, and assigned to him a judgment against one R. S. Phinney, as a settlement in full and compromise of his said guardianship accounts, and pleads the statute of limitations. It will be seen from the dates here given that seven years and a little over eleven months elapsed between the date of the alleged settlement and the commencement of this action.

There is nothing in the pleadings which indicates the particulars in which the plaintiff intended to assail this alleged settlement, but it has been attacked both in argument and by testimony in the progress of the cause mainly, as I understand the parties, on the grounds that the settlement of December 11, 1868, was a mere affirmation of another settlement made between the plaintiff while a minor and John D. Williams in their own names, and which plaintiff was induced to make by his being away from his home in Texas, and badly in want of money; by his being under the influence of strong drink, and having it intimated to him by his guardian that unless he agreed to the settlement, he would run the risk of losing a large part, if not the whole, of this estate. These statements are not corroborated, and depend entirely on the testimony of the plaintiff himself. A wise provision of the law, as I construe it, renders such testimony inadmissible, now that one of the parties to the transaction can no longer give his version of the occurrences which led to that first agreement.

Whatever may have been the other objections to that agreement, which was made August 23, 1867, it was not binding, being made by the plaintiff during his minority; his subsequent acts show that he did not regard himself as bound by it. His power of attorney to W. G. Rudd, under which the next and last settlement was made, made no allusion to it, and in fact W. G. Rudd, notwithstanding his testimony on this subject, exacted not only the full balance of the money agreed upon on August 23, 1867, but took an assignment of a judgment against R. S. Phinney, dated November 11, 1867, for $2,828.59, with interest from that date, and which was a part of the ward's estate. What that judgment may have been worth may not be material except to show that W. G. Rudd under the power of attorney made a new and independent settlement. It is as well, however, to say that at a date subsequent to the date of this judgment, Phinney gave to Copeland another lien on his property, and on Phinney going into bankruptcy, Copeland got the proceeds of the sale of the property.

That original agreement is important in another aspect. While W. G. Rudd clearly appears from the settlement made by him not to have considered that first agreement as binding, he says that he settled by it, and must have, from its contents and the reasons therein given why he should do what he did do—enter into a compromise and settlement in full of his guardianship accounts with John D. Williams on behalf of his principal, the plaintiff in this case. He had, in that original settlement made by his principal in his minority, sufficient information to put him on the inquiry, and he should have made it. It may be that if he had proceeded at once to investigate, he might have demanded the opening of these accounts so solemnly settled and compromised; but that settlement was in its nature final, and after it was made, the guardian and his ward were at arm's length, and the statute of limitations commenced to run.

The language used by Chancellor Harper, in Moore v. Porcher (Bail. Eq., 197), that when a trustee does an act which purports to be a final execution of his trust, the statute begins to run from *that time, so as to bar an account, has become the well-established law of the land, and by subsequent cases the principle has been extended to credit done in a public office having cognizance and jurisdiction over the matter of the trust in question. Motes v. Madden, 14 S. C., 188. The receipt in this case would have been sufficient, if it had never been filed in the probate's office. There is in this case no subsequent discovery to affect the rights of the parties. Plaintiff either did know, or by proper diligence could have known, everything material to the claim at or soon after the date of this compromise and settlement.

I think, therefore, that the statute of limitations is a bar to any further accounting in this case.

At the same time, I incline to the opinion that after the disasters of the war, and the commercial ruin which followed it at the South, the plaintiff was fortunate to have so much of his estate as has been turned over to him by his guardian in this; but it is not necessary to answer the other question in the case. The exceptions are therefore overruled, except so far as are accordant with this decree; and the report of the special referee is set aside; and it is ordered and adjudged, that the complaint be dismissed with costs, to be paid by the plaintiff.

From this decree, the plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor erred in deciding that the statute of limitations barred the plaintiff's claim.

2. Because his honor erred in deciding that the plaintiff's testimony as to what transpired between him and his guardian in regard to the compromise is inadmissible under section 400 of the code, notwithstanding the defendant introduced and relied upon the acts and declarations of said deceased guardian as to said transactions, and the plaintiff's testimony was simply in reply thereto.

3. Because his honor erred in not sustaining the four exceptions of the plaintiff to the report of the referee, which are as follows: [Omitted, as involving only errors of calculation.] And then confirming said report so modified; the testimony showing most clearly that the plaintiff did not understand his rights, and *that he had no means of ascertaining them fully except from his guardian, who failed to give him the necessary information to enable him to understand his rights.

4. Because his honor erred in not holding that the payments made by the plaintiff, being only a part of his estate, could not operate as in full of his whole estate.

5. Because his honor erred in not holding that the agreement of compromise was a nudum pactum, being without any consideration, except the payment to ward of a part of what was due him.

6. Because his honor erred in not holding that it was the duty of the guardian to show that he invested ward's funds as required by law, and not having done so, that he is liable for the whole amount as for money used by him.

7. Because his honor should have held that the alleged release by ward of part of his estate was not binding, because he was a minor at the time and it was not under seal.

Messrs. Jones & Jones and Geo. S. Mower, for appellants.

Messrs. Holmes & Simpson, Ball & Watts, and John W. Ferguson, contra.

January 8, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice PRESSLEY. Plaintiff seeks in this case to recover a balance claimed as due to him by his deceased guardian. The answer alleges a compromise with plaintiff by his said guardian and full settlement thereof on December 11, 1868, and pleads the statute of limitations. There is no reply to that answer, nor was there any motion to amend the complaint so as to allege fraud at the time of said compromise and recent discovery of said fraud. Notwithstanding the absence of such allegations, the referee admitted testimony (chiefly of the plaintiff, which was incompetent) tending to show that the said compromise had been obtained from him by false representations by his deceased guardian. The Circuit Judge sustains the plea of the statute of limitations, and further holds that plaintiff had sufficient information, before his final settlement with his guardian, to put him upon inquiry into the matters of fraud which he now attempts to prove.

*After careful examination, this court concurs in the decision of the Circuit Judge, and his decree is therefore affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Before Hudson, J., Beaufort, September, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Verdier & Talbird, for appellant.
Mr. J. B. Howe, contra.

February 26, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On June 30, 1877 the defendant gave his promissory note to D. McPherson for $1,000. Afterwards "the said note was endorsed and delivered by the said McPherson to the plaintiff herein, as administrator of R. C. McIntire, deceased; and he, the said administrator, is now the legal owner and holder thereof." The plaintiff, as administrator, sued upon the note, and upon the call of the case the defendant moved to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that "it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The presiding judge overruled the motion or verbal demurrer; and to this order defendant excepted, and gave verbal notice of appeal to this court, upon the ground that the judge erred in refusing the *motion. The defendant also claimed that all further proceedings in the case should be stayed until his appeal from the order refusing the motion could be heard and decided here. Against the objection of the defendant, the judge submitted the case to the jury. The defendant offered no evidence, and the plaintiff had a verdict.

The defendant appealed to this court on two grounds: "I. Because his honor erred in overruling the defendant's oral demurrer. II. Because his honor erred in ordering the cause to trial against the objection of the defendant's counsel after the demurrer was overruled, and notice of appeal given from that ruling."

I think that the Circuit Judge was right in refusing the motion to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. I see no good objection to the complaint, and none was stated. Indeed, the question seemed to be abandoned, and was not argued at the bar.

But it was earnestly urged that the verbal notice of appeal from the order refusing the motion to dismiss the complaint should have stayed all further proceedings in the court below until that appeal was decided in this court. This involves a very important point of practice. In respect to its appealable character, the order refusing the motion to dismiss the complaint, because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, cannot fall under subdivision 3 of section 11 of the Code, for the reason that it was not made in a special proceeding; nor can it fall under subdivision 2 of that section, because it did not "in effect determine the action or prevent a judgment from which an appeal might be taken." But it does fall within subdivision 1 of that section, which provides as follows: "The Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to review any intermediate judgment, order, or decree involving the merits * * * and final judgment; Provided, if no appeal be taken until final judgment is entered, the court may, upon appeal from such final judgment, review any intermediate order or decree necessarily affecting the judgment not before appealed from," &c.

It is clear that this section provides for the review of all "intermediate orders," but the point is when and how the matter *should be brought up for that purpose—after final judgment in the case or at the time made; and if the latter, whether such appeal must necessarily stay further proceedings in the case until the appeal is disposed of? In regard to reviewing an "intermediate order" on appeal from the final judgment, the terms of the provision are not mandatory, but permissive; and from this it would seem to be inferrible that a party may, if he chose, appeal from an intermediate ruling at the time it is made. From the manner in which it is expressed, we do not feel authorized to hold that this may not be done. But I fully agree with Mr. Wait when he says: "It is not the policy of the code, with reference to appeals, to allow a review of intermediate orders, unless they are such as in effect terminate the action and prevent a judgment from which an appeal will lie, or unless upon appeal from final judgment." Wait Anno. Code, 663, and authorities.

If the motion to dismiss the complaint had been granted, the order would have had the effect of terminating the case and of preventing a judgment from which an appeal would lie, and under the terms of the law cited, would have been appealable at once. But it seems to us that it was very different when the motion was refused, for then the case was not terminated, but might go on to judgment, an appeal from which would bring under review the intermediate order as well, as appears in the very case before us, in which there is an appeal both from the final judgment and the intermediate order. There should certainly not be two separate appeals in the same case, but the intermediate order might be, and in my judgment should be, reviewed, if at all, under the appeal from the final judgment. This is, as it seems to me, the view of the code, for otherwise there would necessarily be great delays in the administration of justice, and this court would often be called upon to decide cases by piece-meal, and, indeed, to decide questions which, as tested by the final result, were entirely unnecessary.

But in case the party does not choose to await the final judgment before prosecuting his appeal from an intermediate order refusing to dismiss the complaint, what effect should such appeal have upon the further proceedings in the cause? Must they stop at that point until the appeal is disposed of?

Does the *notice of appeal proprio vigore stay all further proceedings, or may they proceed in the usual way at least to final judgment? I do not think it necessarily follows that because an intermediate order may be appealed from, all further progress in the cause is thereby stayed pending the appeal. The fact that the code allows an intermediate order to be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment would seem to indicate an intention that the cause may proceed to judgment, notwithstanding the notice of appeal; provided, always, that the order is of such a character as not in effect to terminate the case or to prevent a judgment from which an appeal lies. I fail to find the authority that such appeal must operate as a stay to further proceedings in the case short of judgment.

As I understand it, there is an essential difference between a stay of further proceedings in a cause and a stay of execution upon final judgment. Several of the sections of the code declare what shall be necessary (giving bond, &c.) to procure a stay of proceedings on particular judgments, as, for instance, where the judgment is for the delivery of personal property or the execution of a conveyance, &c.; and then section 356 provides as follows: "In cases not provided for in sections 346, 350, 351, 352, and 353, the notice of appeal shall stay proceedings in the court below upon the judgment appealed from," &c. The case before us can only fall under this section, and it becomes necessary to determine what was meant by the words "upon the judgment appealed from." I incline to think that the intention was to refer to the final judgment in the case which might be enforced, and not to dignify into "a judgment" a simple order refusing to dismiss the complaint, especially as such an order does not allow of further proceedings, but is purely negative in character and needs no stay. The code manifestly does not contemplate two appeals at the same time in the same case, one after the other indefinitely on negative intermediate orders. It seems to me the Circuit Court might, notwithstanding notice of appeal from such an intermediate order, proceed with the cause at least to final judgment. "This court has no authority to review an order for judgment on demurrer, unless plaintiff should amend; the order is not reviewable until final judgment in the case is entered." *Adams v. Fox, 27 N. Y. (13 Smith), 640; Wait Anno. Code, 662, and authorities.

In reference to the review of an intermediate ruling, refusing to dismiss the complaint, I think the proper practice is to except at the time of the ruling, and then await the final judgment from which, if favorable, there will be no need of an appeal; but if adverse, the party may appeal, and in doing so have the intermediate rulings reviewed also, as was always done under the old practice in reference to a ruling at the trial refusing to admit testimony, to grant a non-suit, &c. Our books of reports since the code are full of cases in which this practice was followed. See Hyatt v. McBurney, 17 S. C., 143; Dial v. Tappan, 20 Id., 167; Crouch v. Railroad Company, 21 Id., 495, and numerous other cases; while, on the other hand, I know of no case in which an appeal from an order made on motion at the trial refusing to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, was held to stay further proceedings up to the rendition of the judgment. I think this is the first case in which the question has been distinctly made in this State.

The case of Hammond v. Railroad Company (15 S. C., 35), was very different from this. As I understand it, the demurrer in that case was a regular written demurrer. The fact is not expressly stated in the report, but enough appears to show it. The demurrer was not aimed at the whole complaint, but at only one of the two causes of action contained in it, and when overruled it is stated that the defendant "declined to answer over." There are essential differences between a written and verbal demurrer. The former is a pleading and makes an issue. It must be filed within a prescribed time after service, and be accompanied by a certificate of the counsel filing it, that it is meritorious, and not intended merely for delay (see rule XVIII. of the Circuit Court), while the latter has not thrown around it any such safeguards. It is simply a motion at the trial without notice, and being easily made, may be entirely without merit, and only intended for the purpose of delay.

Both upon the construction of the statute and strong considerations of inconvenience and delay, I think the judgment below should be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. I concur in so much of this opinion as holds that the Circuit Judge was right in refusing to dismiss the complaint upon the demurrer. Also, in so much as holds that the order appealed from was such an intermediate order as under the code may be the subject of an appeal before final judgment. But I cannot concur in the holding, that the case below could proceed, notwithstanding the appeal from the intermediate order. I think the case of Hammond v. Railroad Company (15 S. C., 35) is conclusive of this point. See, too, LeConte v. Irwin, 23 S. C., 106. On this ground, in my opinion, the judgment below should be reversed.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur in the views presented by the Chief Justice in his dissenting opinion.

The judgment of the Circuit Court reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Appeal dismissed, the return not having been filed within the time prescribed by Rule II.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2744-2749, 3126; Dec. Dig. ⇨627.]

This was a motion to dismiss an appeal, upon the ground that the return had not been filed within the time prescribed, and upon the other ground stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bachman & Youmans, for the motion.

Mr. A. C. Moore, contra.

*December 14, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered

PER CURIAM. In this case a motion is made to dismiss the appeal upon two grounds, 1st. Because the matters appealed from are not appealable. 2d. Because appellant has failed to comply with the requirements of rule II. of this court.

For a proper understanding of the point made by the first ground upon which the motion is based, it will be necessary to make a brief statement of the facts. The action in this case was brought originally against Robert Adams, and he having died during its pendency, an order was granted by Judge Hudson, within a year, continuing the action against Evelyn Adams, as administratrix of said Robert Adams. Thereupon a notice was served upon said Evelyn Adams, together with copies of the original summons and complaint, of the order of Judge Hudson, and that the plaintiff would apply for judgment against her as administratrix as aforesaid. At the trial, the counsel for defendant contended that the action could not be maintained in the then state of the pleadings, inasmuch as, though there was an order authorizing the continuance of the action against the administratrix, yet the proper steps had not been taken to make her a party, inasmuch as no amended or supplemental complaint had been filed, or amended summons served upon her. The Circuit Judge ruled otherwise and the defendant excepted.

At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a non-suit on several grounds, which it is not material to set out here. The defendant then introduced her testimony, and the jury rendered a verdict for the defendant, which, upon motion of plaintiff's counsel, was set aside and a new trial ordered by the Circuit Judge. The defendant appeals, substantially upon two grounds. 1st. For error on the part of the Circuit Judge in holding that the action was properly continued against her as administratrix. 2d. For error in refusing her motion for nonsuit.

It will be observed that the only question which we are now called upon to decide is, not whether there is merit in the grounds of appeal, but whether the matters complained of are appealable. The first matter complained of presents the important question, vital to the jurisdiction of the court, whether the defendant has *been made a party to the action in the manner prescribed by law, and we are not prepared to say that the decision of such a question is not appealable before final judgment is rendered.

The next inquiry is, whether the refusal of a motion for a nonsuit can be appealed from before final judgment has been rendered. The code, in section 11, prescribes what is appealable and when the appeal may be taken. In its first subdivision it provides that an appeal may be taken, first, from "any intermediate judgment, order, or decree involving the merits," &c. Second, from the final judgment. The second subdivision of that section provides for an appeal from "an order affecting a substantial right made in an action, when such order, in effect, determines the action, and prevents a judgment from which an appeal might be taken, or discontinues the action, and when such order grants or refuses a new trial, or when such order strikes out an answer, or any part thereof, or any pleading in an action." The cases provided for in subdivision three of this section need not be stated, as they are plainly inapplicable to our present inquiry. It is very clear that the refusal of a motion for non-suit cannot be brought under any of the cases provided for in subdivision 2, for while it may affect a substantial right, it does not in effect determine the action, or prevent a judgment from which an appeal might be taken, nor does it discontinue the action: and it certainly does not fall under any of the other cases provided for in that subdivision.

The only remaining inquiry is, whether it can be brought under the first class of cases provided for in subdivision 1, as it clearly is not a final judgment. The inquiry is therefore narrowed down to the question whether the refusal of a motion for a non-suit is an "intermediate judgment, order, or decree, involving the merits." It certainly cannot be classed as either an intermediate judgment or decree, for a judgment is defined in Code, section 266, to be "the final determination of the rights of the parties in the action," and it is not and cannot be pretended to be a decree. Is it an order involving the merits? In section 401 of the Code it is declared that "every direction of a court or judge, made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment, is denominated an order." Now, the refusal of a motion *for a non-suit is never "made or entered in writing," and therefore cannot be "denominated an order." It is in fact nothing more than a mere ruling, like a ruling as to the competency of testimony, which, if excepted to at the time, may be made the basis of an appeal, after final judgment has been entered, but not before. To stop the trial of a case by allowing an appeal from the refusal of a motion for a non-suit, or a ruling as to the competency of testimony, would lead to interminable delays, and so far as we know has never been allowed, either before or since the adoption of the code. If, however, the non-suit is granted, then it is clearly appealable, under the first class of cases provided for in subdivision 2 of section 11 of the Code, as it "in effect determines the action."

Counsel for appellant contended in the argument of this motion that this court, in several cases, in the very last volume of our Reports, the 21st, had considered on appeal alleged errors in the refusal of motions for a non-suit. Turning to that book we find eight cases in relation to this subject. In Felder v. C. & G. R. R. Co. (21 S. C., 35 [53 Am. Rep. 656]); Davis v. C. & G. R. R. Co., at page 93; Glenn v. C. & G. R. R. Co., at page 466; and Hooper v. C. & G. R. R. Co., at page 541 [53 Am. Rep. 691] the appeals were from orders granting non-suits. In Freer v. Tupper, 21 S. C., 75; Wilson & Co. v. Dean, at page 327; Crouch v. C. & S. R. R. Co., at page 495; and Altee v. S. C. R. R. Co., at page 550, the appeals were from final judgments, and there the court could, and did, consider and determine whether there was error in refusing the motion for non-suit, just as it could consider any other alleged error, if properly excepted to at the time, which might have been committed in the progress of the proceedings towards final judgment, because such error, if any there should be, would necessarily enter into and vitiate the final judgment, and hence upon an appeal from such judgment, any error that may have been committed in refusing a motion for non-suit, or in admitting or rejecting testimony, could be considered.

While, therefore, we think that the alleged error in determining that the action was properly continued against the present defendant as administratrix of Robert Adams, may be appealable at this time, yet we cannot hold that the defendant can appeal *from the refusal of her motion for non-suit until after final judgment has been entered.

The respondent, however, claims that the appeal should be dismissed for failure on the part of appellant to comply with the requirements of rule II. of this court. It is not and cannot be denied that there has been such failure on the part of the appellant, and where respondent claims, as he has done in this case, the protection of that rule, we feel bound to accord it to him. We are the less reluctant to enforce the rule in this case, because we do not see how the substantial rights of appellant can be prejudiced by the dismissal of her appeal. The Circuit Judge has already ordered a new trial, and if upon such trial the judgment should go against the defendant, she can then, by appeal from such judgment, raise all the questions presented by this appeal.

The judgment of the court is that the appeal be dismissed.

GREGORY v. RHODEN

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Courts 201.]

Under a proceeding in the Court of Probate by a creditor, who was also administrator, to sell land in aid of assets, that court has jurisdiction to determine in the first instance the validity of an alleged deed under which one of the defendants claimed to hold title from the intestate.

[2. Executors and Administrators 334.]

An intestate gave his sealed note to his son in April, 1866, and in July, 1866, conveyed his lands to his wife at his death, which took place in the following November. The widow held possession of these lands as her own until her death in 1879. Afterwards this son administered on his father's estate, and in 1883 filed a petition in the Court of Probate to sell these lands in aid of assets. Held, that he had been guilty of laches, and could not invoke the aid of equity.

3. This case distinguished from Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C., 528.

Before Kershaw, J., Aiken, July, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

The defendants insist that this obligation was conditioned on the performance by the plaintiff of the considerations expressed *therein, and that performance has not been proved. In the year 1865 intestate made a will leaving all his property to the plaintiff, or, at least, the land now in question, assigning as a reason that plaintiff was the only one of his children who resided with and rendered him service, and that he desired to compensate him in that way. In March, 1866, the will was destroyed, and plaintiff thereupon told the laborers whom he had employed to work on the farm that year that they must look out for themselves, as he also had to do. Afterwards, when the obligation here set up had been executed, plaintiff continued to serve his father as he had done before. From this, it appears to me that plaintiff, before the destruction of the will, was performing these services gratuitously, but in expectation of being compensated eventually by the provisions of the will; that after the will was destroyed, he declined to continue his services, and only resumed them when other provision for his compensation had been made by this writing. This accounts well for the making of the contract, and also furnished a good reason for considering the services of plaintiff to his father after that time as having been rendered in performance of his duty thereunder. I consider the evidence sufficient to establish plaintiff's claim, even if we consider it as conditioned on performance on the part of plaintiff.

If I were left in doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence on this point, it would be a proper case in which to frame an issue for the decision of a jury, as was directed by the court on the appeal in Shaw v. Cunningham (9 S. C., 271), as suggested by counsel for defendants, but I cannot say that I entertain any doubt on the subject. This is just one of those cases in which juries are apt to be governed by some supposed principles of natural justice or equality rather than by the rules of law, and such a reference ought not to be made unless clearly required for the solution of a question of fact which the court is led to hesitate about by the evidence.

I now pass to the consideration of the points made by the plaintiff's appeal. The case of Faust v. Bailey (5 Rich., 107), taken in connection with section 60 of the Code of Procedure, seems to me conclusive on this point. The judge of probate ought to have considered the question of title raised, and his failure to do so was error. According, however, to the view I have taken of the legal aspects of the case, it will not be necessary to remand the matter for a further hearing in the court below. The results will depend on questions of law rather than of fact.

The deed upon which the defense rests was made by a husband to his wife before the common law relations of married women had been changed in this State. As the law then stood, if the grant was intended to operate in present, it was void, because a husband could not make such a grant to his wife after coverture, unless in pursuance of articles entered into before marriage and in consideration of marriage. On the other hand, if it was testamentary in its character, it was ineffectual, because it was not executed with the formalities required in the case of a will. Moreover, being a voluntary deed, it would have been void as to existing creditors under the statute of 13th Eliz. and the decisions thereon; if properly assailed by the creditors, it could not prevail against them. Twyne's Case, 3 Co., 80; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas., 1.

Nevertheless such grants are supported in equity, under certain circumstances, when they would be void at law. Says Mr. Story: "A grant of a reasonable provision to a wife would be enforced in equity though void at law; but if a husband, by deed, grant all his estate or property to his wife, the deed would be held inoperative in equity as it would be at law." Story Eq. Jur., § 1373. See also Beard v. Beard, 3 Atk., 72; Davidson v. Graves, Riley Eq., 232. It is intimated in Price v. Price (12 Eng. L. & E., 144) that even a grant of the husband's whole estate to his wife would have been supported if there had been proof that the grantor, who was illiterate, knew what he was about.

There may be a gift made by a husband to his wife which, though bad at law, would be supported in equity; but, as was stated in McLean v. Longlands (5 Ves., 78), nothing less will do than a clear, irrevocable gift, either to some person as a trustee (for the wife) or some clear and distinct act of the husband by which he divested himself of the property and engaged to hold the same as a trustee for the separate use of his wife. Lord Hardwicke, in the case of Lucas v.

Lucas (1 Atk., 271), which *has been referred to, distinctly says that in this court gifts between husband and wife have often been supported, though the law does not allow them to pass the property. Though the property does not pass at law, yet, in equity, a husband, being the owner at law, may become a trustee for his wife; and if by clear and irrevocable acts he has made himself such trustee, the gift to his wife will be conclusive. Mews v. Mews, 21 Eng. L. & E., 558.

Here the intention is plain to give to the wife, by an irrevocable instrument, an estate to vest in possession at his death. Such an estate cannot be supported without a trustee, but equity will not suffer a trust to fail for the want of a trustee. In the present case, the husband would be considered a trustee for his wife. Cloud v. Calhoun, 10 Rich. Eq., 362; Ellis v. Woods, 9 Rich. Eq., 24.

This deed might, therefore, be sustained on these principles so far as regards the common law disabilities of husband and wife to contract with each other. But it is liable to another objection, in that it is a marriage settlement, requiring to be recorded as such, and void as to creditors for the want of such recording. Bank v. Brown, 2 Hill Eq., 558 [30 Am. Dec. 380]. Yet it was good between the parties and would remain so until set aside or superseded by some action on the part of the creditors. As said by Chancellor Harper, in Fripp v. Talbird (1 Hill Eq., 142), "creditors may treat it as void—they are not compelled to avoid it, but may seize the property as if there was no deed; but until they do seize the property, the deed remains perfectly good." He was speaking of a post-nuptial settlement not recorded, and of judgment creditors.

The deed here being good between the parties, the property passed to Mrs. Gregory, at the death of her husband, subject to be divested by proper proceedings on the part of creditors taken in due time. Has this plaintiff proceeded in due time? Having notice of the deed, he ought to have proceeded within four years thereafter. Lott v. DeGraffenreid, 10 Rich. Eq., 346. In fact, no proceedings were had until the commencement of this action in 1883, a period of nearly seventeen years after the plaintiff had notice of the deed. During all these years there *has been possession under the deed, and plaintiff has stood by in silent acquiescence. True, there was no administrator of the estate of Richard Gregory until recently, but that need not have prevented a proceeding in equity against Margaret Gregory in her life-time, or against her heirs after her death, to subject the land in question to the plaintiff's claim. Vernon & Co. v. Valk, 2 Hill Eq., 257. I am of the opinion that, after so long a delay, plaintiff ought not now to have the aid of the court in enforcing his demand. Upon the ground of laches, as applied in the courts of equity, the complaint must be dismissed. 2 Story Eq., § 1520, et seq., and notes; Mobley v. Cureton, 2 S. C., 149. In that case the doctrine was applied when the statute of limitations was held not to be a bar.

I am the less reluctant to dismiss the action on account of the nature of the plaintiff's claim. He will suffer no great loss, for the services rendered to his father, under the contract, could have been of little value, inasmuch as the father died within a very few months after they commenced. Perhaps it was this view of the matter which induced the plaintiff to delay action for so many years.

It is ordered and adjudged, that the complaint be dismissed, and that the plaintiff do pay the costs of this action. Let the judgment be certified to the Probate Court.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., for appellant.
Mr. G. W. Croft, contra.

January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On April 2, 1866, Richard Gregory, sr., as alleged, executed and delivered to his son, Richard Gregory, jr., the following note or obligation, viz.: "One day after date I promise to pay Richard Gregory, jr., or bearer, the sum of two thousand dollars, to support me my life-time, including to let him use my farm and implements my life-time, and it is to come out of my land and other property that I hold at this time. Witness my hand and seal this 2 April, 1866.

*On July 7, 1866, the said Richard Gregory, sr., executed and delivered to his wife, Margaret, a paper which, in consideration of love and affection, and of five dollars acknowledged to have been paid, purported to convey to her, the said Margaret, all his personal property and five hundred acres of land described, "to have and to hold the said plantation and all the personal property that I may be possessed of at my decease, unto the said Margaret Gregory, her executors, administrators, and assigns forever." &c. This paper contained a warranty, was delivered, probated, and recorded, but had but two witnesses.

In November, 1866, the said Richard Gregory, sr., died intestate, and his widow, Margaret, continued to live on the land included in the paper delivered to her as aforesaid, until she also died intestate on December 19, 1879. On the estate of Richard Gregory, sr., no administration was granted until after the death of the widow, Margaret, when, on February 12, 1880, letters were granted to Jonathan Gregory, but he died before administering the estate, and letters de bonis non were granted to Richard Gregory, jr., who, as creditor and administrator, on March 8, 1883, instituted these proceedings in the Probate Court in the nature of a bill to marshal assets; but there being no personal estate, it was manifestly for the purpose of setting aside the deed to Margaret, and making the land covered by it still the property of his father, Richard Gregory, sr., and as such liable for his debt. The other heirs of Richard Gregory, sr., and of his widow, Margaret, were made parties, and they denied that the plaintiff was a creditor of his father, Richard; but if so, that the said Richard did not die seized and possessed of the lands, which he had previously given to his widow, Margaret, and that they, the said lands, belong not to the heirs of Richard, the father, but to those of Margaret, the mother. And further, they insisted that the judge of probate had not jurisdiction to decide that point, as it involved a question of title to land.

The creditors of Richard Gregory, sr., were called in, and the probate judge, after taking much testimony, held that two debts of the intestate were established, viz., that of the plaintiff for $2,000, and interest, upon the obligation before referred to, and one of J. G. Steadman, on a balance of two notes, one for $221.77, *and the other for $341.95; but he held that the Probate Court had not jurisdiction to determine the title to the land. Both parties appealed to the Court of Common Pleas—the plaintiff on the question of jurisdiction, and the defendants on the ground that the plaintiff's claim was not established as a debt by the evidence. Judge Kershaw concurred with the probate judge, that the plaintiff's claim was established as a debt of the intestate, but he held further that the probate judge ought to have considered the question of title raised, and his failure to do so was error. But taking the view that there was involved a question of law, which should finally dispose of the litigation, he thought it unnecessary to remand the case for a further hearing in the court below, but decided it on the ground that, after so long a delay, the plaintiff ought not now to have the aid of the court in enforcing his demand, and that upon the ground of laches, as applied in the courts of equity, the complaint should be dismissed. The plaintiff appeals to this court upon several grounds, which will be considered in their order.

The first exception is, "That his honor erred in not holding that the paper from Richard Gregory, sr., to Margaret Gregory, bearing date July 7, 1866, was testamentary in its character, and hence void, as against the claims of the plaintiff and other creditors, because it had but two witnesses." &c. It does not appear that this point was made in the Probate Court, or in the grounds of appeal from that court. But it may possibly be considered as embraced in the question of jurisdiction, because the title to land was involved. Considering it as involved in that objection and before the court, we concur with the Circuit Judge that the Probate Court should have decided the question. It may be conceded that, if the proceeding had been instituted simply for the purpose of setting aside the deed, in order to make the lands in the possession of the heir or donee liable for a debt of the ancestor, it would have been purely equitable in character and not within the constitutional jurisdiction of the Probate Court.

But the proceeding is in form, at least, for the purpose of marshalling the assets of the estate of Richard Gregory, sr., under section 40 of the Code, which gives to the Probate Court jurisdiction for that purpose.

"And whenever it shall appear to the *satisfaction of any judge of probate that the personal estate of any person deceased is insufficient for the payment of his debts, and all persons interested in such estate, being first summoned before him, and showing no cause to the contrary, such probate judge shall have power to order the sale of the real estate of such person deceased, or of so much thereof as may be necessary for the payment of the debts of such deceased person, upon such terms," &c. It seems to us that in such cases this provision necessarily gives the right to determine, at least in the first instance, what is "the real estate of such person deceased," subject, of course, to the right of appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, where a trial by jury may, if desired, be demanded. Any other construction would tend to make the whole jurisdiction nugatory. Besides, while it may be that title to land was involved in the decision of the question, it is clear that it was one of law as to the proper construction of the paper in contention, viz., whether it was valid or void, or merely voidable as against prior creditors of the donor. See Faust v. Bailey (5 Rich., 107), where it was held that in an application for partition the old Court of Ordinary had jurisdiction to decide in the first instance upon a question of title, subject, of course, to appeal.

The second exception is, "That his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff's complaint should be dismissed upon the ground of laches on the part of the plaintiff in prosecuting his claim," in that it is submitted that the plaintiff was guilty of no laches, for the testimony shows that he acted within the statutory period, and within the time required by good faith and conscience," &c. In respect to a question of laches, we do not understand that a proceeding to make land liable for the obligation of a deceased debtor, is identical with an action on the obligation itself against the personal representative of the deceased debtor. In the latter case there is privity of contract, and the action must be at law, while in the former there is no privity, and the proceeding is in equity. Where a legacy has been delivered to a legatee, and he has had separate and exclusive enjoyment thereof for more than four years, the Court of Equity will not allow it to be recovered back for the purpose of paying a debt of the deceased, although the debt is in the form of a bond, and not subject to the statute of limitations. Brewster & Dickson v. Gillison*, 10 Rich. Eq., 435. Even where the land sought to be charged has descended to the heirs, upon whom the law imposes certain liabilities to the creditors of the ancestor, it has been held that it cannot be sold under a judgment against the administrator, if it has passed into the actual and exclusive possession of the heirs before the judgment was recovered. In such case the land can only be reached by the usual proceeding to subject real estate in the hands of the heir to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, in which proceeding the heir must, of course, be a party, with the opportunity to defend himself. Huggins v. Oliver, 21 S. C., 159, and the authorities cited.

This being the principle as to lands devolving upon the heirs, it would seem to apply with increased force to one who is in exclusive possession of land claiming as donee of the deceased debtor, and, therefore, this proceeding must be regarded as having a double aspect, first, to marshal the assets of Richard Gregory, sr., and then, as incidental thereto, to set aside his deed to the widow, Margaret. In this view, the case is not analogous to that of Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C., 528, cited by the appellant. The proceeding in that case was simply to remove an obstacle in the way of enforcing a judgment, and was substantially inter vivos. It is true that the defendant in execution was dead at the time the bill was filed, but he was living at the time the debt was sued and until a short time before judgment was recovered; while the proceeding in this case was primarily to marshal assets, and only for that reason was maintainable in the Probate Court. To enable him to institute such a proceeding, it was not necessary that the creditor should have a judgment at all. He might file a creditor's bill upon a simple note of the deceased. The appellant had the same right to institute this proceeding at the death of his intestate, Richard Gregory, sr., that he has now. If his right of action could not accrue until he had judgment and a return of nulla bona, it has not yet accrued, for there was no such proof in the case. If administration was indispensably necessary, he might have taken out letters at any time after the death of the intestate, as he has lately done. Without stopping to consider the peculiar character of the deed to Margaret, or whether the Circuit Judge was right in holding that it was good between the parties until *set aside by proper proceedings, it is certain that the widow, holding under that deed, had exclusive and adverse possession for more than ten years, and with full knowledge of the plaintiff.

The Judge held as matter of fact, "That no proceedings were had until the commencement of this action in 1883, a period of nearly seventeen years after the plaintiff had notice of the deed. During all these years there has been possession under the deed, and the plaintiff stood by in silent acquiescence. True, there was no administrator of the estate of Richard Gregory until recently, but that need not have prevented a proceeding in equity against Margaret Gregory in her life-time or against her heirs after her death, to subject the land in question to the plaintiff's claim. Vernon & Co. v. Ehrlich's Ex'rs, 2 Hill Eq., 257." As a rule, ten years adverse possession of land gives title as against all who are capable of suing and do not. If such possession is held under a defective deed, it cures the defect and gives good title; Lyles v. Kirkpatrick (9 S. C., 265), in which the court say: "In itself, the deed is deficient in point of proof for want of two subscribing witnesses; but inasmuch as a possession of upwards of ten years had been held under it of an adverse character, without the assertion of title in opposition to it, the validity of the deed cannot be disputed at this time."

It is true this proceeding to make the land liable is equitable in its character, to which the statute of limitations, as such, has no proper application. But if the creditor has been guilty of laches in asserting his equity, the court may refuse him its aid, and bar the equitable remedy at a period short of that, which would raise a presumption of payment. Lott v. De Graffenried, 10 Rich. Eq., 346; Mobley v. Cureton, 2 S. C., 148; Blackwell v. Ryan, 21 S. C., 112; Smith v. Smith, McM. Eq., 134. In this last case Chancellor Dunkin said: "In regard to equitable titles, courts of equity are to be considered as affected only by analogy to the statute of limitations. If a party be guilty of such laches in prosecuting his equitable title as would bar him if his title was solely at law, he shall be barred in equity."

The third exception charges that there was another debt proved, against which no objection was made, and therefore, in any view, the land should be sold for the payment of that debt. It is true *that the probate judge held as proved a debt of the intestate to one A. G. Steadman, but the Circuit Judge made no separate reference to it in his decree. Upon looking to the proof, it seems to have been the balance of a debt older than that due to the plaintiff, and we assume that the judge considered his ruling as applying alike to both.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

WILLIAMSON v. GASQUE.

(November Term, 1885.)

[Dower ⇐ 116.]

A sum of money assessed in lieu of dower does not constitute a specific lien upon the land in the possession of an alienee, but only a judgment taking rank as such; but if the sum so assessed be not in fact paid, the widow still has her right of dower in the land itself.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Shell v. Duncan, 31 S. C. 567, 10 S. E. 330, 5 L. R. A. 821; Elder v. McIntosh, 88 S. C. 290, 70 S. E. 897.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 374; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 116.]

Before Hudson, J., Marion, July, 1885.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

Emily Williamson brought this action against W. E. Gasque, who is in possession of a tract of land of which the husband of the demandant was, in his life-time, seized in fee, but which he aliened, the purpose of the action being to recover her dower. In the action in the Court of Probate, the judge decreed dower to the demandant, and issued his writ to have the same admeasured. The commissioners, in their return, recommended and assessed a sum of money in lieu of dower, and this return was confirmed by the judge of probate, who, instead of entering up judgment and issuing execution to enforce the same, proceeded to order the land to be sold, and directed the proceeds to be applied in the first instance to the payment of dower and costs, and the balance to be paid to the owner of the land, &c. The appeal is from this order as being irregular.

There are, it is said, existing liens on this land, a mortgage, and perhaps liens by judgment, and these should first be paid from the proceeds; at all events, the question is argued before me on that assumption, and the appellant contends, that to enforce the payment of the sum assessed in lieu of dower, these proceedings can only be by judgment and execution; and that the lien of such judgment will take rank from its date of entry, and will be postponed to older liens. In other words, that such a judgment for assessment in lieu of dower is not a specific and superior lien on the land, but only a general lien as other judgments, and takes rank in the same manner as other money judgments. This view of the matter is correct.

But it is said that in case of the insolvency of the respondent, by reason of older existing liens, the demandant in dower, to whom a sum of money is assessed in lieu thereof, would in this manner be often entirely defeated, and that such a construction of the law would work great hardship upon the widow. Not at all. The money is assessed to her in lieu of dower. If it is paid, the estate in dower in the land is extinguished; but if not paid, her estate is as before, and she can still demand admeasurement as before. Her dower is extinguished only by actual payment. Now, if she desires to enforce payment of the assessment, she can only do so by judgment and execution. If that fails, she can fall back upon the unsatisfied dower, and demand an admeasurement. She is in no worse condition than before. It is a mistake to suppose that a judgment for damages in an action for dower, or for a sum of money assessed in lieu of dower, is a specific lien upon the land, and is to be preferred to older liens. That it is not a specific lien is expressly decided in the case of Bauskett v. Smith, 2 Rich., 164. No other doctrine than that of this case has ever been recognized in our State.

The appeal is sustained, and the order of the Court of Probate directing a sale of this land is set aside, and it is so ordered, adjudged, and decreed. The case is remanded to that court with leave to the demandant, if she so desire, and if it be a fact that she cannot recover her money by judgment and execution, to renew her demand for the admeasurement of her dower in and out of the land.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, for appellant.
Mr. C. A. Woods, contra.

*January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. Joseph Williamson departed this life in 1883, seized and possessed of a tract of land containing 333 $\frac{1}{3}$ acres. In some way not explained the land was afterwards bought by the wife of the defendant, W. E. Gasque, and they went into the possession. The wife died, leaving the land in possession of W. E. Gasque, which was admitted to be subject to the lien of a mortgage. The plaintiff, Emily Williamson, widow of Joseph Williamson, petitioned the Probate Court for dower in the said premises, making W. E. Gasque, who was in possession, the defendant. The probate judge issued a writ for the admeasurement of the dower. The commissioners made return, assessing in lieu of dower in the land, the sum of \$85, with interest thereon from May 2, 1883. The return was confirmed, and the said amount ordered to be paid by W. E. Gasque, as well as the costs of the case, \$55.50.

Afterwards, the judgment and costs not being paid, the probate judge ordered as follows: "Whereas the commissioners, to whom a writ for the admeasurement of dower in the case was directed, made their return, which by order of this court was confirmed, and by the same the defendant was required to pay the petitioner herein the sum of $85, with interest, &c.; and whereas the defendant, W. E. Gasque, has failed and neglected to pay the sum so assessed in lieu of dower, and the costs taxed as aforesaid; now, therefore, it is ordered that the lands mentioned in the petition and writ be sold on Monday, March 2, 1885, or on some convenient sales-day thereafter, before the court house door at Marion in said State, within the legal sale hours, for cash, after due advertisement. Ordered further, that out of the proceeds of sale the sum of eighty-five dollars, with interest thereon, &c., together with the costs of sale, be paid to the parties entitled thereto, &c. Ordered further, that any surplus remaining after the payment of the said sum and costs, be paid to the legal owner or owners of the said lands, who shall apply for and establish his or her rights to the same."

From this judgment of the Probate Court the defendant, Gasque, appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, and Judge Hudson reversed the judgment and set aside the order directing "a sale of the land, and remanded the case to the Probate Court, "with leave to the demandant, if she so desire, and it be a fact that she cannot recover her money by judgment and execution, to renew her demand for the admeasurement of her dower in and out of the land." From this judgment the plaintiff, Mrs. Williamson, appeals to this court, upon the following grounds:

"1. Because his honor erred in holding that the payment of the assessment of the commissioners could only be enforced by judgment and execution.

"2. Because his honor erred in holding that a judgment for damages in an action for dower, or for a sum of money assessed in lieu of dower, is not a specific lien upon the land, and to be preferred to older liens.

"3. Because his honor erred in holding that the order of the judge of probate was irregular and void.

"4. Because his honor erred in holding that if the payment of the sum of money assessed for dower could not be enforced by judgment and execution against the property of the defendant, the only remedy for the demandant would be to renew her demand for the admeasurement of dower in and out of the land, which she might do indefinitely, under the forms of law, without securing her dower."

It is true that dower at common law is a right of the widow to have the use for life of one-third of the lands of which her husband was seized during the coverture. This right is in the land itself wherever it may be found; but our statute upon the subject has enlarged somewhat the manner of enforcing it, by providing that, "when the same [land] cannot, in the opinion of a majority of the commissioners, be fairly and equally divided without manifest disadvantage, then they, or a majority of them, shall assess a sum of money to be paid to the widow in lieu of her dower, by the heir at law or such other person or persons who may be in possession of said land," &c. Gen. Stat., § 2288. As dower proper is an interest in the land itself, it would seem that "the sum assessed in lieu of dower" should also adhere to the land, and accordingly it has been held that, when the claim is set up against the estate of the deceased husband, the assessment, in marshaling the assets, must be considered in the nature of a *charge to the extent of one-third upon the lands, to the relief of the personality. See Stock v. Parker et al., 2 McCord Eq., 376; Witherspoon v. Watts, 18 S. C., 396. The view was clearly expressed by Chancellor Johnson in the case of Stock v. Parker, supra, as follows: "The right of dower consists of a property in the soil itself, and although the act of the legislature regulating the admeasurement has, under particular circumstances, authorized the substitution or assessment of a sum of money in lieu of it, yet the character of the right is unchanged, and it operates as a charge upon the land itself, and not upon the general funds of the estate," &c.

But we do not think it necessarily follows that the assessment constitutes a specific lien upon the land, which may be enforced by selling it, where the land has been alienated, and the claim is made against one in possession, who is neither heir nor devisee of the deceased husband, and who may have placed encumbrances upon the land before the assessment was made or even the right of dower had accrued. The statute authorizing the assessment as a substitute for dower certainly does not expressly give it any such specific lien, nor indeed any special means for its enforcement: but, on the contrary, simply characterizes it as "a sum of money to be paid to the widow in lieu of her dower." We know of no principle which would allow the court to supplement the act by giving the assessment any higher force than that which arises from its being reduced to judgment against the person who happens to be in possession of the land. The act seems to assume that the sum of money assessed would be "paid to the widow in lieu of her dower," and until that is done the substitute contemplated has not been given or accepted, and the right to dower, not having been extinguished, still exists. As was said in the case of Banskett v. Smith, 2 Rich., 167: "In any view the assessment is to be in lieu of dower. That is, when it is paid it is in discharge of the claim of dower. There may be cases in which the heir at law or purchaser, being insolvent, could not pay the sum assessed. In such case the widow would have a clear right to fall back on her absolute right in the land, which can neither be defeated by the alienation of the husband nor by the insolvency of the purchaser. She would have the option to take the per*sonal obligation of the party, and might sue on it and recover judgment; but if she were to do so, she would have to stand on the footing of all other judgment creditors quoad her judgment," &c.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

McNAIR v. TUCKER.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Venue ⇨67.]

An affidavit that defendant cannot obtain a fair trial before a trial justice because of plaintiff's influence "with the persons who are likely to be on the jury at the trial," is not sufficient to obtain a removal of the cause under a statute which requires such removal upon affidavit that the affiant "does not believe that he can obtain a fair trial before the trial justice" (Gen. Stat., § 840), the ground stated being an objection to the jury and not to the officer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. ⇨67.]

[2. Judges ⇨51.]

A motion to transfer a cause from one trial justice to another should be made before the day appointed for trial, unless based upon facts discovered later.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Fishburne v. Minott, 72 S. C. 576, 52 S. E. 646; Mayes v. Evans, 80 S. C. 365, 61 S. E. 216.

For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 224-231; Dec. Dig. ⇨51.]

[3. Venue ⇨67.]

It would seem that the affidavit for removal should disclose the reasons that induced the belief that a fair trial could not be had; but certainly where the first affidavit stated a reason which was insufficient, and a second affidavit followed the words of the statute, and stated no reasons, a removal of the cause may be refused.

[4. Venue ⇨67.]

To entitle one to a removal of his case under the statute, the affidavit must be made before the trial justice who issued the papers; an affidavit made before a clerk of court or notary public is insufficient.

Before Hudson, J., Chesterfield, May, 1885. The opinion states the case.

Mr. E. J. Kennedy, for appellant.

Mr. R. T. Caston, contra.

January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The sole question raised by this appeal is, whether there was error in refusing the motion of *defendants to have this case transferred from the trial justice who issued the original papers to the nearest trial justice for trial under the provisions of section 840 of the General Statutes, as amended by the act of December 26, 1884, 18 Stat., §63.

It appears that the original summons was issued by A. M. Rankin, Esq., as trial justice, on December 26, 1884, and served on January 5, 1885. It was returnable on January 25, 1885, but by agreement of the parties the case was set down for trial on February 16, 1885, on which day, the defendants failing to appear, the case was, on motion of the defendants' attorney, and with the consent of plaintiff, continued until February 21, 1885. Two days before the day to which the case had thus been continued, the trial justice was served with the answer of defendants, accompanied with an affidavit of defendants, sworn to before the clerk of the court, "that they do not believe they can obtain a fair trial of the case above stated before the trial justice who issued the papers in said case and commenced said action, owing to the influence of the plaintiff in said action with the persons who are likely to be on the jury at the trial thereof." On the day of trial the defendants submitted an additional affidavit, sworn to by them before a notary public, "that they do not believe that they can obtain a fair trial before the trial justice who issued the papers in this case, and therefore ask that the papers be turned over to the next nearest trial justice in the county."

The trial justice ruled that the last affidavit came too late, and that the first affidavit showed on its face that the objection was not to the trial justice, but to the jury; and, further, he ruled that the affidavit should have been filed and motion made before return day, and not having been then made, the defendants, by their own laches, were debarred from now making the motion. He therefore refused to transfer the case to the nearest trial justice, and the case having been tried and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants appealed to the Circuit Court upon various grounds, which need not be set out here, as the only question we are called upon to consider is the propriety of refusing the motion to transfer the case to another trial justice. The Circuit Judge dismissed the appeal upon the ground that the act above cited was not designed to confer upon a party the *right to remove the case to the nearest trial justice "through caprice or a mere whim. There must be a reason for the belief that he cannot get a fair trial before the original trial justice, and such reason must be disclosed in the affidavit. An attachment can be sued out on information and belief, but the affidavit must disclose the sources of information and grounds of belief. The act, in the case before the court, was not designed to give a party to a civil action before a trial justice the license to trifle with the fitness of that officer for the hearing of a cause, and the right to cast an imputation upon his impartiality without any reason therefor." From this judgment defendants appeal upon the several grounds set out in the "Case."

The section of the general statutes, as amended by the act of 1881, upon which this motion is based, reads as follows: "Whenever a person charged with crime, to be tried, or to be examined under section 829 hereof before a trial justice, or whenever either party to a civil action which is to be tried before a trial justice shall make and file before the trial justice issuing the papers an affidavit to the effect that he does not believe that he can obtain a fair trial or examination before the trial justice, the papers shall be turned over to the nearest trial justice of that county, who shall proceed to try the case, or hold the examination, as if he had issued the papers." There is no doubt that the first affidavit submitted by the defendants was wholly insufficient to secure a transfer of the case, for it showed upon its face that the objection was not to the trial justice, but to the persons who were likely to compose the jury, and as the statute makes ample provision to secure an impartial jury, in subsequent sections of the same chapter, it is very clear that the section now under consideration was not designed to effect any such purpose.

We are also inclined to agree with the view taken by the very intelligent trial justice who originally heard the motion, that the second affidavit came too late. It is true that the act does not indicate any particular time at which the motion to transfer should be made, but courts of justice must necessarily establish rules for the orderly and proper transaction of business which come before them, even when statutes are silent upon the subject. It must be remembered that both parties to a cause have rights *which must be protected by the court, and neither party should be subjected to any unnecessary expense or delay in the prosecution or defence of his rights. Now, if a party can, without sufficient cause, delay making his motion to transfer until the very day set for the trial, he may thereby subject his adversary to expense and delay, which should, if practicable, be avoided. We think, therefore, the proper practice, in a case like this, is that the party who proposes to make a motion to transfer should be required to do so before the day appointed for the trial, unless he makes affidavit that he could not, and did not, know before that time the facts which induce him to believe that he could not obtain a fair trial before the trial justice who issued the papers.

We are also inclined to the view taken by the Circuit Judge, that a mere statement that a party believes he cannot obtain a fair trial before a given trial justice, without any reasons given for such belief, is not sufficient. The legislature could scarcely have intended to put it in the power of a party to cast a grave imputation upon a judicial officer by a mere affidavit as to his belief, upon which, if untrue, it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to assign perjury. But, as has been argued by the appellants' counsel, the language of the statute is very plain, and does not require anything more than a mere statement, "to the effect that he does not believe that he can obtain a fair trial or examination before the trial justice," and, therefore, we are not disposed to rest our decision upon this ground. Where, however, as in this case, there are two affidavits before the court, in one of which the reason for the belief that the defendants cannot obtain a fair trial is given, and in the other no reason whatever is stated, the natural conclusion is that the reason given is the only, or at least the best, reason for the alleged belief; and where, as here, the reason given shows on its face that the real objection was to the jury, and not to the trial justice, it does not appear to us that the case is brought within the terms of the statute relied upon.

But there is another ground which is conclusive against the appellants. The statute requires that the affidavit upon which the motion to transfer was based, should be made before the trial justice who issued the papers. The language of the act is: "Whenever either party to a civil action which is to be tried before a trial justice shall make and file before the trial justice issuing the papers an affidavit," &c. Now, in this case, neither of the affidavits submitted were made before the trial justice issuing the papers, one being made before the clerk of the court, and the other before a notary public, and therefore appellants have not brought themselves within the terms of the statute upon which they rely. It is true that this is a literal construction of the act, but as appellants can only maintain their position by a like literal construction of the terms of the act as to the nature of the affidavit required, they cannot complain if a like construction is applied in determining the officer before whom the affidavit must be made. They rely upon a purely statutory right, and the rule is well settled that he who invokes such a right must take care to bring himself within all the terms of the statute invoked.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Edgefield, October, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit Judge reported as follows:

The testimony relating to the first ground of appeal will be before the court, and I need not, therefore, say anything in regard to it.

As to the second and third grounds of appeal, I will say that it did not occur to me to charge the jury upon the subject of corroboration of material parts of the testimony of an accomplice. I suppose that it did not was because there was no difficulty in my own mind upon that subject in this case. The testimony of the accomplices, who used no horses themselves, in relation to the horses and mules used by some of the appellants, was corroborated in a striking way by the testimony of other witnesses. One of these witnesses, who was a blacksmith, and had shod some of the animals, recollected peculiar marks upon the shoes he had put on them and identified these marks upon tracks that had been traced from where the accomplices say the animals were to an unfrequented road in which there were no other tracks, and by the side of these tracks there were traces of spilled flour. All this testimony will be before the court, and I only mention it by way of explanation.

The fourth and eighth grounds of appeal relate to the sufficiency of the testimony.

Touching the fifth ground, I will say that Augustus Glover was indicted as an accessory before the fact—as having procured the felony to be committed. I thought that the fact of his having been a man of influence, a leader among his people in that neighborhood, was a fact relevant to the charge. The testimony objected to will be before the court, and, among other things, it will be observed that no witness testified as to the side of political questions espoused by Glover.

As to the sixth ground, Oliver Williams himself testified that he had been convicted of manslaughter and confined in the peni-

*tentary for eighteen months, and then pardoned. The record of conviction and sentence was not produced; neither was the pardon. The testimony of the pardon was as full as the testimony of the sentence. Besides, manslaughter is not of that class of crimes, conviction and sentence for which disqualifies an otherwise competent witness.

As to the seventh ground, the appellants can hardly make a verdict of not guilty a ground for a new trial.

The ninth ground alleges as error of law the exclusion of proof of the declarations of Edward Anderson, who, although included in the indictment, had escaped, and was not upon trial. This testimony was excluded, because proof of the confession of an accomplice is only competent against himself, and as to everybody else it is hearsay.

The tenth ground alleges as error the refusal to charge the following words: "Where a witness testifies on the stand, the jury are the sole judges of his honesty and veracity and are not bound to take everything he may say as true, unless they do believe with good reason that he is telling the truth." The jury were told that they were the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses; that they were to reject what they believed to be untrue, and accept only what they believed to be true; and the request as framed was refused only because it held the jury bound to accept testimony as true or reject it as incredible for reasons of a particular nature and quality—"for good reason;" the law does not fetter the jury by imposing so stringent a rule upon their grounds of belief.

Mr. Solicitor Bonham, contra.

January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The indictment in this case contained five counts. In the first count all of the defendants were charged as principals with burglary in breaking and entering, in the night time, "an outhouse, situate within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house of Mrs. E. A. Buzzard and appurtenant *thereto and a parcel thereof, the said outhouse being used as a house for storing flour, sugar, and such like articles, there situate, * * * with intent the goods and chattels of Miss Julia Buzzard, in the said outhouse then and there being, then and there feloniously and burglariously to steal." &c. In the second count all of the defendants were charged with the larceny of certain goods of the said Julia Buzzard. In the third count, the defendant Glover was charged with receiving stolen goods. In the fourth count, said Glover was charged as accessory before the fact to the burglary charged in the first count; and in the fifth count Glover was charged as an accessory before the fact to the larceny charged in the second count.

The testimony was that Miss Julia Buzzard lived with her mother, Mrs. E. A. Buzzard, the owner of the dwelling, and used one of the rooms of said dwelling as a store. The outhouse which was broken open was in the same enclosure with the dwelling, some ten or fifteen yards distant from it, and was used for no other purpose except as a place of storage for groceries constituting a part of the stock of goods of Miss Julia Buzzard. On the trial, against the objection of defendant's counsel, a witness was asked by the solicitor whether the defendant Glover was not a recognized leader among the colored people, and in response to an inquiry from the witness whether he meant a political leader, was told, "Well, if you will have it so, say whether he is a political leader; but I mean, and you so understand me, to ask whether he is not a leader in the church, politically and socially, and in everything which constitutes a leader."

The jury returned a verdict of guilty as to all the defendants, except Augustus Glover, on the first and second counts, and a verdict of guilty as to Augustus Glover on the fourth and fifth counts, saying nothing as to the third count. Thereupon the Circuit Judge said to them that he supposed, from their silence as to the third count, they meant to find not guilty as to that count; and, if so, the foreman of the jury could come up to the clerk's desk and write "not guilty" as to that count, which was accordingly done in open court. A nolle prosequi was entered as to Oliver Williams, who was used as a witness for the State; and when offered as such, his competency was objected to on the *ground that he had been convicted of manslaughter and confined in the penitentiary for eighteen months and then pardoned. Neither the record of his conviction and sentence nor the pardon was produced, and it only appeared from his own testimony that he had been so convicted and sentenced, and it also appeared by the same testimony that he had been pardoned. The other defendant, Edward Anderson, having escaped soon after he was arrested, was not on trial.

The defendants, Green Simkins, Augustus Glover, William Blocker, Thomas Smith, and William Zimmerman, appeal upon ten grounds, but as several of these grounds raise only questions of fact, over which we have no jurisdiction, they need not be further noticed. The second and third grounds complain of omissions in the charge as to certain points upon which the Circuit Judge was not requested to instruct the jury, and therefore present no questions for us to adjudicate.

The fifth ground imputes error to the Circuit Judge in admitting testimony as to the "political standing" of the defendant, Augustus Glover. The language of this exception does not properly represent the nature of the testimony objected to. Properly speaking, there was no testimony as to the political standing of Glover, for, as the Circuit Judge very properly remarks, no testimony was given which would show the political party to which the accused belonged. Inasmuch as he was charged with being an accessory before the fact, and as such with having counselled and procured the offence to be committed, it was manifestly pertinent to inquire whether he had obtained such an influence over his fellows as would render it probable that he could induce them to do the act in question; and this appears to have been the sole object of the testimony—to show that he was a leader among people of the class to which he and the other defendants belonged. While, therefore, we could not too strongly condemn the introduction of political feeling or prejudice into the trial of causes in the courts of justice, we cannot say that there was any error of law in admitting testimony tending to show that a person charged as an accessory before the fact possessed such influence amongst the people of his class as would *render it likely that he would be able to induce others to do that which perchance he might be unwilling to do himself.

The sixth ground raises the question of the competency of Oliver Williams to testify, by reason of his having been convicted of a felony. If the record of the conviction and sentence of this witness had been offered, then it would have been necessary to produce like evidence of his pardon. But inasmuch as the only evidence of such conviction and sentence was derived from the witness's own testimony, accompanied with the statement that he had been pardoned, it seems to us that his whole declaration should have been taken together, from which it appeared that his competency to testify had been restored by a pardon, and therefore we think there was no error of law in permitting him to testify.

The seventh ground of appeal complains of error in allowing the jury to reform their verdict after they had returned from their room. It is quite clear that there is nothing in this ground, for, as is said in State v. Corley (13 S. C., 5), "The power of the court to allow a jury to correct informalities in their verdict before it is recorded, and before the jury have dispersed, is undoubted." Where, as in this case, the correction is of a mere informality, this may be done in open court as well as by sending the jury back to their room.

The ninth ground raises the question as to the competency of the confessions of Edward Anderson, one of the parties charged in the indictment. It being well settled that the confessions of one of several defendants can only be received as evidence against himself (State v. Workman, 15 S. C., 540), and Edward Anderson not being on trial, there was no error in excluding his confessions. If offered in favor of the other defendants, they could not be received under the rule excluding hearsay evidence.

The tenth ground imputes error to the Circuit Judge in refusing to charge as follows: "Where a witness testifies on the stand, the jury are the sole judges of his honesty and veracity, and are not bound to take everything he may say as true, unless they do believe with good reason that he is telling the truth." In response to this request, "the jury were told that they were the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses; that they were to *reject what they believed to be untrue and accept only what they believed to be true; and the request as framed was refused only because it held the jury bound to accept testimony as true, or reject it as incredible, for reasons of a particular nature and quality—for good reason." The law does not fetter the jury by imposing so stringent a rule upon their grounds of belief." In view of the very stringent provisions of our constitution, which forbids the judges from charging juries "in respect to matters of fact," we cannot say there was any error in refusing to charge in the language of the request. The jury were properly told that they were "the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses," and it would have been an invasion of their exclusive province if the Circuit Judge had gone further and undertaken to instruct them as to the kind of reasons which ought to influence them in reaching a conclusion as to a question of which they were the sole judges.

The only remaining inquiry is that presented by the first ground of appeal, which is in these words: "Because, as matter of law, no burglary was committed under the proof, and it was misdirection in the court so to charge." It appears from the statement hereinbefore made that the house which was broken into was an outhouse, and though within the same enclosure, and but a few yards distant from the dwelling-house, there is no evidence whatever tending to show that it was appurtenant to the dwelling. It does not appear that it was used for any purpose connected with or contributory to the dwelling-house. On the contrary, the undisputed testimony is that it was used for no other purpose but as a place of storage for the goods of Miss Julia Buzzard, who was not the owner of the dwelling, and who was merely permitted to use one of the rooms of the dwelling, in which she resided with her mother, as a store, and that there was no internal communication between the outhouse and the dwelling-house. The most that can be said of it, therefore, is that it was a store, and as there is no pretence that any one slept in the outhouse, it is clear, under the authority of the case of State v. Ginns (1 Nott & McC., 583), recognized in State v. Evans (18 S. C., 137), that it is not burglary to break and enter such a house in the night time with intent to commit a felony. Nor *can the case be brought within the provisions of the statute enlarging the limits within which burglary may be committed. For, as held in State v. Evans, supra, it is not only necessary that the house broken into should be within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house, but it must also be appurtenant to it. See also State v. Sampson, 12 S. C., 567 [32 Am. Rep. 513]. Hence, though the house here in question was within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house, yet, as it was not appurtenant to it, the case cannot be brought within the provisions of the statute. Upon this ground, therefore, there must be a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

STATE v. CLARY.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Burglary ⚭46; Criminal Law ⚭772.]

In charging the jury, the judge is not compelled to define a criminal offence in the very words of elementary writers. Burglary was properly defined in this case to be the breaking into a dwelling-house in the night time with a view to commit a felony; especially so, as other parts of the charge showed that the word view was used as synonymous with the word intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. ⚭46; Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1816; Dec. Dig. ⚭772.]

[2. Burglary ⚭2; Criminal Law ⚭27.]

Petit larceny is not made a misdemeanor by our statute (Gen. Stat., § 2498) unless it be also a simple larceny. Breaking into a dwelling-house and stealing therefrom an article of less value than $20, is compound larceny, and therefore a felony as at common law; and breaking in at night with intent to steal such article is burglary.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Johnson, 45 S. C. 488, 23 S. E. 619.

For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-3; Dec. Dig. ⚭2; Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 29-31; Dec. Dig. ⚭27.]

[3. Criminal Law ⚭419, 420.]

On a trial for burglary, defendant cannot prove that one W., on the night of the crime, had applied to the witness to borrow money, promising to return it in corn—which was the article stolen by the burglar—such testimony being hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 973; Dec. Dig. ⚭419, 420.]

Before Fraser, J., Aiken, April, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Devore & Woodward, for appellant.

Mr. James Aldrich, acting solicitor, contra.

*January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. As well as we can gather from the extremely meagre statement of facts contained in the "Case" as prepared for argument here, we understand that the defendant was convicted of burglary, under the statute, in breaking and entering a corn house, within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house, in the night time, and stealing therefrom a small quantity of corn, of the value of less than twenty dollars. On the trial, appellant offered to prove certain declarations made by one Jack Williams to two of the witnesses, for the purpose of raising the presumption that he, and not the defendant, was the guilty party. These declarations were to the effect that on the night the burglary was committed, said Jack Williams applied to these two witnesses to borrow some money and pay them in corn, and not to the effect that he was the guilty party. The Circuit Judge, in his charge to the jury, instructed them that "burglary is the breaking into and entering a dwelling-house of another in the night time with a view to commit a felony." He also said to the jury that "it has been contended in argument here that the defendant could not have intended to steal twenty bushels of corn, as he had made no arrangements for carrying out such a purpose. That is not necessary in a case like this. Where the larceny is from the dwelling-house or the person, the old common law applies, and not the statute, as to what amount constitutes a felony."

The defendant appeals substantially upon three grounds. 1st. Because the Circuit Judge erred in defining burglary to be the breaking and entering a dwelling-house in the night time "with a view" to commit a felony, whereas he ought to have said "with intent" to commit a felony. 2nd. Because he erred in saying to the jury in effect that it was immaterial whether the property stolen, or intended to be stolen, exceeded or was less in value than the sum of twenty dollars. 3rd. Because of error in refusing to admit the declarations of Jack Williams.

As to the first ground of appeal, we have only to say that we know of no rule of law or reason which requires a Circuit Judge, in defining a criminal offence, to use the precise words employed by elementary writers in giving the definition of such criminal offence. If he explains to the jury in plain language the elements necessary to constitute the offence charged, it is quite sufficient; and this we think was done in this case. To say that a certain thing was done with a view to commit a felony, is the same thing as to say that it was done with intent to commit a felony. In the connection in which the word "view" was used, it is manifestly synonymous with the word "intent"; and we cannot believe it possible that even the plainest mind could have been misled by its use. Indeed, in a subsequent part of the charge the judge in effect declared that he used the word "view" as synonymous with the word "intent," for he said: "If a man breaks into a house at night with the view or intention of committing a felony, and if he is stopped the very moment he gets in, or runs away before he puts his hands upon a single thing, he would be guilty, if the criminal intent was there to commit a felony." It is quite clear, therefore, that the first ground of appeal cannot be sustained.

The second ground seems to have been taken under a misapprehension of the distinction between simple and compound larceny. Our statute does not make every petit larceny a misdemeanor, but only simple larceny. Gen. Stat., § 2498. Where, therefore, the larceny in question is aggravated by some special circumstance which renders it compound, the provisions of the statute do not apply, and the offence remains, as at common law, a felony, and is not reduced to the grade of a misdemeanor. Hence, where a person breaks and enters a dwelling-house in the night time with the intent only to steal a particular article of a less value than twenty dollars, and actually steals such article, his intent is to commit not merely a simple but a compound larceny, and it is, therefore, entirely correct to say that his intent is to commit a felony and not merely a misdemeanor.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the competency of the declarations of Jack Williams. He was clearly a competent witness, and we do not see how it was possible to admit his declarations without violating the rule as to hearsay testimony. The fact that

Williams was in the neighborhood of the place where the burglary was committed about the time it was committed was allowed to be proved, but his declarations were no more competent than those of any other third person. See the case of State v. Terrell (12 Rich., 321), where, in a much stronger case than this, the declarations of a third person were held inadmissible.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Aiken, October, 1884.
The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Croft & Dunlap, O. C. Jordan, for appellant.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., contra.

January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On the 30th day of April, 1884, plaintiff and defendant executed an agreement, styled an "agricultural lease and lien," prepared on a printed form, whereby *plaintiff agreed to lease to the defendant a certain tract of land until December 31, 1884. Immediately following that part of the agreement which provided for the lease, were the following printed words, which were erased before the paper was signed, to wit: "And said lessor agrees to make advances to the lessee during the current year, in money or supplies, to be used and expended in the cultivation of such soil; the said advances not to exceed in all the sum of dollars." The agreement then proceeds as follows: "And the lessee, on his part, agrees to pay to the lessor, as rent for the same, ten bales of good lint cotton, averaging in weight four hundred and fifty pounds, and to return all the cotton seed used by him, with ten bushels per hundred additional, which shall become due and payable on or before the 1st and 15th days of October, A. D. 1884, at ———." And then follows the following words in print: "And it is agreed that, to secure payment of said rent, and the repayment of said advances, the lessor shall have an agricultural lien on the crop produced on said land during the year, and all the remedies to enforce the same as provided by law."

The ten bales of cotton, as rent, seems to have been paid, and there is no controversy as to that; but a dispute having arisen as to the cotton seed to be returned, the plaintiff, on the fifteenth day of October, A. D. 1884, made an affidavit before the clerk that the defendant was indebted to him "for twelve hundred bushels of cotton seed advanced by the said G. P. Segler to the said G. G. Coward for agricultural purposes for the year 1884;" that "to secure said cotton seed," said Coward executed to said Segler an agricultural lien on his crop in accordance with the provisions of "an act to secure landlords and persons making advances," and that said Coward "refuses to pay said cotton seed with intent to defeat said lien." Upon this affidavit the clerk issued his warrant to the sheriff, requiring him "to seize the said crop, and, after due notice, sell the same for cash, and pay over the net proceeds thereof, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay for twelve hundred bushels of cotton seed, to G. P. Segler, or order, together with the costs of these proceedings." Under this warrant the sheriff, on October 16, 1884, seized and took into his possession 250 bushels of corn, more or less, and 300 *bushels of cotton seed, more or less, of the crop of the defendant.

Thereupon the defendant, on October 21, 1884, gave notice that he would move before his honor, Judge Hudson, at chambers, for an order "vacating the warrant of seizure herein, and requiring the release of the property taken thereunder by the sheriff." At the hearing before Judge Hudson the plaintiff submitted additional affidavits, wherein, amongst other things, it was stated "that the said defendant, before the issuing of the warrant herein, was about to defeat the lien herein by making way with and by selling the crops covered by said lien, and by refusing to pay the plaintiff. That there was due the plaintiff at the time of issuing said lien twelve hundred bushels of cotton seed, worth the sum of two hundred and forty dollars." The judge, after hearing argument, granted an order "that the warrant of seizure herein made by the clerk of the court for Aiken County, of date October 21, 1884, be vacated and set aside, and that the levy made by the sheriff of said county be released," assigning as his reasons for so doing: "1st. The affidavit is fatally defective, in that it does not show that any steps by the tenant have been taken to defeat the lien. Simple refusal to pay does not impair nor defeat a lien. 2d. The contract of lease contains no clause setting forth such an agreement as constitutes the prerequisite to the special statutory lien. A mere promise to return cotton seed in kind is not such an agreement for advances as will support or create the statutory lien for advances. Persons expecting the benefits of the statute must comply with its requirements."

From this order the plaintiff appeals, substantially, on four grounds: 1st. Because his honor erred in holding that the original affidavit upon which the warrant was issued was fatally defective. 2d. Because, even if the original affidavit was fatally defective, yet the defects were supplied by the plaintiff's supplementary affidavit offered at the hearing, and his honor erred in not so holding. 3d. Because of error in holding that "the contract of lease contains no clause setting forth such an agreement as constitutes the prerequisite to the special statutory lien." 4th. Because his honor was without jurisdiction to hear this motion at chambers.

*We will first consider the fourth ground of appeal. This ground does not appear to have been taken in the court below, and ordinarily it could not, for this reason, be considered here. But as it presents a question of jurisdiction, which may be raised at any time, we will proceed to its consideration. Section 402 of the Code of Procedure provides that "motions may be made to a judge or justice out of court, except for a new trial on the merits;" and as this was clearly not a motion for a new trial on the merits, we think that the statute, in terms, authorized it to be heard at chambers.

As to the first ground of appeal, we agree with the Circuit Judge that the original affidavit was fatally defective in that it contained no statement to the effect that the defendant was about to sell or dispose of his crop, or that he had done, or was about to do, anything else which would defeat the lien. A simple statement that the defendant refused to pay what the plaintiff alleged to be due was certainly not sufficient. The statute never was designed to operate as an expeditious mode of collecting money, but its manifest purpose was to prevent the lienor from taking any steps to defeat the lien provided for, by placing the property beyond the reach of the lien. The warrant was not intended as a substitute for an ordinary execution, and hence until it is shown by affidavit that the lien is about to be defeated by the removal or disposition of the property, the lienor must, like all other creditors, pursue the ordinary means for enforcing payment of his debt, and cannot avail himself of the very stringent and summary remedy provided by the act.

We think also that the affidavit was fatally defective in not stating the amount due under the alleged lien. This the act expressly requires and very properly requires, for without a statement of the amount then due, the sheriff would have no means of ascertaining how much property it would be necessary for him to seize or how much to sell. The original affidavit only stated that Coward was indebted to Segler for twelve hundred bushels of cotton seed, without any statement whatever as to their value, and in the absence of such statement who was to determine the amount that the sheriff was required to collect?

As to the second ground of appeal, we do not see how the supplementary affidavit submitted by the plaintiff at the hearing could supply the defects in the original affidavit. The question before the judge was whether the warrant was lawfully issued, and as the act only makes it lawful for the clerk to issue the warrant when it shall be proved by affidavit to his satisfaction, "that the person to whom such advances have been made is about to sell or dispose of his crop, or in any other way is about to defeat the lien hereinbefore provided for, accompanied with a statement of the amount then due," if he undertakes to issue such warrant without the affidavit required, his act in so doing is clearly unlawful, and it cannot be rendered lawful by any subsequent showing which in this case was not made to the clerk, but to the judge who was called upon to determine the lawfulness of the act of the clerk in issuing the warrant.

The argument that the remedy provided by section 2404 of the General Statutes is exclusive of all other remedies cannot be maintained. That section only purports to provide a mode by which the lienor may regain possession of his crop after it has been seized, and applies as well to a lawful as to an unlawful seizure, and does not purport to afford the means of setting aside a warrant unlawfully issued.

But what is perfectly conclusive to our minds is that we do not think that there was any lien given or intended to be given for anything but the rent, and that the agreement to return the cotton seed used was an independent covenant, for the breach of which an ordinary action would lie, but which could not be enforced under the provisions of the lien law. The agreement of the parties being in writing, its proper construction and intent must be determined by the terms used. The very fact that the printed words in the form used, which contained an agreement on the part of the lessor to make advances to the lessee in money or supplies, to be used in the cultivation of the land leased, were erased, is conclusive to our minds that the parties did not intend that any advances were to be made or secured by any lien; and the fact that in a subsequent part of the agreement the printed words are found, "that to secure the payment of said rent, and the repayment of said advances, the lessor shall have an agricultural lien," &c., is not inconsistent with such conclusion, for the words* which we have italicised in the last preceding quotation were manifestly intended only to be effective where the preceding covenant to advance constituted part of the agreement. This is evident not only from the use of the words, "said advances," but also from the whole frame-work of the instrument. So that where, as in this case, the preceding covenant to advance has been erased, the subsequent words above italicised become wholly ineffective. It is difficult to conceive why the parties should have deliberately erased the words providing for advances to be made by the plaintiff to the defendant, unless it was their intention that no such advances were to be made. And when to this is added the fact that the claim now made for advances is only for the cotton seed, which the agreement provided should be returned in kind, we cannot resist the conclusion that the effort now made to bring this claim under the provisions of the lien law is altogether an afterthought, and that no such purpose was in the contemplation of the parties when the agreement was executed.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be affirmed.

January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendants in the above cases became subscribers to the stock of the Edgfield, Trenton & Aiken Railroad Company to the amount of five hundred dollars ($500) each, by signing a paper, of which the following is a copy: "We, the undersigned, citizens of Aiken and Edgfield Counties, agree to subscribe the amount set opposite our names to the stock of the Edgfield, Trenton & Aiken Railroad (to be paid either in cash or work), provided that the line of said road run on the east side of Shaw's Creek;" the defendants with others having subscribed said paper, with $500 set opposite their names respectively. This paper passed into the hands of the plaintiff, after the consolidation of the Edgfield, Trenton & Aiken Company, first into the French Broad and Atlantic Railway Company, and *then into the plaintiff company. After which the actions below were brought on said subscription.

The complaint of plaintiff alleged that the terms of the subscription had been fully complied with by the previous companies and the plaintiff, and that although the amount subscribed had become due and payable when the line of said road was run and located on the east side of Shaw's Creek, and that defendants had been requested to pay their subscriptions, upon which payment stock would be issued, yet that defendants had neglected and refused to pay the same, except that defendant, Seigler, had paid the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars; wherefore the plaintiff prayed judgment in the case against Seigler for the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, and in the case against Henderson for the sum of five hundred dollars, and for costs and disbursements.

The answer of Seigler admitted the execution of the paper in suit, also the merger and consolidation of the railroad companies as set forth in the complaint, and relied principally upon a defence, that when he signed the paper, he was induced to believe by the parties who circulated said paper that the line of the Edgefield, Trenton & Aiken Railroad would run on the east side of Shaw's Creek to, or near to, the Steedman & Weeks mill on said Shaw's Creek, which was partly owned by this defendant, which it was alleged had not been done, and that it was upon this representation alone that defendant signed said paper. He also set up a counter claim for the repayment of the one hundred and fifty dollars paid by him on his subscription, on the ground that when he paid the same, it was upon the express and renewed promise of the president of the company, Mr. Lewis Jones, that the line of said road was to run on the east side of Shaw's Creek to, or near to, the Steedman & Weeks mill, &c.

The complaint in the case against Henderson is a copy of the complaint against Seigler, except that there is no payment alleged on the $500 subscription; and the answer of Henderson is a copy of Seigler's answer except that no counter claim is set up.

At the trial certain evidence was introduced by the defendants, to be more particularly noticed hereafter, which constitutes the grounds of appeal here, with an exception also to a portion of the charge of his honor, the presiding judge. The verdict having *been rendered for said defendants, the following are the grounds of plaintiff's appeal:

That his honor erred in overruling plaintiff's objection to the defendants introducing evidence to show:

I. Where the land of defendants and others, who signed the subscription paper, the cause of action, was situated in reference to the railroad, as located and graded on the east side of Shaw's Creek.

II. In allowing evidence as to what the defendant, A. S. Seigler, said was his understanding of the meaning of the subscription paper at the time he made the payment thereon. Also, in allowing evidence as to what Seigler said at the time of said payment to the president of the railroad company, and as to statements and promises alleged to have been made by Lewis Jones, as such president, made at the time of said payment, as to what the railway company had done and would do.

III. In allowing defendants to introduce evidence to show that since the consolidation of the said railway company into the plaintiff's corporation no work had been done by plaintiff toward grading of the road-beds.

IV. In allowing the defendants to introduce evidence to show when and where certain experimental lines were run by surveyors under their direction and at their request.

V. To show location of the lands through which A. S. Seigler and others gave the right of way.

VI. As to the declarations of Lewis Jones as to his views, as to where the said road should run, his reasons sustaining his views, and effect it would have upon the road and adjacent land owners.

VII. As to assurances of Lewis Jones made after the subscription paper was executed and delivered to the Edgefield, Trenton & Aiken Railroad Company as to where the road would be located.

VIII. Evidence to show the nature of the country through which the Gardner survey was made.

IX. In allowing Augustus Cochran to testify as to the declarations of Lewis Jones, made to him while at work upon the road as an employé of the company, in regard to locating the line of the road by Seigler's mill.

*X. That his honor erred in charging the jury, "That the acceptance of the paper and adoption of the line of road should have been in a formal writing, or some formal manner."

It is a general rule of evidence, long since established and now well settled, that parol testimony cannot be introduced to vary, add to, or alter a written instrument, which in itself is plain and free from doubt. The parties themselves having reduced their contract to writing, they are supposed to have done so in part, at least, with the view to exclude everything else but the writing itself in determining their contract, which writing must be interpreted by the court according to certain well established rules not necessary to be here considered. This rule, it will be observed, is directed only against the admission of any other evidence of the language employed by the parties in making the contract, than that which is furnished by the writing itself. 1 Greenl. Evid., § 277. It, therefore, does not prevent the writing from being read in the light of surrounding circumstances, if need be, in order the more perfectly to understand the intent and meaning of the parties. The writing, however, being the act and instrument of the parties finally and solemnly agreed upon, no other words than those found therein can be added to it or substituted in its stead by oral testimony. Nor can oral testimony of a previous colloquium, or of conversation or declarations at the time when completed, or afterwards, be offered to explain it. On the contrary, the instrument must stand upon its own terms.

In looking at the terms of an instrument, however, doubts may arise, first, as to the proper signification to be given to the words used, and, second, as to the application of the instrument to external objects. An example of the first class of cases is where the words used are susceptible of a double signification, having a plain and ordinary meaning when used generally and yet a technical meaning when used with reference to particular trades or branches of business. An example of the second is where the language of the instrument is applicable to two or more subjects or objects, raising a latent ambiguity, and therefore necessitating an inquiry de hors the instrument for a subject-matter to satisfy said instrument. In both of these classes of cases, under certain rules and restrictions, oral testimony is admissible, of the surrounding circumstances, including the situation of the parties and their relations to persons and things around them, with the view to enable the court, called upon to interpret the paper, to reach its true meaning and intent; and this, as is said by Mr. Greenleaf (Vol. 1, § 288), without any infringement of the general rule, stated above, that parole testimony is inadmissible to vary, add to, or contradict a written instrument, that rule being confined to the exclusion only of all parole testimony of any other language, showing the meaning of the parties, than that used in the instrument itself.

In other words, the effect of the rule is, that while the court, in endeavoring to reach the true meaning and intent of an instrument before it, is confined to the terms used, excluding all testimony intended to add to, omit, vary, or contradict said terms, yet where the terms are doubtful in either of the senses referred to above, then oral testimony—not of the understanding of the parties, one or more, or of their declarations or conversations at the time or afterwards in reference thereto, but of the facts and circumstances surrounding them and connected with the transaction—may be admitted, so that the contract may be read in the light of such surrounding circumstances. There are some other cases, too, mentioned by Chancellor Wigram in his seven propositions found in that admirable treatise of his on the interpretation of wills, where, under certain circumstances, oral testimony is allowed bearing upon a written paper; but they have no application here, and therefore need not be considered.

Now, let the exceptions in this case, as to the evidence admitted below, be tested by the above principles. In the first place, are the terms employed in the instrument in suit doubtful in either of the senses mentioned above, and therefore requiring the admission of oral testimony as to matters de hors said instrument to remove said doubt? The terms are contained in the proviso, and are as follows: "Provided, that the line of said road run on the east side of Shaw's Creek." Are these words susceptible of a double signification, or can it be claimed that they are applicable to more than one subject? Not so. The words are plain, and have but one meaning, and there is no claim that there are two creeks named Shaw's, requiring evidence outside of the paper showing which was meant and where a line on the east side should run. There was no room, then, for the admissibility of oral testimony to clear away the doubts mentioned, as no such doubts existed, or could exist in a paper so plain and unambiguous.

The first exception complains that his honor erred in admitting testimony by the defendants to show where the lands of defendants lay with reference to the line of the road located on the east of Shaw's Creek. What was the object of this testimony? Was it not to show that defendants subscribed with the understanding that the road was to run not only on the east side of this creek, but to, or near to, these lands? If this was not its object, it was entirely irrelevant, and therefore inadmissible; and if this was its object, did it not tend to add other words to the instrument than those found therein? It is urged by respondent, however, that this exception cannot be considered, because the evidence referred to was admitted without objection below. But appellant claims that he did object, and he refers to the folio in the "Case" where his objection appears, especially folios 62 and 152. On examination of these folios, an objection is found entered. True, the precise point raised is not very distinctly made, but yet there is enough stated, we think, to sustain appellant that objection was made to the introduction of the testimony in question.

Exceptions 4, 5, and 8 object to the evidence showing that certain experimental lines had been run under the direction and at the request of the defendants; also the location of the lands through which defendant Seigler and others had given the right of way; and also the nature of the country through which the Gardner survey was made. That in reference to the experimental lines was abandoned, because no objection was interposed at the trial. The other two, however, have been insisted upon, and we think the objection to these must be sustained on the same ground as the first exception discussed above. We can see no purpose for the introduction of this testimony but to sustain defendant's allegation in his answer that the line of the road, as he understood, was to run not only on the east side of Shaw's Creek, but to, or near to, his property, the Steedman & Weeks mill. This was the main defence relied on by the defendant, and this in effect was claiming that the paper in suit needed additional terms than those found therein to show the contract of the parties; and the evidence objected to must have been intended to supply these terms, which is the very thing the rule of evidence referred to above absolutely forbids. If this testimony was not intended to have the effect suggested, and therefore incompetent, then it was wholly irrelevant, having no application whatever to the case, and on that account incompetent. Upon the whole, we may say that the main question before the court as to the paper in suit being its interpretation and construction, and that paper being plain and unambiguous in terms, both as to the meaning of the words employed therein and as to their application, it was incompetent to admit any oral testimony intended to aid in said interpretation, the rule being in such cases that the paper alone must govern.

Exception 2 raises a question of competency as to what defendant "Seigler said was his understanding of the meaning of the subscription at the time he made the alleged payment thereon, also in allowing evidence as to what he (Seigler) said to the president of the road at that time, and as to what the president then said as to what the railroad company would do or had done." A payment by Seigler was alleged in the complaint. It seems that this payment was made to Mr. Lewis Jones, the president, and in his testimony for the plaintiff he was allowed to state the facts connected therewith. The testimony of the defendant objected to in the above exception seems to have been in reply to this testimony of Jones, in which the defendant gave his version of what occurred at this payment as a part of this transaction; and in reply, we think it was competent.

Exception 3 objects to testimony tending to show that no work had been done by the plaintiff toward grading the road. One of the questions in the case was whether the line had been permanently located. The testimony objected to, it seems to us, was pertinent to that issue and therefore competent.

Exceptions 6 and 7 object to certain declarations of Mr. Jones, the president of the company. These declarations were brought out in the testimony of the defendant Seigler, and were made, as he testified, in connection with the payment by him on his subscription. As a part of that transaction, and explanatory thereof, they were competent. They could not, however, affect the original paper or be used in any way in the interpretation of said paper.

Exception 9 seems to have been founded upon a misconception as to Cochran's testimony. We have not found in the case any evidence from him in which the declarations of Jones were stated as to the location of the line of the road by Seigler's mill. On the contrary, such declarations seem to have been expressly excluded.

The tenth exception is founded upon a single sentence or expression in the charge of the judge, which, standing alone, might possibly be objectionable, to wit: "That the acceptance of the paper and adoption of the line of road should have been in a formal writing or some formal way." When this sentence, however, is considered in connection with other portions of the charge and with the whole charge, in which, after explaining what was meant by acceptance and what by location of the line, he left both on this matter to the jury as questions of fact, we cannot say that this sentence should be regarded as error.

Certainly so much of the testimony as was admitted in the case of Seigler, in connection with the payment by him on his subscription, was incompetent in the case of Henderson, as he, Henderson, had made no payment on his subscription, nor had any conversation with Mr. Jones on this subject.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment below, in both cases, be reversed on the ground of the incompetent testimony herein above mentioned, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

FULLER v. PORT ROYAL & AUGUSTA RAILWAY CO.

COCKRANE v. SAME.

(November Term, 1885.)

[Railroads ⌘ 447.]

In an action against a railroad company for killing a horse, the defendant requested the judge to charge the jury: "That when the plaintiff proves the ownership and the fact of the killing, he makes out a prima facie case, and negligence is presumed; but when the defendant introduces evidence and explains the fact of the killing, the plaintiff is required to prove by a preponderance of testimony that the defendant was negligent." Held, that this charge was properly refused, as the rule in Danner's Case (4 Rich., 329 [55 Am. Dec. 678]) makes the proof of ownership, and the fact of killing, prima facie evidence of negligence, which prima facie showing must therefore stand until overthrown by counter proof.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Joyner v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 26 S. C. 56, 1 S. E. 52.]

For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1645; Dec. Dig. ⌘ 447.]

Before Fraser, J., Hampton, March, 1885.

These were two actions against the defendant, tried together, for killing, in each case, a horse, one being brought by Henry M. Fuller and the other by Jack Cockrane. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Elliott & Howe, for appellant.

Mr. C. J. C. Hutson, contra.

January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. These two cases, being based very much upon the same facts, were tried together below, and they have been heard together in this court on appeal. The actions were brought to recover the value of a horse, in each case alleged to have been killed by a train of defendant company in October, 1882.

At the close of the testimony his honor, the presiding judge, was requested by the counsel of the defendant to charge the jury: "That when the plaintiff proves the ownership and the fact of the killing, he makes out a prima facie case, and negligence is presumed; but when the defendant introduces evidence and explains the fact of the killing, the plaintiff is required to prove by a preponderance of testimony that the defendant was negligent." The judge did not charge this in terms, but read a portion of the opinion of this court in the case of Jones v. C. & G. R. R. Co. (20 S. C., 258), "saying that he could not state it any clearer than that." The portion read was as follows: "The rule in Danner's Case required him to say, when the killing was proved, that the plaintiff might rest, and if the defendant failed to explain this killing so as to exculpate the company, either by proof that the killing was accidental, unavoidable, or free from negligence, then the fact of the killing, with the prima facie case it made, was sufficient, as it furnished all the proof which the case in the first instance required." The jury found for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed upon the single exception: Because his honor erred in declining to charge as requested above.

We do not know that we understand clearly appellant's exception. We suppose, however, that it is meant that the rule in Danner's Case, which raises a presumption of negligence, upon proof by the plaintiff of ownership and the fact of killing, applies only in cases where the defendant introduces no evidence explaining the fact of the killing; that where such explanation is given by the defendant, the presumption is gone, and this, whether the explanation exculpates the defendant or not, and that in such case the plaintiff cannot rely upon the presumption, but must introduce other and affirmative evidence, showing by its preponderance actual negligence. In other words, that upon the defendant explaining the killing, the onus is then thrown upon the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of testimony other than the presumption that the defendant had been negligent; that in such case he cannot claim even the aid of the presumption, but that it is gone and out of the case, and cannot be considered in weighing the testimony.

Thus understood, the exception cannot be sustained. The issue in all of these cases is negligence, with the onus upon the plaintiff. The rule in Danner's Case is nothing but a rule of evidence, bearing upon the issue of negligence, and it has established the proposition as matter of law, that in such cases the proof of ownership and the fact of killing shall be sufficient to establish negligence prima facie. And the plaintiff in the first instance need go no further. Now, what is the effect of a prima facie showing? Does it not always stand until it is overthrown by counter proof? Does it not throw the onus of removing it upon the other party?

It is true that when the prima facie case is overthrown by counter evidence, then the plaintiff will fail to recover unless he, by the proof of additional facts, overthrows the counter evidence. But until his prima facie case is removed he may stand upon it.

The mistake in the exception, as it seems to us, turns upon the word explain. The appellant claims that plaintiff's prima facie case, when made out, requires the defendant to do nothing more than to explain the killing, which, when done, requires the plaintiff in every such case to prove by a preponderance of testimony the fact of negligence, or he will fail to recover. Now, the term explain means, to state the facts, to show all of the circumstances and conditions of a transaction, to show fully how it occurred. When this is done, as to a matter involving alleged negligence, this explanation will either inculcate the defendant, fail to exculpate him, or exculpate him. It can have no medium status. It must necessarily prove or disprove the alleged negligence. If it fails to exculpate the defendant from the prima facie showing of plaintiff, would it not be error to say that notwithstanding this failure of defendant to exculpate himself by his explanation, that still the presumption is gone and the plaintiff must introduce additional evidence, so as to show by the preponderance of such additional evidence the fact of negligence? And, on the other hand, suppose the explanation shows negligence, where, then, would be the necessity of the plaintiff supplementing his case by any other testimony than that upon which he had rested? If, however, the explanation clearly exculpated the defendant, then the presumption under which the plaintiff had rested would be removed, and he would have to act further. But up to this point could he not fold his arms in safety?

If the appellant had called upon the presiding judge to charge that in case the explanation disproved negligence, then the presumption could have no avail, but that plaintiff's case should then depend upon the preponderance of his evidence weighed with defendant's evidence; or if the judge had been requested to charge that upon the defendant introducing evidence to explain the killing, that then whether the presumption of negligence arising from plaintiff's proof of ownership and the fact of killing was overthrown, would depend upon the preponderance of the evidence, and the judge had declined to so charge, his appeal would be sustained. But this was not the request. The request *was, that in every case where the defendant explained the killing, whether his explanation had the effect of failing to exculpate, of exculpating, or inculcating the defendant, the presumption is expunged from the case, and that the plaintiff is then "required to prove by a preponderance of testimony other than the presumption that the defendant had been negligent." We can see no error in the judge declining to charge in the terms requested.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

COVAR v. SALLAT.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⚭832.]

A rehearing of the case of Covar v. Sallat (22 S. C., 265) granted, certain exceptions properly before the court having been inadvertently overlooked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3215-3228; Dec. Dig. ⚭832.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⚭819.]

Where an appeal was suspended so that appellant might move on Circuit for a new trial upon one of the issues involved, the result of which was to be certified to this court, until such certificate is furnished, the appeal cannot be heard on its merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3200; Dec. Dig. ⚭819.]

This was a motion for the rehearing of the case of Covar v. Sallat (22 S. C., 265), under the order permitting such motion to be found appended to the judgment then rendered.

Mr. P. A. Emanuel, for the motion.

Mr. D. S. Henderson, contra.

January 5, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This is a petition for a rehearing of the above case by this court, on the ground that certain exceptions which the appellant had been allowed to add by way of amendment to those originally filed, had been overlooked by this court in the judgment recently rendered, and which judgment the petition seeks to open. On April 28, 1885, this court, after considering the petition, ordered it to be set down for argument on the first day assigned for the hearing of cases from the *second Circuit next ensuing.¹ This argument has been heard, and the court now being satisfied that the exceptions referred to in the petition were overlooked by this court in its recent judgment, deems it proper to open the same and to reinstate the case upon the docket.

It is not necessary here to explain how it was that these exceptions were overlooked. This has been done in the order of April 28, supra, wherein it appears also that the hearing of the appeal at the term of the court was premature, this court having granted an order on January 26, 1883, continuing the case, and suspending the appeal, with leave to the appellant to apply to the Circuit Court for a new trial of the question of the payment of the bond in suit, on the ground of after discovered evidence, requiring that the result of such application should be certified to this court, which order was not brought to the attention of the court, and which, if it had been brought to its attention, would certainly have prevented the hearing of the appeal, as is manifest from the ruling of the court when the original application to suspend the appeal, as to one of the points made in the case (to wit, payment of the bond), was made.

The order of January 26, 1883, hereinbefore referred to, having expressly required that the result of the application to the Circuit Court should be certified to this court, and no certificate having yet been filed as to whether the new trial granted has been had, nor if so, what was the result, and this court not yet being informed as to said result either by the certificate from the Circuit Court, as required by the order of January 26, 1883, or otherwise, and consequently the original appeal not being ripe for hearing, it must be reinstated under the order of January 26, 1883, awaiting the final result of the application for a new trial below.

And to this end it is the judgment of this court, that the judgment hereinbefore rendered in this case, dated February 27, 1885,² be set aside, and that the case be reinstated upon the docket of this court as if no appeal therein had been heard and such judgment had been rendered.

4. A court of justice must always bear in mind that both parties to a cause have rights, and that unlimited indulgence to one will operate injustice to the other.

This was an original motion before this court, and the facts connected therewith are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. C. Davant and F. W. Fickling, for the motion.

Mr. J. J. Brown, contra.

January 25, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered

PER CURIAM. In this case a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellants had failed to serve their exceptions within the time required by law was heard by this court on November 24, 1885. At that hearing, the motion to dismiss was resisted by counsel representing the appellants upon the ground that the omission to serve the exceptions within the prescribed time was owing to the inadvertence of the counsel of record for appellants, but no motion to amend and no evidence that the omission occurred through inadvertence was presented to the court. It is true that counsel then representing appellants did ask, verbally, that the court would allow an amendment, but it did not then appear that any notice of a motion to amend had been served upon the attorney for appellants, and no affidavit of inadvertence was either served or presented. Under these circumstances, this court had no other alternative but to dismiss the appeal, and an order to that effect was accordingly entered.

On January 2, 1886, counsel for appellants duly served respondents' counsel with a notice of motion to rescind the former order dismissing the appeal and to restore the case to the docket for hearing, accompanied by affidavits setting forth fully and clearly the circumstances under which the omission to serve the exceptions occurred, and showing that it was through inadvertence. In the affidavit of the counsel of record for appellants, it is not only stated that the omission to serve the exceptions occurred through his inadvertence, but also that he "misapprehended the necessity for and requirement of an affidavit of inadvertence upon the motion of respondents' attorney to dismiss the appeal, and by inadvertence omitted to file the motion to amend and the affidavit of inadvertence," and also states that he was unavoidably absent when the motion to dismiss the appeal was heard, and hence, as it appears from the other affidavit submitted, the case was turned over to another member of the bar, who did represent the appellants at the hearing of the motion to dismiss the appeal.

The motion to restore the case was resisted by counsel for respondents, upon the ground that this court having already rendered judgment dismissing the appeal, the matter is res adjudicata; and in support of this motion cited the case of Hyrne v. Erwin (22 S. C., 587), which seems to us conclusive of the question. In that case the appeal was dismissed by the clerk for failure to file the return; and afterwards, after regular notice, the case was, on motion of the appellant, restored to the docket, respondent having failed to appear and resist said motion. The respondent afterwards moved to dismiss the appeal so restored, which motion was dismissed, the court holding that, if the default of appellant occurred since the appeal was restored, it might be considered, but it is based entirely on alleged omissions which occurred before the restoration, and which could and should have been interposed when the motion to restore was heard. The respondent, however, failed to appear when the motion to restore was heard, and the judgment of the court restoring the appeal to the docket must be regarded as res ad- judicata, and not subject to review on a motion of this kind. It was further said that even if the motion could be considered as a petition for a rehearing, there was nothing in the facts presented to authorize the court to grant a rehearing, there being no allegation that any matter of law or fact appearing in the case when the motion to restore was made had been overlooked by the court.

The case now under consideration seems to us stronger than that of Hyrne v. Erwin. There the order to restore was granted by default, as it were, the respondent not appearing when the motion was made. Here, however, both parties were represented by counsel when the motion to dismiss the appeal was made, and the motion was stoutly resisted by counsel for appellants. This court, upon a full hearing, having rendered its judgment dismissing the appeal, it seems to us conclusive of all matters which could and should have been presented at such hearing.

There is no doubt that appellants were originally in default, and we suppose there is as little doubt that if they had, before the judgment dismissing the appeal was rendered, availed themselves of the privileges conferred by the act of 1880, now incorporated in the code, and presented the showing which they now submit, they could have obtained the relief which that act was designed to confer. But this they neglected to do in the manner prescribed by that act and the rules of this court. It is true that it appears from the affidavits submitted in support of this motion that this omission also occurred through the inadvertence of counsel for appellants, inasmuch as he states that he "by inadvertence omitted to file the motion to amend and the affidavit of inadvertence." But the act of 1880 was only designed to relieve a party from the effects of an omission, mistake, or inadvertence in doing any act or acts necessary to perfect an appeal by conferring upon this court authority to permit such acts as may be necessary "to perfect the appeal" to be done even after the time prescribed for doing such acts. So that the act can only apply to a pending appeal in which such defects have been discovered as would render it necessary to have supplied in order to perfect the appeal. But after an appeal has been dismissed by the judgment of the court, there is no appeal to be perfected.

Finally, it is urged that appellants are entitled to relief under *the provisions of section 195 of the Code of Procedure, which provides that "the court may likewise in its discretion, * * * and upon such terms as may be just, at any time within one year after notice thereof, relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." It may be questioned whether this section applies to the Supreme Court, even in the exercise of its original jurisdiction; but as that question has not been argued, we do not deem it necessary to express any opinion upon it now. For even if it does apply, it cannot avail the appellants in this case, for, as was held in Steele v. Railroad Company (14 S. C., 331-2), that section was designed only "for the relief of parties who, by reason of some mistake, inadvertence, &c., may have lost the opportunity to be present at the trial, or to be represented there, as is suggested by the words, 'taken against him.' * * * If the parties are represented at the trial, they can obtain relief by an application made in conformity to the rules of procedure provided by law in reference to new trials." In this case, however, the judgment which it is sought to set aside was rendered after full hearing, the appellants being represented by able and experienced counsel, and not being a judgment by default, or rendered in the absence of appellants, section 195 of the Code does not apply.

It is always a matter of regret when parties lose their right to have their appeals heard by reason of a failure to comply with some technical rule, but it seems to us that the act of 1880, having afforded ample means of obtaining relief from the consequences of any inadvertent omission or mistake, which every one is liable to, there is no real hardship in requiring parties to use the means which the law has provided for obtaining relief from the consequences of their own omissions. A court of justice must always bear in mind that both parties to a cause have rights, and that unlimited indulgence to one will operate injustice to the other.

The judgment of this court is that the motion to rescind the order dismissing the appeal in this case be refused.

*STATE v. HUTCHINGS.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Criminal Law ⇨678.]

A party cannot be convicted on one indictment of more than one offence; where the evidence discloses two assaults at different times upon independent quarrels, the solicitor should be required to elect the assault on which he rests.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Howard, 32 S. C. 94, 10 S. E. 831.

For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 114; Criminal Law Dec. Dig. ⇨678.]

[2. Criminal Law ⇨369.]

A second assault upon the prosecutor by one of the defendants on a new quarrel afforded no evidence of his complicity with the other defendants in a first assault committed some time before, in which he took no part.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822-824; Dec. Dig. ⇨369.]

[3. Assault and Battery ⇨96.]

The assault and battery having been committed upon the prosecutor while he was advancing upon the defendant, the defendant was entitled to have the jury charged upon the law of self-defence.

[4. Criminal Law ⇨826.]

The request to charge in this case should have been considered by the Circuit Judge, it having been made before the jury retired, although not before the arguments or charge.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, November, 1884.

This was a prosecution of Benjamin F. Hutchings, John Q. Roark, and William W. Baswell, for assault and battery with intent to kill, and of a high and aggravated nature. The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. L. Wait, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Orr, contra.

February 13, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This opinion cannot be made intelligible without a short outline of the facts. It was an indictment for assault and battery upon the person of J. Washington Goodgion, and contained two counts; one with "intent to kill and murder," and the other charging an assault and battery of "a high and aggravated character."

The Forks Shoals Factory belongs to John H. Latimer, trustee, James H. Latimer, and Mrs. Fannie A. Goodgion, in common; the two Latimers owning one-half, and Mrs. Goodgion (wife of the prosecutor) the remainder.

It seems that the parties *could not work together agreeably, and some arrangement was made by which the different parties were to have possession and operate the factory one after the other, according to their respective shares. James H. Latimer was running it at the time the alleged assault and battery was committed, and he had given orders to the superintendent, B. F. Hutchings, not to allow the prosecutor, J. W. Goodgion, to come into the mill.

On the day of the difficulty Goodgion entered the mill, and Roark, an employé, who had received orders not to admit him, requested him to leave the mill, and, upon his refusal, took hold of him and carried him out into the public road. In the meantime a lad, Smith, seeing the scuffle ran down and informed Hutchings and Baswell that Roark and Goodgion were fighting in the cloth room, and they, with the other employés, rushed to see what was going on. As soon as Goodgion (now in the road) saw Hutchings, he shook his stick at him and dared him out. Hutchings declined to go, but said to him that he must not come back into the house. Upon that Goodgion said he would return, and when he was in the act of opening the gate, Hutchings struck him over the head a severe blow with a stick, which knocked him down. At that time Baswell neither said nor did anything, but simply looked on. Afterwards the wife of Goodgion came, and they together went in and through the mill, staying some time. The witnesses differ as to the time, but some of them say over two hours. While they were in the mill some words about a different and independent matter took place between Goodgion and Baswell, in which Goodgion gave the lie to Baswell, and the latter shook his fist in his face, &c.

The defendants requested the judge to charge, "that unless the jury find that there was collusion between the defendants to commit an assault upon the prosecutor, they cannot be held jointly responsible for the separate assaults alleged to have been committed by the defendants individually at different times, and the solicitor must elect for which assault he will try them." The judge refused to charge as requested. At the close of the charge one of the defendants' counsel requested his honor "to charge the jury that they could consider whether Hutchings acted in self defence, and if the jury believed that he struck Goodgion in *defence of himself, then they should find him not guilty." This request was also refused, the judge saying he thought he had charged the jury enough.

The jury found John Q. Roark not guilty, and Hutchings and Baswell guilty on the second count, and the appeal comes to this court upon the following grounds:

I. Because his honor erred in failing and refusing to charge the jury that unless they found collusion between the defendants to commit an assault upon the prosecutor, the defendants could not be held jointly responsible for the separate assaults alleged to have been committed by the defendants individually at different times, and the solicitor must elect for which assault he will try them.

II. Because his honor erred in failing and refusing to compel the solicitor to elect for which assault the defendants should be tried, and allowing the case to go to the jury upon three separate assaults that had been sworn to.

III. Because his honor erred in failing and refusing to charge the jury that they could consider the plea of self-defence made by the defendant, Hutchings, and if they believed that he struck the prosecutor in self-defence, then they should find him not guilty.

IV. Because his honor erred in refusing to grant a new trial.

It is not at all clear as to what was the ground upon which Baswell was convicted of an assault and battery committed by Hutchings. Three defendants were charged with the same offence. The evidence disclosed two offences, one by Hutchings at the gate, and the other by Baswell in the mill. The jury acquitted Roark, one of the three defendants, but convicted both Hutchings and Baswell of the assault at the gate. As the jury seemed to negative the charge of collusion by acquitting Roark, who actually carried the prosecutor out of the house, it is not perceived upon what ground Baswell was convicted, unless it was on account of the separate assault made by him in the mill.

An indictment may contain two or more counts, but as we understand it a party cannot be convicted on the same indictment of more offences than one. Hence, when the evidence discloses two separate offences, on the same day, they should not be combined in such way as to secure one conviction; but in that case the practice is to require the prosecuting officer to elect upon which he rests the case of the State. Now, if the purpose was to charge Baswell upon the subsequent assault in the mill as a distinct and substantive offence, it was error in the judge to refuse to require the solicitor to elect on which assault he rested. State v. Sims, 3 Stro., 138; State v. Nelson, 14 Rich., 172 [94 Am. Dec. 130].

But if, as contended, the subsequent assault of Baswell was not charged as a distinct offence, then proof of it could only have been offered as evidence bearing upon the first assault; and it seems to us that there was no such necessary connection between the two assaults as that the commission of the latter by Baswell afforded evidence of his complicity in the former. That of Baswell was some time after that of Hutchings, and, as we understand, upon a new and independent cause of quarrel, the old struggle to keep the prosecutor out of the house having terminated. Baswell was a mere employé. It did not appear that he ever knew that orders had been given to keep the prosecutor out of the mill. When the lad, Smith, gave the information that Roark and Good-gion were fighting in the cloth room, he, with the other employés, ran to see what was going on. He does not seem either by word or deed to have taken any part in the assault and battery, of which he has been convicted. If, as alleged, he committed an assault on the prosecutor in the mill, he is answerable for that; but we are unable to see in that alone such evidence of collusion with Hutchings as to make him responsible for the much more serious offence committed by another at the gate.

Besides, as the only blow given was inflicted on the prosecutor while he was advancing with a stick, it seems to us that Hutchings, who inflicted the blow, was entitled to have the jury charged upon the law of self-defence. It is true that the request so to charge was not made in writing before the argument; but it was made before the jury retired, and we think was substantially within rule XI. of the Circuit Court as amended, which reads as follows: "Before the argument commences the counsel on each side shall submit to the judge in writing such propositions of law as they propose to rely on, which shall constitute the requests to *charge; provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall prevent either counsel at the close of the argument from submitting such additional requests as may be suggested by the course of the argument." It is always desirable, and especially in the administration of the criminal law, that the whole case should be considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

STATE v. GWINN.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Criminal Law ⚡741.]

In the trial of a party charged with crime, it is for the jury alone to determine what force and effect should be given to the evidence of tracks and threats.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1138, 1221, 1705, 1713, 1716, 1717, 1727, 1728; Dec. Dig. ⚡741.]

[2. Arson ⚡20.]

Under the statute (Gen. Stat., § 2480), which declares that "the malicious and wilful setting fire to or burning of any barn, stable, &c., shall be deemed arson," the indictment need not refer to the location of the stable alleged to have been burned, nor charge that it was within the curtilage of a dwelling house; and where matters of location and appurtenance are alleged in an indictment under this statute, they may be disregarded as surplusage.¹

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. ⚡20.]

Before Kershaw, J., Anderson, October, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. C. C. Featherston, for appellant.

Mr. G. G. Wells, for the solicitor, contra.

February 13, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. John Gwinn was convicted of arson at the October term of the court, 1883, for the County of Anderson, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the state penitentiary "for life." The indictment charged that "John Gwinn, on the eleventh day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, with force and arms at Anderson *court house, in the County of Anderson and State aforesaid, did unlawfully, wilfully, and maliciously set fire to and burn the stable and barn of Jasper N. Pool, within two hundred yards of, and appurtenant to, a dwelling house of Jasper N. Pool, wherein Martha Pool habitually slept, whereby such dwelling house was endangered, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State aforesaid."

The defendant made motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, which being refused, he appealed at the time to this court, but the appeal was suspended to allow a motion for a new trial to be made below, upon the ground of subsequently discovered evidence. That motion having also failed, the case was heard here upon the original appeal, in which motions were made for a new trial and in arrest of judgment on the following grounds:

I. "Because his honor erred in refusing a new trial when the evidence showed that the 'dwelling house,' of which the barn and stable were alleged to be appurtenant and within two hundred yards, was not the dwelling house of Jasper N. Pool, but was occupied by another—one Martha Pool.

II. "Because the evidence failed to show by what right Martha Pool occupied said house, whether as tenant of Jasper N. Pool, or otherwise.

III. "Because there was no evidence that the barn and stable were 'appurtenant' to either the house occupied by Martha Pool or the dwelling house of Jasper N. Pool, the latter being at the distance of half a mile.

¹See next case post, page 150, State v. Moore (3).—REPORTER.

IV. "Because the evidence showed that there was a public highway running between the barn and stables and the house occupied by Martha Pool.

V. "Because there was no proof of the corpus delicti, nor of any fact showing that the burning was the result of criminal agency.

VI. "Because, as matter of law, tracks without any peculiarity, and threats, are not corroborative.

VII. "Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in not arresting the judgment, when it appeared, (1) that *the indictment was fatally defective at common law, in that it does not allege the burnt building to have been within 'the curtilage,' (2) That it was fatally defective under the statute, in that it failed to show on its face how Martha Pool occupied the house wherein she slept, whether as proprietor, tenant, watchman, clerk, laborer, or simply as one lodged there with a view to the protection of the property, (3) That it was fatally defective under the statute, in that it did not allege that the dwelling house of Martha Pool was endangered, (4) That it was fatally defective in that it alleged the dwelling house to have been the property of Jasper N. Pool, and yet alleged it in such manner as to justify the inference that he did not dwell therein."

The fifth and sixth exceptions complain merely as to alleged insufficiency of proof, which we cannot consider. It was for the jury alone to determine what force and effect should be given to the evidence of threats, tracks, &c. All the other exceptions relate to the form of the indictment, and what proof was necessary to sustain it.

We do not understand that this was an indictment for arson at the common law. Both its terms, "contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided," and the punishment imposed, show that it was under the statute. But assuming this, it is claimed for the appellant, that it was under section 2483 of the General Statutes, which declares that "with respect to the crime of burglary and arson, and to all criminal offences, which are constituted or aggravated by being committed in a dwelling house, any house, out-house, apartment, &c., * * in which there sleeps a proprietor, tenant, watchman, clerk, laborer, or person who lodges there with a view to the protection of property, shall be deemed a dwelling house; and of such dwelling house, or any other dwelling house, all houses, out-houses, buildings, sheds, and erections, which are within two hundred yards of it and are appurtenant to it, or to the same establishment, of which it is an appurtenance, shall be deemed parcels," &c.

In the view that the indictment was under this section, it was contended that it was fatally defective in several particulars, viz., that it did not distinctly allege that the house in which Martha Pool slept was either her

"dwelling house," or that of Jasper N. *Pool; nor show on its face how Martha Pool occupied it, whether as proprietor, tenant, watchman, clerk, laborer, or simply as one lodged there with a view to the protection of the property; and that proof showing that the house was the property of Jasper N., but occupied by Martha, was not sufficient to make it the "dwelling house" of either, in the sense of the statute. As we understand it, this section was not intended to originate any new offence, but simply to change the proof necessary and thereby to enlarge the field of certain well known offences, already in existence, by declaring, as to them, what shall be deemed a "dwelling house" and an appurtenance or parcel thereof. It is not necessary here to consider this section.

The indictment in this case may be considered as framed under section 2480 of the General Statutes, which provides that "the wilful and malicious setting fire to or burning any court house or other public building, whether owned by the State or a corporation, or a building owned by an individual or individuals, and kept or let for public meetings or exhibitions, barns, stable, coachhouse, gin-house, storehouse, ware-house, grist or saw mill, railroad depot, coach or cotton-factory, or other house used for manufacturing purposes, of whatever name or kind, or setting fire to or burning any house habitually used for public religious worship, shall be deemed arson, whether the setting fire to or burning be in the day or night time; and the person setting fire to or burning any such house as aforesaid, and the aiders, abettors, and accessories before the fact, shall," &c. This provision certainly created a new statutory offence; in regard to which it is only necessary that the indictment should charge one of the description of houses named was set fire to and burned, without any reference whatever to its location as being within two hundred yards or the curtilage of a "dwelling house."

All the statements of this indictment in reference to Martha Pool and the house in which she habitually slept, may be disregarded as surplusage, and that would leave in it the simple charge that "John Gwinn, on the eleventh day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, with force and arms at Anderson court house, in the County of Anderson and State aforesaid, did unlawfully, wilfully, and maliciously set fire to and burn the stable and barn of Jasper N. Pool, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State aforesaid," which is as full as the terms of the statute require. "The general rule is, that mere surplusage will not vitiate, as when an indictment for an offence at common law concludes contra formam statuti." State v. Wimberly, 3 McCord, 193, citing 1 Cowp., 683; 5 Durn. & East., 162.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[1. Indictment and Information ⚭23.]

An indictment was headed with the name of the State and county, and alleged the county in which, and the court house at which, the court was holden, and then alleged that "the jurors of and for the county of — aforesaid, on their oaths present." &c. Held, that all this was a part of the caption, which may be amended at any time; so that, even if it were proper to insert the name of the county where it was omitted, the defect would not be fatal. [This case is also cited in State v. Assmann, 46 S. C. 560, 24 S. E. 673, without specific application.]

Before Cothran, J., Abbeville, September, 1885.

*The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court. The grounds in arrest of judgment are stated in the opinion; the grounds for a new trial were as follows:

1. Because it was error in the presiding judge to refuse to allow the defendant to offer evidence of his pecuniary circumstances, the direct tendency of such proof being to show that he had no motive for the commission of larceny, and the theory of the State being that he first stole the goods of the prosecutor and then burnt the gin house to conceal the theft.

2. Because it was error in the presiding judge to allow the solicitor to argue to the jury, against the earnest protest of the defendant, that the defendant had, for some time before the night of the burning, been stealing the cotton of the prosecutor out of his gin house, although there was no evidence on that point, and although the defendant was being tried for arson only.

3. Because it was error in the presiding judge to allow the solicitor to persist, in spite of the earnest protest of the defendant, in stating to the jury that the witness, Lipscomb, said that when he was at defendant's house about the last of October, 1884, defendant told him that he had no more cotton left, when in point of fact the solicitor utterly misconceived the witness, Lipscomb's testimony, his statement being that defendant told him if he had come one day later, he would have been through, without saying through what.

4. Because it was error in the presiding judge to charge the jury that it was possible for the prosecutor to identify cotton in the possession of the defendant.

5. Because it was error in the presiding judge to charge the jury that it was possible for the prosecutor to identify a basket in the possession of the defendant, and that if they believed that the prosecutor had identified the basket, they might infer from that and the other facts claimed to be proved that the defendant burnt the gin house.

6. Because the evidence was totally insufficient to base a verdict of guilty upon, and it was error in the presiding judge to charge the jury that they might convict the defendant upon the evidence offered by the State.

*7. Because the said verdict and judgment are contrary to the law and the evidence.

¹See State v. Gwinn (2), ante, page 146.—REPORTER.

Mr. E. G. Graydon, for appellant.

Messrs. M. L. Bonham, jr., and W. C. McGowan, contra.

March 8, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant was tried for arson at the September extra term of the Court of General Sessions for Abbeville County. He was found guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for the term of ten years. Before sentence, his counsel moved in arrest of judgment on account of alleged defects in the indictment, and also for a new trial, both of which motions were overruled. These motions are renewed here by way of appeal.

The indictment was as follows:

"The State of South Carolina.—Abbeville County.

"At a Court of General Sessions, begun and holden in and for the County of Abbeville, in the State of South Carolina, at Abbeville court house, in the county and State aforesaid, on Monday, the second day of February in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, the jurors of and for the County of — aforesaid, in the State of South Carolina aforesaid, that is to say, upon their oaths, present that John Moore, on the fourteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred eighty-four, with force and arms, in the County of Abbeville and State aforesaid, did wilfully and maliciously set fire to and burn the gin house of Francis Arnold, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State aforesaid."

On the motion in arrest of judgment below, it was urged that the indictment was fatally defective, because: 1st. That no county was mentioned in the indictment as the county of the jurors, the word "Abbeville" being left out, as above. 2d. That it was not alleged that the offence was committed at Abbeville court house. 3d. That it was not alleged that the offence was committed "feloniously," the word "felonious" having been omitted. 4th. That it was not alleged that the gin house was within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house. 5th. It was not alleged to be "appurtenant" to the dwelling. 6th. That it was not alleged to be within the curtilage. 7th. No allegation that it was an out-house of the prosecutor. And 8th. That it was not alleged to be a parcel of the dwelling, "the proof offered having shown that the said gin house was within two hundred yards of, and appurtenant to, the said dwelling-house."

An indictment consists of three prominent features, (1) the caption, (2) the charge, and (3) the conclusion. The caption is the heading to the indictment, and is not strictly a part of it. State v. Williams, 2 McCord, 301; Vandyke v. Dare, 1 Bail., 65. Only in that sense the expression above, that it is one of its features, is used. It has been defined to be that part of the record in a criminal case which comprehends the judicial history of the cause to the time of the finding of the indictment. Bish. Cr. Proc., ch. XI., § 147. It is an entry record, showing when and where the court is held, &c.

There has been some contrariety of opinion as to where the caption ends and the indictment begins, and especially whether the words, "The jurors, &c., on their oaths, present," constitute a part of the caption or a part of the indictment. In England and in many of the States following the English practice, these words are termed the "commencement" of the indictment, and not considered to be a part of the caption. But in our State it has been distinctly held that they are part of the caption; that it is mere introductory matter, and constitutes no portion of the indictment. In the case of State v. Creight (1 Brev., 169 [2 Am. Dec. 656]), Trezevant, J., said the caption ends with the words, "upon their oaths, present," and Grimke, J., said (p. 170), "It was resolved, in an earlier unreported case (State v. James Johnston), that the part of the indictment here in question was a part of the caption."

Now, the caption being no part of the indictment (State v. Williams, supra), and the omitted word here, "Abbeville," being a part of the caption (State v. Creight, supra), it follows that the law in reference to defects in the caption, and not the rule in reference to the charging part or the conclusion, should govern where objection is made on account of alleged defects. And it must be remembered that the rules in such cases are quite different. In reference to the charging part, the law is extremely strict, requiring the closest observance to established forms and precedents, and demanding a complete description of such facts and circumstances as constitute the crime, without inconsistency or repugnancy. Manner, time, and place must be alleged, and even particular words and phrases sometimes, though they may seem technical, must be used.

This strictness is, however, not required in reference to the caption, the distinction in the two cases being that the charging part is really the matter which the accused is called upon to meet and answer, while the caption is a mere history or record of the case, up to the finding of the indictment, containing the name of the court, county, and State, and where and by whom the indictment has been found. It is important for the accused to be informed fully as to the crime with which he is charged, so that he can prepare for his defence; so that he can be shielded against a second trial for the same offence; and it is important, too, to the court that the crime charged should be set out with great particularity, so that, in looking at the record, it may decide whether the facts charged constitute an offence within its jurisdiction, whether a conviction will warrant punishment, and what the punishment shall be. These reasons, however, do not apply to the caption, and, accordingly, as we have said, the rule as to the caption is much more liberal than as to the charging part of the indictment. It was held in the case of State v. Creight, supra, that the caption may be made up or amended at any time, &c. The opinion in that case was based upon the case of State v. Johnston, supra, in which a motion was made in arrest of judgment on several grounds, one of which was that the caption did not mention either the day or the year when the court was held, at which the bill was found. The court unanimously overruled the motion.

In the case of State v. Williams, supra, a similar motion was made on the ground that it was not set out in the caption, that it was a "special court." The court said: "The caption must set forth with sufficient certainty the court in which, the jurors by whom, and also the time and place at which, the indictment was found, so that it might appear on the face of the indictment that the court had jurisdiction of the offence, that the jurors were *sworn, and that the court was holden at the proper time." But in regard to the omission complained of, it said further: "There is no doubt, however, about the right to amend the caption of an indictment at any time, and leave is therefore granted to amend." And in Vandyke v. Dare, supra, the court held and said: "The caption is no part of the indictment, &c.; setting out the style of the court, the time at which, the names of the jurors, &c., may be amended at any time by the journals of the court"—further saying: "It has become so much a matter of course, that it is usually left in blank until some occasion occurs which renders its perfection necessary, and then leave is obtained for filling it up as a matter of course." These cases have been referred to to show that even if the word "Abbeville," which is omitted here, ought to have been inserted, yet that the defect is not fatal; it may be inserted afterwards.

But is the omission of this word a legal defect? We think not; because, though the word itself does not appear, yet in substance and proper intendment it is there. As we have seen, the caption of an indictment in this State does not end until it reaches the words, "upon their oaths do present." Down to that point, all the preceding part constitutes the caption. When the County of Abbeville, then, is used in the preceding part, and when immediately following comes "the jurors of and for the County of——aforesaid," is not that in substance saying the County of Abbeville? 1 Saund., 308, note 1, cited in State v. Lamon, 3 Hawk. [10 N. C.], 178. And would it not be a subtle distinction indeed to hold otherwise? See the case of State v. Coleman (8 S. C., 243), a case of murder, and where the defect complained of was in the body of the indictment, the charging part, and yet it was not held fatal. See Reyes v. State, 20 Ala., 33.

The next objection is that the offence was not alleged to have been committed at "Abbeville Court House." The purpose in alleging the place is to show that the court has jurisdiction; or, at least, this is one of its purposes. True, the usual form is, as demanded by this exception, and according to strict and usual form it is admitted that the words "Abbeville Court House" should have been inserted. But the question is, is its omission fatal where the proper county is alleged? Is it imperatively *necessary that both a town and a county shall be mentioned? Where the place is not a matter of essential description of the crime, but is alleged as a matter of jurisdiction only in the court, the reason of the rule, it seems, would be satisfied with us by an allegation of the county simply, as our courts have jurisdiction over the respective counties in which they sit.

In the early times of the common law jurors were considered as witnesses, and no others were summoned or expected to be heard as witnesses except the jurors. They were sworn to speak the truth, and they were expected to speak from their own knowledge and not from the testimony of others. Hence the practice of summoning jurors from the immediate vicinage. And hence, too, so as to enable the court to issue a proper venire for proper jurors, it was necessary for the record to disclose the place where the offence occurred, to wit, a particular locality in the county. After the jurors ceased to be witnesses, and therefore there was no longer any necessity for the assignment of a particular locality, so far as summoning the jurors was concerned, still the practice of naming a town or ville was kept up, and in this way the present form of indictments with us, in which the court house of the county is usually named as the place of the offence, has been adopted.

The old practice, however, in England was altered by certain statutes, and Mr. Bishop says that the "effect of these statutes seems pretty plainly to have been in England to change the common law rule, and leave it unimportant for the pleader to allege any place of the commission of the offence other than the county." He further says: "In the United States the matter stands substantially as it did in England after the enactment of statute 6 Geo. IV., ch. 50, § 13. There is believed to be no State in the Union wherein the jurors are summoned de vicinato, but in all the States they come de corpore comitatus, from the body of the county, not from the immediate neighborhood in which the offence was committed. And the general rule in our States, therefore, is that there is no need for the indictment to allege the particular township or other like locality within the county where the offence was committed. It may simply allege it to have been committed within the county which it mentions, without more *words." Bish. Cr. Proc., § 93. And at section 97 he says: "Some of the particular instances in which it has been held not essential to mention more than the county in the indictment are murder, affray, &c."—citing Studstill v. State, 7 Ga., 2; Dillon v. State, 9 Ind., 408; and State v. Lamson, 3 Hawk. [10 N. C.], 175. See our case of State v. Thayer, 4 Strobl., 286. It seems to be conceded in most of the States that in misdemeanors the mention of a town is not necessary, but in some of the States, in indictments for capital felonies, it appears to be necessary, or, at least, the practice has always been adhered to, as stated in Com. v. Springfield, 7 Mass., 9. We are of opinion, however, that although this practice is usual, yet its omission, the defect complained of here, was not fatal. See case of State v. Fant, 2 Brev., 487.

The other grounds assigned for the motion in arrest of judgment may be considered together, and we say generally that the offence with which the accused was charged, and of which he has been convicted, was a statutory offence (Gen. Stat., § 2480), making the wilful and malicious setting fire to or burning any house, &c., * * * specifying certain houses, among them gin house, &c., a crime. Whether said house be within the curtilage, appurtenant, or a part of the dwelling or otherwise, still it is the crime made by the act, if wilfully and maliciously done. Such being the fact, we think when the indictment charges the burning or setting fire to as wilful and malicious, specifying the house, as here, and the county, that the offence has been fully, fairly, plainly, and substantially set forth, and also as formally as the act requires.

As to the motion for a new trial, we find nothing in the grounds relied on to warrant a reversal of the Circuit Judge's order on that subject. The testimony offered in regard to the pecuniary condition of the accused was irrelevant and incompetent, and therefore properly excluded. The fact that the Circuit Judge said to the jury that it was possible for the prosecutor to identify cotton and a basket, &c., was no error of law, if error at all. Nor was it error of law to permit the solicitor to give his version of the facts to the jury, even if he stated the testimony incorrectly in the opinion of the other side.

*It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

24 S. C. 158

TOWN COUNCIL OF BEAUFORT v. OHLANDT.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Jury ⇨ 11.]

The charter of the town of Beaufort provides that "the intendant of said town is hereby vested with all the power and jurisdiction given to trial justices of this State, and may hold court for the trial of violations of town ordinances, and may punish by fine or imprisonment in his discretion, or both." Held, that a person charged before the intendant with a violation of an ordinance of the town, was entitled to a trial by jury, as in a trial justice's court, and the same right of appeal to the Court of General Sessions.

2. State ex rel. Burton v. Williams, 11 S. C., 288, affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Beaufort, September, 1885.

The defendant, John Ohlandt, being on trial before the intendant of the town of Beaufort, for a violation of an ordinance of said town regulating the sale of liquors, demanded a trial by jury, which was refused. Upon his conviction and sentence, he appealed to the Court of General Sessions, upon the ground that the intendant erred in refusing him a trial by jury. The Circuit Judge reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a trial by jury, if the same should be demanded. The order of the judge is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Elliott & Howe, for appellant.

Mr. W. J. Whipper, contra.

February 13, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Respondent was tried and convicted in the intendant's court for violating certain ordinances of the town of Beaufort and sentenced to pay a fine of twenty-five dollars. He appealed to the Court of Sessions on two grounds: 1st. Because the intendant erred in refusing his demand for a trial by jury. 2nd. Because the judgment of the intendant was *contrary to law and evidence. The Circuit Judge held, on the authority of State ex rel. Burton v. Williams (11 S. C., 288), that respondent was entitled to a trial by jury, and remanded the case to the intendant's court for a trial by jury if demanded. From this judgment the town council appeals upon two grounds: 1st. Because the Court of Sessions has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a sentence imposed by the intendant of the town of Beaufort. 2nd. Because respondent was not entitled to a trial by jury in the court of the intendant of the town of Beaufort.

We regard both of the questions raised by this appeal as concluded by the decision of this court in the case relied on by the Circuit Judge; but as we have been called upon to review that decision, we will add a few words in vindication of the doctrines there laid down.

A brief review of the legislation of this State in reference to the charter of the town of Beaufort may not be out of place as an introduction to the consideration of the questions involved. By the original charter of the town of Beaufort, granted in 1803 (8 Stat., 218), the government of the town was vested in an intendant and six wardens, with power to make all such by-laws, rules, and regulations as may to them seem necessary for the security, welfare, peace, and good order of the town, to impose fines for offences against such by-laws, not exceeding eighty dollars for any one offence, which fines, when they exceed thirty dollars, shall be recovered in the "District Court of Beaufort," and when they are less than the sum of thirty dollars, "before the intendant and wardens, or any four of them." That act also provided that "the said wardens, or any four of them, shall meet * * * to hear and determine all small and mean causes, agreeably to the directions of the act of the general assembly, and all other matters of complaint arising within the said town."

The act of 1816 (8 Stat., 275) continued in force the foregoing act for the term of fourteen years, and provided for the establishment of a court of record "for the hearing and determining all cases of a civil nature arising within the limits of the said town of Beaufort, * * * possessing concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Common Pleas," to the amount of fifty dollars, "exclusive of costs, and with jurisdiction for the trial of all offences against the by-laws of said town, which court was to be held by a recorder, appointed by the town council, and "all issues in the said court shall be tried by a jury according to the regulations and forms prescribed by law in cases of trial by jury." And the right of appeal in all cases to the Circuit Court was provided for.

No other material changes in the charter of said town appear to have been made until the act of 1872 (15 Stat., 136) was passed, which, amongst other things, provided that the intendant and wardens, constituting the town council of the town of Beaufort, "shall have power and authority, under their corporate seal, to ordain and establish all such rules and by-laws and ordinances * * * for preserving peace, health, order, and good government" within the limits of said town as they may deem expedient and proper; "and the said council may affix fines for offences against such by-laws and ordinances, * * * but no fine shall exceed thirty dollars, and when fines shall exceed twenty dollars, the same to be collected as fines and penalties in trial justices' courts." By the act of 1874 (15 Stat., 647) the charter of the town of Beaufort was further amended by declaring: "That the intendant, or acting intendant, of said town is hereby vested with all the power and jurisdiction given to trial justices of this State, and may hold court for the trial of violations of town ordinances, and may punish by fine or imprisonment in his discretion, or both."

Under this last act appellant claims that the intendant is invested with two separate and distinct powers. 1st. Those of a trial justice. 2d. With the power to hold court for the trial of violations of town ordinances, and to punish offenders for such violations "by fine or imprisonment, in his discretion, or both." The act contains no limitation as to the amount of the fine or the length of the imprisonment which may be imposed, except the discretion of the intendant; and hence, if the view contended for by the appellant should prevail, the very extraordinary result would follow that a single individual had been invested with power to impose fines unlimited in amount and imprisonment for an unlimited period. It is true that the ordinance under which *respondent was tried does provide "a penalty of not less than ten nor more than one hundred dollars, or imprisonment for not less than ten nor more than thirty days, or both, in the discretion of the intendant, for a violation of any section of said ordinance," but the act of 1874, under which jurisdiction is claimed, does not limit the power of the intendant, in the fine or imprisonment imposed, to the provisions of the ordinance.

Indeed, our attention has not been called to any act, or to any provision in the charter of the town of Beaufort, which authorizes the town council to impose imprisonment for any term whatever as a penalty for the violation of any of its ordinances. On the contrary, the last preceding act (1872) above cited, expressly provides that "no fine shall exceed thirty dollars;" and furthermore declares, probably in view of the decision in Zylstra v. Charleston (1 Bay, 382), that "when fines shall exceed twenty dollars, the same to be collected as fines and penalties in trial justices' courts," where parties could, if they so desired, obtain the benefits of a trial by jury. Now, as it is quite clear that a municipal corporation has no powers except such as are conferred by its charter, and as it does not appear that any power to imprison for a violation of any of its ordinances has been conferred upon the town council, or even to impose a fine beyond a prescribed limit, it would seem to follow that the powers conferred upon the intendant of the town of Beaufort by the act of 1874 could only be exercised as a trial justice, with his jurisdiction so enlarged as to enable him to try all offenders against the ordinances of the town, and to impose either fines or imprisonments, or both, within the limits prescribed to trial justices.

This is the necessary construction of the act in order to make it harmonize with well settled principles and preserve the right of trial by jury and the right of appeal, so carefully guarded by the provisions of the constitution. Section 19 of article I. of the Constitution provides that "all offenses less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of one hundred dollars, or imprisonment for thirty days, shall be tried summarily before a justice of the peace, or other officer authorized by law, on information under oath, without indictment or intervention of a grand jury, saving to the defendant the right of appeal."

*Besides this general provision securing the right of appeal from all inferior courts, it seems that in every instance where such a court is specially provided for, the framers of the constitution again provided in express terms for the right of appeal. See art. IV., §§ 19 and 24, in reference to county commissioners and justices of the peace. So in section 11 of article I. of the Constitution, it is expressly declared that: "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." Exactly what is the scope and effect of this declaration it is not necessary now to determine, as this and the other constitutional provisions above referred to are only mentioned for the purpose of showing that the framers of the constitution seem to have carefully guarded the right of trial by jury and the right of appeal, and therefore, before a court can allow either of these rights to be infringed or denied, it must be satisfied that the legislature has, by some constitutional act, clearly denied or limited these rights.

Now, if the act of 1874 should be regarded as conferring upon the intendant of the town of Beaufort all the powers of a trial justice, and, in addition thereto, constituting the intendant an independent municipal court for the trial of all offenders against the ordinances of said town, then the act fails to define or limit the jurisdiction of such municipal court as it is necessary to do; for it is quite clear that a municipal court can only enforce such ordinances as are passed in accordance with law, and, as we have seen, there does not appear to be any act conferring the authority on the town council of Beaufort to impose as a penalty for the violation of any one of its ordinances anything more than a fine of thirty dollars, and yet the act under consideration purports to give, to what is claimed to be a municipal court, the power to impose fine or imprisonment at its discretion, or both. But if the act of 1874 be construed, as we think it should be, to confer upon the intendant all the powers and jurisdiction of a trial justice, with the additional power of trying all violations of the ordinances of the town of Beaufort, then no such difficulty can arise; for if, as trial justice, he tries offenders against the ordinances of the town, he may, as such, impose fine or imprisonment to the extent of the jurisdiction of a trial justice. It seems to us, therefore, that there was no error on the part of the Circuit Judge in entertain*ing the appeal from the judgment of the intendant's court, and no error in holding that the respondent would be entitled to a trial by jury if demanded.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

TOWN OF LEXINGTON v. WISE.

SAME v. BANKS.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Municipal Corporations ⇨636.]

The charter of the town of Lexington provides, that the intendant and wardens, or a majority of them, shall be vested with all the powers of a trial justice in this State in all cases of violation of any ordinance of the said town. Held, that the town council of Lexington, in the trial of offenders against the town ordinances, can only exercise the powers conferred by law upon trial justices, and are subject to the same limitations.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Larkins, 44 S. C. 363, 22 S. E. 409.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1402; Dec. Dig. ⇨636.]

[2. Municipal Corporations ⇨641.]

Therefore, the accused in such trial has the right to trial by jury, if demanded, and that the testimony be taken down in writing and subscribed by the witnesses, and upon conviction, the right of appeal to the Circuit Court.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in City Council of Greenville v. Eichelberger, 44 S. C. 355, 22 S. E. 343; City Council of Anderson v. Fowler, 48 S. C. 12, 13, 25 S. E. 900; Town of Batesburg v. Mitchell, 58 S. C. 564, 571, 37 S. E. 36.

[3. Municipal Corporations ⇨636.]

The legislature having made this provision for the trial of persons accused of violations of the ordinances of the town, instead of creating a strictly municipal or police court for the trial of such offenders, the courts cannot declare such provision to be against public policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1402; Dec. Dig. ⇨636.]

Before Hudson, J., Lexington, September, 1885.

This was an appeal from the following judgment:

The questions raised on these appeals are: 1st. Whether the Circuit Court has appellate jurisdiction. 2d. Whether at the trial below the defendant was entitled to trial by jury if demanded. Upon the authority of the case of State ex rel. Burton v. Williams, 11 S. C., 289, I decide both questions in the affirmative, and therefore order and adjudge, that the sentence of the inferior court be set aside and a new trial awarded to the defendants in each of the above stated cases. The testimony should, upon the new trial, be taken in writing, and subscribed by witnesses, as the law requires.

*Mr. George T. Graham, for appellant.

Messrs. Meetze & Muller and J. Brooks Wingard, contra.

February 13, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, involving the same principles, were heard and will be considered together. The defendants were tried by the town council of Lexington for a violation of certain ordinances of said town. Upon their trial they each demanded a trial by jury, and that the testimony of the witnesses be taken down in writing and subscribed by them. Both of these demands were refused, and the defendants were convicted and sentenced, the one to pay a fine of five dollars, or be confined in the guard house for eight days, and the other to pay a fine of ten dollars, or be confined in the guard house for twenty days. They each paid their fines under protest, their bonds to abide the determination of their cases in the Circuit Court having been tendered and refused, the town council holding that there was no appeal from their judgment to the Circuit Court. The Circuit Judge, upon the authority of the case of State ex rel. Burton v. Williams (11 S. C., 288), held that the defendants had the right of appeal, and that they were entitled to a trial by jury if demanded; and that the testimony of the witnesses should be taken down in writing and subscribed by them as the law requires.

The town of Lexington appeals substantially upon the following grounds: 1st. That the Circuit Judge erred in entertaining the appeal. 2d. That he erred in holding that the defendants were entitled to a trial by jury. 3d. In holding that the testimony of the witnesses should be taken down in writing and subscribed by them.

It is quite clear that a municipal corporation, as well as its officers or agencies, has no powers except such as are conferred by the charter creating such corporation. The town of Lexington was incorporated by the act of 1881 (17 Stat., 662), and the seventh section of that act declares: "That the intendant and wardens, or a majority of them, duly elected and qualified, shall, during their term of office, be vested with all the powers of a trial justice or justice of the peace in this State, in all cases of violation of any ordinance or ordinances of the said town." From this it is manifest that when the town council of Lexington undertake to try an offender against any of their ordinances, they can only exercise such powers as are conferred by law upon a trial justice, subject, of course, to such limitations and restrictions as are imposed upon that officer. It is not, and cannot be, denied that where a person is brought before a trial justice for trial, that he is entitled to a jury if demanded, and that the testimony of the witnesses must be taken down in writing and subscribed by them, and that upon conviction there is a right of appeal to the Circuit Court. This being so, it necessarily follows that a person brought before the town council, who are only invested with the same powers as a trial justice, is entitled to the same privileges.

It is argued that it is against public policy to allow the right of trial by jury and the right of appeal to persons charged with a violation of the ordinances of a town, as it is important to the peace and good order of the town that such offenders should be dealt with summarily. That, however, is a consideration which would be more properly addressed to another department of the government, whose province we have no right or desire to invade. Our sole duty is to construe the law as we find it written. If the legislature has seen proper, instead of creating a strictly municipal or police court, with well defined powers and jurisdiction, to confer upon the town council of Lexington, for the purpose of enforcing its ordinances, the same powers as have been conferred upon a trial justice, we are bound so to declare the law when a proper case is made before us, calling for such declaration.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in each of the cases above stated, be affirmed.

24 S. C. 165

SKINNER v. HODGE.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Pleading ⇐ 250.]

An action having been instituted by the heirs of a mortgagor for the recovery of the mortgaged land, the Circuit Judge erred in withdrawing the case from the jury, and directing the complaint to be amended so as to make the case an action to redeem the mortgaged premises, as by such amendment the claim of the plaintiffs was changed, and a new and different cause and kind of action substituted.

2. Such order being erroneous, all subsequent proceedings, orders, and decrees under the amended complaint must fall with the erroneous order.

Before Pressley, J., Clarendon, October, 1880.

The appeal in this case was from the several orders and decrees stated in the opinion, but the decision passes upon Judge Pressley's order only, which was as follows:

This is a case of trespass to try title. Plaintiffs sue as heirs at law of James D. Skinner. He had mortgaged the land in his life-time, and defendant bought it at a sale by the commissioner in equity, under a decree of foreclosure of said mortgage, but James D. Skinner had not been served with process in that case. Defendant desired to go into proof that he was estopped in that matter by his knowledge of, and presence at, said sale, making no objection to the same. I did not permit said testimony, but withdrew the case from the jury, because, in my opinion, the defendant being, at the least, entitled to all the rights of the mortgagee, and being in possession of the mortgaged property, the right of plaintiffs, if any therein, could not be tried in the form of trespass to try title, but only by an action to redeem.

It is therefore ordered, that plaintiffs, on payment of the costs of amendment, have leave within thirty days from the filing of this order to amend their complaint as they may be advised, so as to conform their action to that of a complaint to redeem the mortgaged property. If said complaint be not so amended, then defendant has leave to enter judgment of non-suit.

After the filing of this order and a subsequent decree of Judge Thomson, in March, 1881, the defendants gave the following notice: "Please take notice, that upon the final determination of said case in said court, the defendant will appeal to the Supreme Court of said State from the order of Judge Pressley, filed, on December 16, 1880, allowing the plaintiffs to amend their complaint from trespass to try title to an action to redeem; as also *from Judge Thomson's order, filed March 11, 1881, overruling the defence of equitable estoppel."

After the final decree of Judge Fraser, in July, 1885, the defendants gave notice of appeal, and filed exceptions, of which the first was as follows: "I, Defendant Hodge excepts to the first order of his honor, Judge Pressley, on the ground that it was ultra vires, and because it is not a lawful order. And defendant Hodge submits that no costs having been paid thereunder, no amendments could have been made, and all proceedings since are illegal, null, and void."

Messrs. Moise & Huggins, for appellants.
Mr. Jos. F. Rhame, contra.

February 13, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs, respondents, brought action, as heirs of James D. Skinner, to recover the possession of certain real estate. Skinner had mortgaged the land in his life-time, and the defendant, Hodge, bought it at a sale by the commissioner in equity, under a decree of foreclosure of said mortgage. In this proceeding, James D. Skinner had not been served with process, but he was present at the sale, and did not object thereto. At the hearing before his honor, Judge Pressley, the fact that Skinner had not been served with process was developed, and the defendant proposed to go into proof that he was estopped because of his knowledge of, and presence at, the sale, making no objection. His honor declined to permit this testimony, and withdrew the case from the jury, because, as he states, "in his opinion the defendant at the least being entitled to all the rights of the mortgagee, and being in possession of the mortgaged property, the rights of the plaintiffs, if any, therein could not be tried in the form of trespass to try title, but only by an action to redeem." He thereupon ordered that plaintiffs, on payment of the costs of amendment, have leave within thirty days from the filing of the order to amend their complaint as they may be advised, so as to conform their action to that of a complaint to redeem the mortgaged property, and if said complaint be not *so amended, then the defendant has leave to enter judgment of non-suit.

From this order the defendant gave notice of appeal upon the final termination of the case. Afterwards the case came on for hearing before his honor, Judge Thomson, who states in his decree, that the case being called for trial, and the defendant's counsel being willing that it should be heard, upon the ground of equitable estoppel, without, however, waiving other grounds of defence, to which plaintiffs' counsel agreed, it was heard upon that question, to wit, Did the record of foreclosure, with the oral testimony submitted, exhibit a case of equitable estoppel? Upon this question, his honor decreed adversely to the defendant, adjudging "that the defence of equitable estoppel was inapplicable to the case, and that the same be overruled." From this decree the defendant gave notice of his intention to appeal, upon the final determination.

After this, the case came before his honor, Judge Hudson, who, referring to the order of his honor, Judge Pressley, and that in pursuance thereof the plaintiffs had amended the complaint so as to convert the action into one to redeem, to which the defendant had answered, in which he had interposed several defences, viz., that the plaintiffs had not complied with the order of Judge Pressley as to the payment of the costs; that there was a defect of parties, in that the plaintiffs had failed to make the personal representatives of James D. Skinner and of his deceased wife, Sallie Skinner, parties, and also one John N. Brown, to whom the defendant, Hodge, had sold a part of the land; also the estoppel relied on; and holding that he had no power to review those matters which had been previously judicially determined by his predecessors, proceeded to consider such points as he regarded open and undetermined, and decreed, in substance, 1st, that the plaintiffs had the right to bring an action to redeem; 2d, that the representatives of James D. Skinner and of Sallie, his deceased wife, were not necessary parties, the said Sallie having died testate, bequeathing her interest to the plaintiffs, and no administration having ever been taken upon the estate of James D. Skinner; 3d, that the clerk of the court, as successor to the commissioner in equity, and John N. Brown, who had purchased a part of the *land from Hodge, should be made parties; and, 4th, that to entitle the plaintiffs to redeem, they should not only reimburse Hodge and Brown the money paid for the land, but also for all taxes and other expenditures in maintaining and improving the premises, and, in addition, that they should pay to the mortgagees the entire balance due on the mortgage debt after the sale of the land, with the costs of the proceedings—the plaintiffs having the right, however, to offset against the aforesaid items of payment such rents and profits as Hodge and Brown may have realized by their possession of the land, or the sum total of the value of the use and occupation thereof, if they have not realized rents and profits.

He further held that the complaint was not fatally defective on account of the fact that plaintiffs had not offered in their complaint to pay the mortgage debt and the other expenses enumerated, having alleged that Hodge had realized enough rents and profits to pay the mortgage debt and said expenses, which, if upon an accounting proved not to be the case, the plaintiffs should make good the deficiency; and, further, that redemption would not be decreed until plaintiffs should do all that the law required of them, whether they had offered to do so in their complaint or not; finally decreeing that the complaint could not be dismissed for the defects complained of by the defendant Hodge, and that it should be retained, with leave to the plaintiffs within thirty days to take the necessary steps to bring in as parties John N. Brown and the clerk of the court as defendants, on failure of which the complaint to be dismissed with costs.

After this, the case came up again before his honor, Judge Pressley, who, by consent of attorneys on all sides, ordered a reference, directing the referee to state the accounts between the several parties in manner and form following; "1st. That he take an account of the rents and profits which have accrued to the defendant, John J. Hodge, respectively for the use, occupation, and enjoyment of the premises described in the complaint and every part thereof, and the amount realized by the said John J. Hodge from the sale of said premises to the defendant Brown. 2nd. That an account be taken of the amount due on the said bond and mortgage, and of any sums expended on the property, or for taxes and improvements by the defendants, and of the *share of the proceeds of said bond and mortgage, to which the heirs of the said James D. Skinner are entitled, if any. 3rd. That the referee ascertain what costs or counsel fees the defendants have become liable for or paid in the defence of this action, with leave to report any special matter, and upon the coming in and confirmation of this report, the action may be brought on for final determination."

In due time the referee made his report, which came before his honor, Judge Witherspoon, with numerous exceptions from the defendants, upon the hearing of which the judge found it necessary to recommit the case to the referee, with instructions as to certain matters therein. From this decree the defendants gave notice of an appeal, upon the ground that his honor erred, in matter of fact, "in stating that the referee had allowed defendants interest upon the purchase money, which he had not done; and in matter of law, in holding that rents and profits drew interest, which, it is respectfully submitted, they do not draw, being in lieu of interest themselves, and are not liquidated demands on which interest would run." The defendant, Brown, also gave notice of an intention to appeal, upon the ground, "that his honor overruled the exceptions taken to the referee taking account of the rents and profits realized by Brown, when his co-defendant, Hodge, had been charged with the amount of purchase money received of Brown, so that if Brown has to account for rents and profits, and Hodge for the purchase money paid by Brown, there will enure to the plaintiffs double returns from same land, to wit, the purchase money and interest thereon, and the rents and profits. The referee not having credited John N. Brown with the amount of money paid by him to Hodge, and interest thereon, there can be no basis for an accounting by Brown for rents and profits on such land, and no order for such has been made in the cause."

The referee made a second report under the order of Judge Witherspoon, which came up with exceptions before his honor, Judge Fraser, who, after stating the history of the case up to that time, and the questions which in his judgment had been adjudicated in the many orders and decrees already pronounced in the case, gave a final decree, overruling

the most important exception *of the defendant, in which he objected to the finding of the referee fixing the rental value of the premises at $100 per annum, this being fixed as the rent of the dwelling-house on the plantation separate from the rents and profits of said plantation, and decreeing that the deed from the commissioner in equity to the defendant Hodge, and of defendant Hodge to Brown, were void, except for the purpose of protecting their rights under the decree; that the plaintiffs had the right to redeem on payment to the clerk of the court of the sum of $401.01, with interest, and in case the plaintiffs should not make such payment, then that the land should be sold by the sheriff, the proceeds, after the payment of the expenses of sale, to be turned over to the clerk of the court, $401.01 of which was to be held by him, as if paid in by the plaintiffs, and to be paid out as follows, to wit, $303 as costs, $60 as a fee to the defendants' attorneys, and the balance to the defendant Brown; all over the sum of $401.01, of the proceeds of said sale to be paid to the plaintiffs and the guardians of the minors. The plaintiffs to pay their own costs and those of the clerk of the court, together with the costs of Hodge and Brown, already provided for. From this decree the defendants gave notice of intention to appeal, with exceptions.

The case is a complicated one, and its history is long and tedious. The main question involved, however, in our opinion, arises upon the first order pronounced in the case by his honor, Judge Pressley. This meets us at the threshold, and must be first disposed of. We do not mean to say that the other questions raised to the several subsequent orders are not important, but from the view which we take of the case, they cannot arise in its consideration here. In our opinion, the order of his honor, Judge Pressley, changing the case from an action at law to recover possession of the land, to an action in equity to redeem was erroneous, and, therefore, that all subsequent proceedings have been unwarranted, rendering it unnecessary to consider the questions involved in said proceedings, as they cannot be said to properly arise in the case.

The practice under the code is quite liberal as to amendments, in furtherance of justice, and this court is in full accord with this spirit of the code. But the code itself places a restriction to said *practice, which, it seems to us, has been disregarded in the order in question. Section 194 of the Code provides: "That the court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process, or proceeding by adding or striking out any name of any party, or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defence, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved." This section is the authority for the courts in reference to amendments, and while it is quite extensive, yet it is not unlimited. It does not allow amendments which, in their effect, change substantially the claim or defence.

Now, has not the amendment in question substantially changed the claim of the plaintiffs? The original claim was to recover certain real estate in the possession of the defendant, presented in an action at law. The amendment has, in effect, dismissed this action, or rather has expunged this claim from the plaintiffs' complaint, and allowed him to write therein a new and a different cause of action, and subject to a new and a different jurisdiction. It may be that the action, as amended, was the proper one for the plaintiff, and the one which, under the facts, he should have instituted in the beginning. But having commenced his action at law, we think it was without authority to engraft upon this action a new and a different cause, like that below, and allowing it to proceed in the place and stead of the action which the defendants had been summoned to answer, and have tried. We know of no precedent for such an amendment. The order must be reversed.

Such being the judgment of the court, as already stated, we do not regard the other orders and decrees as before us, and we pronounce no opinion as to the questions arising thereon. These subsequent orders and decrees must, however, fall with the original order, not that they contain error (they may, or may not, be right), but because the case was not in condition for the adjudication found in said orders and decrees.

It is the judgment of this court, that the order of his honor, Judge Pressley, authorizing the amendment referred to above, be *reversed, and that all subsequent proceedings be set aside, and that the case be remanded.

[This case is also cited in Boulard v. Carpin, 27 S. C. 240, 3 S. E. 219, as to facts.]

Before Kershaw, J., Williamsburg, October, 1884.

This was a petition by Ellen C. Maurice and others, in re George P. Nelson et al. v. James M. Nelson et al. The appeal was from the following order of reference:

A motion had been noticed for the present term, and duly served on Thomas M. Gilland, counsel for G. P. Nelson; John A. Kelley, attorney for J. H. Keels; M. J. Hirsch and J. Barrett Cohen, attorneys for John T. Nelson, seeking to obtain the order of the court, on behalf of the above named petitioners, for a reference of the cause of the purport of that hereinafter made. At the hearing the motion was opposed most earnestly upon various grounds, and after a very protracted discussion, involving questions of practice, the history of the cause, and the merits of the case, the decision was reserved for consideration by the court.

The only point made in the argument which has impressed me, after consideration, as, perhaps, furnishing a reason why the motion should not be granted, is that which urges that the proper parties are not all before the court. In view of the protracted character of this litigation, the complications which have already arisen, and are likely hereafter to arise, by reason of the death of parties and other contingencies, it appears to me most important that some progress should be made in the cause, and that is understood to be the object of the motion now made. The fiduciary character of the relations of some of the parties, and the danger of irreparable loss, perhaps, to innocent parties, beneficiaries of the trusts set up in their behalf, are also most cogent reasons why there should be no longer delay than that which is unavoidable. The order proposed makes provision for the calling in of new parties, if found necessary, and there are persons before the court who are interested on both sides, perhaps, of all the issues to be considered by the referee. The learned and able counsel who make the motion are evidently of the opinion that the order sought will speed the cause, and it will certainly not prejudice any party not before the court at this time, or not brought before it by the referee under the terms of the said order.

It is therefore, on motion of Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, and H. J. Haynsworth, attorneys for petitioners, and J. B. Howe and George M. Trenholm, attorneys for Ellen M. Nelson and others, ordered, that Joseph F. Rhame be appointed referee in the above stated cause; that the said G. P. Nelson and J. H. Keels do account before the said referee for all their acts and doings as trustees under the deed of Samuel Fluitt, referred to in the petition herein; that the said referee take the testimony on all the issues raised by the pleadings in the cause, including the petition and answers thereto, and report his conclusions on all issues of law and fact to this court, with leave to report any special matter; and the referee have full power to cause all persons to be made parties to the cause, whose presence may be necessary to a complete adjudication of all the questions involved therein.

From this order G. P. Nelson, J. H. Keels, and others appealed to this court upon the grounds stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard Dozier, T. M. Gilland, J. A. Kelley, and M. J. Hirsch, for appellants.

Messrs. H. J. Haynsworth and Johnson & Johnson, contra.

February 13, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. One Samuel *175

Fluitt, late of *the County of Williamsburg and State aforesaid, in 1852, executed a certain deed, a copy of which is found in the "Case," by which he gave considerable property, both real and personal, to his grandson, William R. Nelson, in trust, however, for his daughter, Martha E. Nelson, and for the support and maintenance of her children, "for and during her natural life," with limitations over to her children and grandchildren, if any. William R. Nelson, the trustee named in the deed, died, and his brother, George P. Nelson, a son of Martha E., was appointed in his stead. After this, the said George P. and his mother, Martha, filed a bill in the then Court of Equity against James M. Nelson, the adult children of Martha, and the children of William R., deceased, praying a sale of all the real estate conveyed in the deed, except a certain tract known as "Ox Swamp," of which they prayed partition; and an order was obtained from Judge J. T. Green to that effect, under which certain of the lands were sold by George P. Nelson, the trustee. This order provided for the purchase of said lands by the children of Martha, if they desired to so purchase, who seemed to have been regarded as remaindermen in fee.

Sometime after this, to wit, in September, 1871, George P. Nelson filed an ex parte petition in the cause for leave to sell a portion of Ox Swamp, which was granted; and in October thereafter another order was obtained to sell other portions of Ox Swamp. And in 1878 he filed another petition, alleging that Martha E. Nelson, the cestui que trust, had died during the month of April of that year, that she had retained in her possession the bulk of the property mentioned in the deed which now should be sold, and he prayed for the sale of such property as remained unsold at the death of the said Martha. Upon this petition an order was obtained from his honor, Judge Fraser, at chambers, authorizing the sale upon certain terms. Pursuant to the last order, G. P. Nelson proceeded to sell said property on saleday in January, 1879. At this sale one John T. Nelson, a minor son of the said G. P. Nelson, bid off the dwelling house tract and plantation, and perhaps other lands, at inadequate prices, as alleged. Certain proceedings were then taken by some of the parties in interest, under which G. P. Nelson was restrained temporarily from executing titles to his son of the lands bid off by *him and also he was required to turn over all books, mortgages, moneys, and papers to the clerk of the court as substituted trustee. Various other proceedings, not necessary to be mentioned now, were taken, and in the meantime the original bill in equity had been dropped from the docket.

Under these circumstances, the petition below was filed, in which the petitioners claim that the grandchildren of Martha E., many of whom have never been before the court, are really the remaindermen in fee of the property instead of the children of the said Martha, who, they allege, are only life-tenants; that an accounting should be had of both the present and the former trustee; that a certain order to show cause should be enforced against G. P. Nelson, and that the sale of the plantation and adjoining property by G. P. Nelson to his minor son should be cancelled and declared fraudulent and void. Wherefore they prayed that all of the grandchildren of Martha E. be brought in as parties, and that the original bill be redocketed; that G. P. Nelson, late trustee, be required to file without further delay a complete account of his receipts, disbursements, accounts, and doings as trustee, &c.; that J. H. Keels, clerk, do account fully and completely for his receipts and disbursements to date, and that both trustees do also file accounts with each separate distributee; and further, that the sale made by G. P. Nelson to John T. Nelson be set aside, and that all other sales made by him be scrutinized, and where improper, they be set aside, &c.

To this petition, G. P. Nelson, John T. Nelson, and J. H. Keels filed separate answers. After which, upon notice that a motion would be made before his honor, Judge Wallace, for leave to docket the original bill in equity, with the petition below, an order, of which the following is a copy, was obtained from his honor, to wit: "It appears that several years ago a bill was filed by G. P. Nelson and others against James M. Nelson, for the purpose of settling a trust estate in which the parties were interested. The purposes and objects of the bill need not be set out here, as it is a record of the court. It seems that all persons who had an interest in the subject-matter of the bill were not made parties, nor has there ever been a final settlement of the litigation, or a final decree in the case; the case, however, has been *dropped from the docket. This petition sets out the various matters in connection with the original subject of the bill, and the petitioners ask that the case be restored to the docket, as the matters covered by the original bill have not been settled. To grant this motion is a matter of course. The bill being restored to the docket, then an opportunity is offered to the parties to raise all such issues as they may desire, and are proper by amendment or otherwise, as they may be advised. It is, therefore, ordered, that the case of George P. Nelson and Martha E. Nelson against James M. Nelson be restored to the proper calendar of this court." From this order there was no appeal.

In October following, the petitioners gave notice to the attorneys of the defendants that a motion would be made in open court for the appointment of a referee, and commanding and requiring G. P. Nelson and J. H. Keels to account before said referee for all their acts as trustees under the deed of Samuel Fluit, referred to in the petition, and to take the testimony on all issues raised by the pleadings in the cause, including the petition and answers, * * * with leave to report any special matter, and with full power to call on all parties that may be necessary to a complete adjudication of all the questions raised in said petition. This motion was heard by his honor, Judge Kershaw, who, after hearing protracted discussion for and against, granted the order moved, appointing Joseph F. Rhame referee, and requiring the said G. P. Nelson and J. H. Keels to account as trustees under the deed of Samuel Fluit, with power on the part of the referee to take the testimony on all issues raised by the pleadings in the cause, including the petition and answers thereto, and to report his conclusions of law and fact, with any special matter; and, further, to cause all persons to be made parties to the cause whose presence may be necessary to a complete determination of all the questions involved.

From this order the defendants have appealed. The appeal raises the following questions: 1st. Was it not error to grant an order of reference in face of the fact, that all parties necessary in the case were not before the court, one of the plaintiffs to the original bill having been dead for years, and other parties mentioned in the petition as interested not having been called in, and *no amendment having been made. 2d. Was it not error to disregard the order of Judge Wallace, which was unappealed from? 3d. Was not the whole proceeding improperly brought, as contrary to the rules of law and practice in such cases?

It appears upon the proceedings below, that one of the two plaintiffs (to wit, Martha E. Nelson), in the original bill, had been dead for several years before the filing of the petition herein. It also appears in said petition that some of the grandchildren of the said Martha had never been made parties to said bill, or to any of the proceedings since. Such being the fact, we do not see how the case could be properly referred to a referee. In the absence of these parties, it was not ripe for reference. An order of reference is a proceeding in the cause, upon which all parties in interest are entitled to be heard, and it is, therefore, premature to grant such an order before all the parties necessary to a proper adjudication of the cause are before the court. We are not fully advised as to the precise interests of Martha E. Nelson, deceased, but she was a cestui que trust under the deed, and was a necessary, as well as an actual, party to the original bill, and her representatives should have been brought in, as prescribed by the code, in case of the death of a party, so as to insure the further progress of the cause. It is admitted, too, that certain of the grandchildren of Martha E. are beneficiaries under the deed, many of whom, it is stated in the petition, have not been made parties. This, we think, was necessary before the case could be referred.

The more serious objection, however, to the order appealed from is that it incorporates and refers to the referee various matters, which have occurred since the filing of the original bill, in advance of, and without, any amendment to said bill. It not only refers the original bill, with the issues raised therein, but it also refers the petition and the answers thereto, with the issues therein, with leave to the referee to report his conclusions of law and fact on all the issues raised. The code provides for raising new issues in a cause either by amendment or by supplemental complaint (McCaslan v. Latimer, 17 S. C., 123), as the facts may warrant, but we know of no authority by which this can be done by a petition, like this below.

*The case seems to have been long delayed, and no doubt it is important that it should be brought to a close, and as the order in question was passed to the end that progress should be made, so that a final adjudication should be had at an early day, we would be glad to affirm it; but not finding any legal authority for such an order in the rules prescribing the practice in such cases, it must be reversed.

It is the judgment of this court, that the order of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded, so that the parties may take such orders for the perfecting of their pleading as they may be advised.

SALINAS v. PEARSALL

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Trusts ⇨102.]

Where a trustee of J. and her children purchased land with the proceeds, in part at least, of trust property, and took deed to himself as trustee, he holds the land so purchased under the terms and limitations of the original trust deed.

[This case is also cited in Rabb v. Flenniken, 29 S. C. 284, 7 S. E. 597, as to facts.]

Before Kershaw, J., Darlington, March, 1885.

This was an action by Caroline B. Salinas, as executrix, and Richard M. Butler, as executor, of A. J. Salinas, deceased, against J. H. Pearsall, for the foreclosure of a mortgage given by defen*dant to Edward F. Bryan, as trustee, and assigned by said trustee to A. J. Salinas. The action was commenced February 2, 1884. The defendant denied the validity of the assignment.

In 1870 one Charles E. Jarrott conveyed a tract of land in Marion County, called the "Cooper tract," and some personal property to Edwin F. Bryan, of Savannah, Ga., in trust to stand seized and possessed of this property "to the sole and separate use and behoof of my said wife, Emma E. Jarrott, for and during the term of her natural life, and to pay over to her on her separate receipts in writing all the incomes, rents, profits, and accretions of the said property, real and personal, and the interests on choses in action which he may receive, or be possessed of, and from and after the death of my said wife, then to the use of such of the children of our marriage, if more than one, share and share alike, the child or children of any who may then be dead to be entitled to the share or shares thereof to which the parent, or parents, would have been entitled if living; the said estate to be absolute to the said children or their representatives; and also to have and to hold the said property and estate heretofore described, for the uses and purposes above set forth, and for the following uses and trusts, to wit: That upon the written request of my said wife, Emma E. Jarrott, he, the said Bryan, may sell and convey any portion of the said estate and property described above, and to reinvest the proceeds of said sale in such property as he may deem advisable, with the like written consent of my said wife, the said reinvestments or proceeds of sales of any of said property and estate to be subject to the same trusts, limitations, and uses as are herein declared and provided in respect to the property and estate hereinabove conveyed, described, and set forth."

In February, 1873, Edwin F. Bryan purchased at a judicial sale a tract of land in Darlington County, part of the Cusack tract, containing 420 acres, and took deed in the name of "E. F. Bryan, trustee," without further indication of the trust. In June, 1873, he conveyed 57 acres of this land to the defendant, and the defendant executed his bond and mortgage to secure a balance of the purchase money. The bond was payable to "Edwin F. Bryan, of Savannah, Ga., trustee for his sister, Mrs. Emma E. Jarrott"; and the mortgage recited the bond to "Edwin F.

Bryan, *of Savannah, Ga., trustee for Mrs. Emma E. Jarrott," and conveyed the property to "Edwin F. Bryan, trustee."

In March, 1874, at the written request of Mrs. Jarrott, in a letter to Bryan, "as trustee," he assigned this bond and mortgage to

A. J. Salinas, to the amount of $700, to secure "advances to be made by A. J. Salinas, cotton factor of Charleston, S. C., to C. E. Jarrott and Emma E. Jarrott"; and in March, 1875, upon the request by letter of Charles E. Jarrott, "Edwin F. Bryan, trustee," assigned this bond to said Salinas. These advances, Bryan testified, were for the purpose of enabling said Jarrotts to pursue jointly their planting interests.

On August 10, 1883, Edwin F. Bryan executed a declaration of trust, in which, after reciting his purchase of the 420 acres known as part of the Cusack tract, and his payment therefor "out of trust funds derived from a portion of the proceeds of the sale of the Cooper tract in Marion County," and the rents and profits of the said land, and money received from the insurance company for houses destroyed on the said Cusack place, and a sale of a portion of the said Cusack place, he declared that he held the land so purchased at the judicial sale for "following uses and trusts"—stating the same in the same words as are found above in the extract from the original trust deed.

Salinas having died, his executors instituted this action to foreclose the Pearsall mortgage. It was admitted that children of Chas. E. and Emma J. Jarrott were living. After stating the facts, the Circuit decree proceeded as follows:

Under these circumstances, I am forced to the conclusion that the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action. The bond and mortgage were unquestionably subject to the same trusts as the property originally conveyed, and the assignee, if he had notice of the trusts, or of facts sufficient to put him on the inquiry, could take no beneficial interest by the assignment. The legal interest in the bond and mortgage, no doubt, would pass, but it remained subject to the trusts. The cestui que trust is not before the court, and the trustee and the remaindermen, if there be any, are not represented or made parties. The object of this action is to alienate and dispose of a portion of the trust property.

It appears to me that a bare statement of these facts will be *sufficient to dispose of the case if the plaintiff's testator had notice of the trust. Of that there can be no doubt. The bond shows on its face that it was given to Edwin F. Bryan, "trustee, for his sister, Mrs. Emma E. Jarrott." The purchaser of such a bond was bound to inquire into the terms of the trust, and if he did not, the trust remains, and he must take subject to its terms, be they what they may. Simons v. Bank, 5 Rich. Eq., 272; Webb v. Graniteville Man. Co., 11 S. C., 407 [32 Am. Rep. 479]; Magwood v. Bank, 5 S. C., 390. The assignment was a breach of trust, known to Salinas, and, therefore, he cannot profit by it. If he acquired the legal title, it was by a wrong, which, though participated in by the cestui que trust, will not be sanctioned or assisted by this court.

It is not improbable that the plaintiffs have an equitable demand against the Jarrotts arising out of this transaction which might be enforced against the income of the trust property, upon proper proceedings, with all the proper parties before the court, but they cannot have the relief here demanded.

It is ordered and adjudged, that the complaint herein be dismissed, and that the plaintiffs pay the costs of this action, to be adjusted by the clerk.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Geo. W. Dargan, for appellants, contended that until the declaration of trust in 1883, there was no written statement of the source whence Bryan derived the money to pay for the Cusack place; that the rents and profits then declared to have been a part of the purchase money, were Mrs. Jarrott's own, under the terms of the original trust deed, and as there is nothing to show that the Cusack place was any part of the trust property, a sale of a portion thereof, and the insurance money, were not subject to the trust. The reinvestment of the proceeds of sale of the Cooper tract would not subject the purchase to the trust, unless the reinvestment was made upon the written request of Mrs. Jarrott—of which there is no evidence. Salinas had no notice, and could have acquired none, that the tract in Darlington was subject to the same trusts that had been impressed upon the land in Marion. On the contrary, the deed to Bryan for the Cusack tract, and the bond and mortgage only disclosed a trustee and one adult cestui que trust, and the assignment was by one for the use and with the consent of the other. Barrett v. Cochran, 11 S. C., 35. But if trust property, the defendant cannot defeat this action. Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C., 398. Mrs. Jarrott cannot complain; she is entitled to the interest, and for that, at least, foreclosure should be decreed. Matthews v. Heyward, 2 S. C., 239. The declaration of trust was executed after the assignments. Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C., 166.

Messrs. Boyd, Nettles & Brunson, contra.

February 16, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. [Omitting the statement of facts.] The plaintiffs have appealed upon several exceptions. These exceptions, however, raise but three questions. 1st. That his honor erred in holding the bond and mortgage to be trust property. 2d. In holding that the plaintiffs' testator became assignee with knowledge of the trust, or at least of facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry, which if properly conducted, would have resulted in the discovery of the trust. 3d. That he erred in holding that the defendant could defeat the action on these grounds.

1. Did Bryan hold these papers as trustee of Mrs. Jarrott, and under the limitations of the original trust deed? There can be no doubt that, as between himself and the cestui que trusts, he did so hold them. They were the result of a sale of a tract of land which he had purchased as the trustee of these parties, and paid for in part, at least, by the proceeds of the sale of a portion of the original trust property. This land was conveyed to him as trustee. True, it is not stated in the deed who were the cestui que trusts, but there can be no doubt on this subject. If the contest here was between him and the cestui que trusts, could any court hesitate to enforce the trust under the facts as stated? Besides this, upon the face both of the bond and mortgage it appears that they were each executed to him as trustee of Mrs. Jarrott.

11. Now, the important question arises, Did Salinas have knowledge of this fact, or knowledge of facts sufficient to put him upon such inquiry as would have led to a discovery of the trust impressed upon these papers? If so, he could not hold them discharged of the trust, unless they were properly assigned under the power of the original deed—of which hereafter. His honor, the Circuit Judge, found as matter of fact, that Salinas did have the knowledge above. Is that finding contrary to the manifest weight of the testimony? If not, this court, under the authority of many decisions, must let it stand. We do not see such manifest weight of testimony against this finding of the Circuit Judge as would warrant us in overruling it. On the contrary, there is evidence to support it. The very papers assigned to him advertised him of the fact on their face, that they were connected with a trust, and that Bryan held them, not as his own property, but as a trustee for Mrs. Jarrott. This, it seems to us, was enough in itself to make him hesitate, at least to make him inquire into the nature and character of this trust. It does not appear that he had done this, nor that had he looked into the records he would have failed to ascertain the facts in reference thereto. We think that Mr. Salinas must have known that he was dealing with a trustee, and with reference to trust property.

It may be urged, however, that he thought this trustee had the right to sell and assign, when done with the consent of the cestui que trust, and he knew this consent had been given. True, the trustee had power to sell the trust estate or any portion thereof, with the written consent of Mrs. Jarrott, for reinvestment. Was the assignment here for reinvestment? Certainly not. It was to pay a debt contracted by Mrs. Jarrott and her husband for supplies, and its effect was not to keep the trust estate alive, but to destroy it, and this must have been apparent to Salinas. A purchaser is not ordinarily required to see to the application of the purchase money where the vendor has power to sell, but where he knows, or ought to know, that a breach of trust is being committed, he cannot shield himself. Simons v. Bank, 5 Rich. Eq., 272; Webb v. Graniteville Manf. Co., 11 S. C. 407; Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C., 398. Especially where the breach of trust and the improper application of the funds is for his benefit.

III. Lastly, can the defendant interpose the objections above, and thereby defeat the action? Has there been a legal assignment? If not, the plaintiffs must fail to recover.

That there has *not, is the defence, and we think the defence has been sustained. We say this, however, without prejudice to any equitable claim which the plaintiffs may have, arising out of the transaction, against the income of the trust property, upon proper proceedings, with all parties before the court, as suggested by the Circuit Judge.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

STATE v. BELTON.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Witnesses ¶45.]

A boy of twelve years who could repeat the Lord's prayer, and had heard that the bad man caught those who lied, cursed &c., but had never heard of a God, or the devil, or of heaven or hell, or of the Bible, and had never heard, and had no idea, what became of the good or of the bad after death, is not a competent witness. Mr. Justice McGowan, dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 106; Dec. Dig. ¶45.]

[2. Homicide ¶203.]

Declarations made by the deceased a few hours before his death, charging the prisoner with the infliction of the mortal wound, are admissible in evidence, his crying out at the time, "O Lord, I cannot stay here much longer," indicating that he had lost all hope of recovery, and looked for an immediate dissolution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 430-437; Dec. Dig. ¶203.]

[3. Homicide ¶214.]

A dying declaration of the deceased, that the accused had passed him on the afternoon of the homicide on the road, was admissible in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Petsch, 43 S. C. 148, 20 S. E. 992.

For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 450; Dec. Dig. ¶214.]

[4. Homicide ¶167.]

A threat of the accused against "the Deans," without excepting any of the name, was admissible in evidence against him, the deceased being of that name and family, notwithstanding the proof showed the prisoner's quarrel had been wholly with other members of the family.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 335; Dec. Dig. ¶167.]

Mr. J. D. Kennedy, contra.

February 16, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant, David Belton, was convicted of the murder of Aaron Dean at the September term, 1885, of the Court of General Sessions for Kershaw County, his honor, Judge Hudson, presiding. From the judgment, he has appealed upon four exceptions, raising questions as to the competency and admissibility of certain testimony introduced by the prosecution. The first is as to the competency of a witness, Jim Miller. This witness was a boy about twelve years of age. He seems to have been a boy of, at least, ordinary intelligence, and although he had learned from his mother, since dead, the Lord's prayer, when he was five years old, and, according to his statement, had repeated it every day since, yet he said he had never heard of a God or the devil, or of heaven or hell, or of the Bible, and that "he had never heard, and had no idea, what became of the good or of the bad after death." He said, however, that he had heard it said that the bad man caught those who lied, cursed, &c., and upon being examined, he repeated the Lord's prayer. The presiding judge, in his report of the case as to this matter, states as follows: "As for the colored youth, he manifested an unusual sense of the efficacy of prayer, and the future torments by the bad man awaiting those who speak falsely, though his answers as to a God, heaven, &c., were singular. The court gave him instructions as to the meaning and obligation of an oath, and then permitted him to be sworn." His admission is assigned as error in the first exception.

The declarations of the deceased, made a short time before his death, as to who fired the fatal shot, and stating that the defendant had passed them on the road some three miles from the place where he was shot, were admitted as dying declarations. This is excepted to in the second and third exceptions (1st), because the evidence did not show that the deceased had given up all hope of life, and (2d), as to the statement of his having been passed by *the accused on the road, that this could not be allowed under the law of dying declarations.

The fourth exception alleges error, in that one Everett Kirkland was permitted to testify that he had heard the defendant say "that if those Deans did not stay off his lands and let him alone, he would put a load of shot into some of them; that he had carried them before a trial justice, had posted his land, &c.," the appellant claiming this to be error, because that while it was true that the father and brother of the deceased had been in difficulties with the accused on account of trespass upon his land, yet that the deceased was in no way involved, he being a young man, absent from the place most of the time, and on friendly terms with the accused.

Now, let us recur to the first exception. A leading case upon the question of law raised therein in England is the case of Onichund v. Barker, reported in 1 Wille's, 538, and more fully in 1 Atk., 21, and found in 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 195. In this case, upon a full and most interesting discussion of the whole question of the competency of a witness as affected by his religious creed, it was made to rest upon the question of his belief in the existence of a God, and rewards and punishments by him, either in this world or in the future state, "the court stating that one who believes a future state, and that he shall be punished in the next world as well as in this if he does not swear the truth, should be entitled to the greater credit, as he is plainly under the strongest obligation." In most of the States of the Union, it has been held that the competency of a witness is not affected by a disbelief in a future state, and that his testimony should be admitted if he believes in the existence of a God and in divine punishment of crime. See Hunscom v. Hunscom, 15 Mass., 184; Brock v. Milligan, 10 Ohio, 121; Bloeker v. Burness, 2 Ala., 354; United States v. Kennedy, 3 McLean, 175 [Fed. Cas. No. 15,524]; Bennett v. State, 1 Swan. [Tenn.], 411. In our own State, the case of Jones v. Harris, 1 Strob., 160, lays down very much the same doctrine, holding that a belief in God and his providence is sufficient to establish the competency of a witness, objected to on account of defective religious beliefs.

Now, let the competency of the witness,

Jas. Miller, be tested *by the rule of Jones v. Harris, supra, which is the law of South Carolina on this subject. Did he believe in a God and his providence? He stated to the court that he had never heard of a God, or of a heaven, or of a hell, or of a devil. How, then, could he have a belief in the existence and providence of a Great Being, of whom, up to the time that he was offered as a witness, he had never heard even? Such a belief, under such circumstances, seems impossible. In the absence of such belief, he was incompetent under the authorities cited. The fact that he had learned the Lord's prayer, had repeated it daily for years, repeated it in court, and stated that he had heard it said that the bad man caught those who lied and cursed, &c., did not furnish, as it seems to us, sufficient proof of a belief on his part of the existence and providence of a Being of whom, up to that moment, he had never heard.

Next, as to the dying declarations. And, first, as to so much thereof as relates to the actual shooting of the deceased by the accused. The rule on the subject of dying declarations is so succinctly and clearly laid down by Mr. Greenleaf, that it is not necessary to do more than to quote from him. In section 138 he says: "It is the impression of almost immediate dissolution, and not the rapid succession of death in point of fact, that renders the testimony admissible. Therefore, where it appears that the deceased, at the time of the declaration, had any expectation or hope of recovery, however slight it may have been, and though death actually ensued in an hour afterwards, the declaration is inadmissible. On the other hand, a belief that he will not recover is not in itself sufficient, unless there be also the prospect of almost immediate dissolution."

Did the deceased have any, the least, expectation or hope of recovery at the time he made the declaration objected to? He had stated to his father, about 8 o'clock in the morning of the day on which he died, that he could not stand it much longer, send for the doctor quick, his exact language being: "Father, I can't stand it much longer; send for the doctor quick." If the declaration objected to had been made at this time, there would be much force in the argument of appellant's counsel, that he had not lost hope; else, why send for the doctor? But the declaration was not made then; it was made some two hours later, and after the doctor had arrived and probed the wounds and gone out. It was then about 10 a. m. that he was heard by Pace and Watts at separate moments to say, "O Lord, I can't stay here much longer," or "stand it much longer." These expressions, made without qualification or call for help from any source, seem to indicate an impression of hopeless impending death, with the prospect of immediate dissolution, which is in accordance with the rule laid down by Mr. Greenleaf above. The deceased died in the afternoon of the day during which these declarations were made. We think they were competent.

Next, as to the declaration of the deceased, that the accused had passed him upon the road. "When the death of the deceased is the subject of the charges, and the circumstances of the death are the subject of the dying declarations," they are admissible, says Mr. Greenleaf, section 156. In the case of Terrell, reported in 12 Rich., 321, dying declarations extending to the previous conduct of the prisoner were held admissible. Under the authority of this case, we cannot say that the judge erred in admitting the testimony in question. They were made at the same time of the other declarations above, which we have held were competent as dying declarations; and although they do not relate to the facts occurring immediately at the shooting, yet they state a circumstance pointing with more or less force to the prisoner as the party who committed the deed. This was regarded as sufficient in the Terrell case to render them competent. In that case Judge O'Neill said: "The next inquiry is whether the circumstances stated by McCullam are properly in evidence. They are the circumstances which point out the prisoner who prepared the poison, and who made the party preparing the instrument of poisoning, the two Grahams and himself." The testimony falls within the rule. "When the death of the deceased is the subject of the charges, and the circumstances of the death are the subject of the dying declarations."

Lastly, as to the testimony of Kirkland, stating certain threats made by the accused against the Deans. The deceased was one of the family of the Deans. The accused did not limit his threats to any special member of that family, but said if those Deans did *not stay off his place and let him alone, he would put a load of shot into some of them, &c. The threats, in their terms, being general as to the Deans, and the deceased being one of the Deans, we cannot say it was error to admit them.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment below be reversed, on the ground of error in holding that the youth, James Miller, was a competent witness, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I incline to think that the colored lad, Jim Miller, was a competent witness under the ruling in Jones v. Harris. He was not educated in book, but he had at least ordinary intelligence, and was twelve years of age. Although he said he had never heard of "God," yet he could repeat the Lord's prayer, and had "a strong sense of the future torments by the bad man, awaiting them who speak falsely." Was not this really a belief in Providence and rewards and punishments? The tendency in these latter days is "to enlarge the circle of competency by directing objections to the credibility of witnesses."

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, June, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. W. M. Foster and J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. Duncan, Solicitor, Bobo & Carlisle, and S. T. McCravy, contra.

February 18, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was a prosecution originally commenced in a trial justice's court, but exactly what was the offence charged is one of the questions in the case. Indeed, the whole proceeding in the trial justice's court seems to have been attended with a series of irregularities, omissions, and uncertainties, unusual even in that court. The affidavit upon which the whole proceeding was based bears date the 28th of March, 1885, and charges "that on or about the last of March, 1885, one Calvin Mays did commit a trespass after notice upon the real estate under the control of deponent," one A. E. McCravy. The warrant issued thereon requires the arrest of the defendant to answer to a charge that at a time not specified, the same being left blank, he "did commit a trespass after notice," and the warrant is not signed by the trial justice. There is no endorsement on the papers of any finding by the trial justice as to whether defendant was guilty or not guilty; the only endorsement being the sentence, *signed by the trial justice, that the defendant pay a fine of ten dollars, or go to jail for fifteen days.

At the trial, and after the examination of the first witness on the part of the State, and after the State had closed its case, the defendant, by his counsel, demanded a jury, which was refused. After the witness for the State, the prosecutor, McCravy, had testified that defendant had trespassed on land under his control after he had given him notice not to trespass, that witness was recalled, when he said that "he sent written notice to defendant by my son. Never saw son give notice to defendant," and counsel for defendant desired that the testimony of this witness be corrected accordingly, which the trial justice refused to do, because, as he says in his report, "I was satisfied I had taken it down correctly and refused to change it." The testimony tended to show that the prosecutor, McCravy, had rented some land from one Wm. Posey, with the understanding that he was to clear some of the land and to have the use of the land for two years, 1884 and 1885, but there was no contract in writing—it was simply verbal. Some dispute having arisen between Posey and McCravy, the former gave the latter notice, in the fall of 1884, to leave the premises, and early in the year 1885 Posey put other tenants on the land, amongst whom was the defendant. McCravy, however, claimed the right to use the land for the year 1885 under his verbal contract, and, as he says, remained in possession, having cleared some of the land according to contract.

At the trial, two witnesses on the part of the defendant were not allowed to testify as to the state of feeling between Posey and McCravy, while a witness on the part of the State, in reply, seems to have been allowed to testify on that subject. Witnesses were also allowed to testify as to what Posey had said on other occasions in reference to his trouble with McCravy, although it does not appear that the proper foundation was laid when Posey was on the stand by calling his attention to the time and place, when and where, and the person to whom, such declarations were made.

The defendant appealed from the sentence to the Court of General Sessions, upon numerous grounds set out in the "Case." Judge Wallace, who heard the appeal, rendered judgment, dismissing the appeal and affirming the sentence of the trial justice, *and from his judgment defendant appeals to this court upon twenty-two grounds, set out in the "Case." It would be impracticable and, in our judgment, altogether unnecessary to consider these numerous grounds in detail. We shall, therefore, confine our attention to those points which, in our judgment, really arise in the case.

The Circuit Judge, ignoring many of the grounds of appeal from the judgment of the trial justice, bases his decision upon the fact that he was satisfied that, under the contract between Posey and McCravy, the latter was entitled to hold the land for the two years of 1884 and 1885, which contract though void under the statute of frauds at the time it was made, yet McCravy having performed his part of the contract had the right to demand that Posey should perform his part, and as he was satisfied that Mays had entered upon the land after notice from McCravy not to do so, the finding of the trial justice was right. Assuming, however, that the Circuit Judge, though not noticing specifically many of the grounds of appeal upon which the case was heard before him, has, by his judgment, practically overruled them all, it becomes necessary for us to consider whether he has erred in so doing.

As to the failure of the trial justice to sign the warrant, we think there is nothing in that, under the circumstances of the case. It certainly was a grave omission on the part of the trial justice, and if it had become necessary to have the defendant arrested, might have led to very serious consequences. But it appears from the report of the trial justice that the defendant voluntarily appeared and submitted himself to the jurisdiction of that court, without any objection to the warrant until after the trial.

The objection to the affidavit, which, according to section 830 of the General Statutes, seems to be the foundation of the whole proceeding, is of a more serious character. The case in the trial justice's court, as well as in the Court of Sessions, seems to have been treated as a prosecution under section 2507 of the General Statutes, which reads as follows: "Every entry on the enclosed or unenclosed land of another, after notice from the owner or tenant prohibiting the same, shall be deemed a misdemeanor." Now, the rule is well settled that in indictments under a statute the indictment must follow substantially the words of the statute. In other words, the defendant must be charged with having done the thing which the statute declares shall be an offence against the law. It is true that the same strictness is not required in prosecutions before a trial justice, as in indictments in the Court of Sessions; and all that is required in the trial justice's court is, that the information under oath shall plainly and substantially set forth the offence charged.

Now, under section 2501 of the General Statutes it is declared that "Whoever shall wilfully, unlawfully, and maliciously cut, mutilate, deface, or otherwise injure any tree, house, outhouse, fence, or fixture of another, or commit any other trespass upon real property in the possession of another, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the judge before whom the case shall be tried." Now, to say the very least of it, the affidavit in this case leaves it uncertain as to which of these sections the defendant is charged with having violated. Indeed, it points more clearly to section 2501 than to section 2507, for the charge in the affidavit is that the defendant "did commit a trespass after notice upon the real estate under the control of deponent." There is no charge that he entered upon land of another after notice from the owner or tenant prohibiting the same, which would bring it under section 2507. If, therefore, as we have seen, the charge more properly brings the prosecution under section 2501, then the trial justice had no jurisdiction, for the punishment is fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the judge before whom the case is tried; whereas under section 2507 he would have jurisdiction, for there, by the act of 1883 (18 Stat., 432) amending this section, the fine cannot exceed one hundred dollars, and the imprisonment cannot exceed thirty days, the limits of a trial justice's jurisdiction. We cannot say, therefore, that the offence for which the defendant has been tried and convicted was plainly and substantially set forth in the information.

As to the demand for a trial by jury, we think it came too late. The defendant was unquestionably entitled to a jury if he had demanded one before the trial commenced; but having failed to avail himself of this privilege at the proper time, there was no error in refusing his demand after the trial had commenced and after the State had closed its case.

We think, however, that there was error in refusing to correct the testimony of the prosecuting witness, when it appeared from his own testimony, after he was recalled, that he had made a mistake in so essential a matter as giving notice to the defendant not to trespass upon the land.

So, too, we think there was error in refusing to allow the witnesses for the defence to testify as to the state of feeling between Posey and McCravy and at the same time allowing a witness for the State to testify on that subject. It may have been wrong to allow testimony on this point from either side, but to refuse to allow it on one side and then to receive it from the other was certainly erroneous.

The rule as to contradicting or discrediting a witness by showing that he has made inconsistent statements—that the witness to be thus discredited must be notified of time, place, and person—is well settled; but whether this rule was violated in this case does not very clearly appear from the testimony as presented to us.

The failure of the trial justice to endorse upon the information his finding of guilty was a mere irregularity, which we do not think can avail the defendant. In his report, he states that he found the defendant guilty and imposed the sentence which is endorsed upon the papers.

It may be that the testimony in the case was sufficient to show such part performance of the verbal contract for a lease for two years as would entitle McCravy to demand from Posey, in a court of equity specific performance (though as to that there may be two opinions), but we scarcely think that was a question which could be tried in a criminal proceeding. Section 2507 of the General Statutes makes it a misdemeanor for one to enter upon land after notice from the owner or tenant prohibiting the same. Now, it is quite clear that McCravy was not the owner of the land, and whether he was the tenant or not depended upon an unadjudicated equity which he might or might not be able to establish before another tribunal having jurisdiction of such matters. Section 1812 of the General statutes declares explicitly that "No parol lease shall give a tenant a right of possession for a longer term than twelve months from the time of entering on the premises," &c. Now, whether in the face of this positive statute, originally enacted in 1817, a party could enforce the specific performance of a verbal agreement for a lease of a longer period than twelve months, upon the ground of part performance, is a question which it is not necessary now to determine; but certainly until the alleged tenant has established, in the proper forum, his rights as such, he cannot enforce a criminal statute designed only for the protection of owners or tenants of land. The right to specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands is not an absolute right, but one resting in the discretion of the court to which the application is addressed, and until such court has established the right, we do not see how it can be recognized before another tribunal, especially one invested with criminal jurisdiction only.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court with instructions to order a new trial in a trial justice's court.

[1. Attachment ⇨100.]

To entitle a party to an attachment upon the ground that defendant had done certain acts with a fraudulent intent, the affidavit must disclose the sources of information, or the facts upon which such a belief is founded.

[2. Attachment ⇨249.]

The grounds of attachment in this case being (1) a sale of goods, at less than cost, by the defendant, a failing merchant, then negotiating for a cash compromise with his creditors; (2) his offer to them to compromise and thereby enable him to avoid an assignment (which was afterwards made); (3) his direction to his clerk to take down all empties and put up full barrels; and (4) a disposition of part of his property to certain preferred creditors (which last was satisfactorily explained)—the attachment was properly discharged.

Acts, made by statute a ground of attachment, done by an agent without the knowledge of his principal, will not support the statutory remedy of attachment against the property of the principal.

Before Fraser, J., Sumter, February, 1885.

These were two cases of attachment against C. H. Whiteheart, Jr., commenced December 31, 1885, one by Herman M. Myers and the other by A. E. Massman Bros. & Co. Defendant moved to discharge the attachment in both cases, and upon these motions, his honor filed the following order on February 14, 1886:

These cases were before me on motions to discharge attachments against the defendant issued by the plaintiffs. The motions were made at chambers at Sumter, and were heard on the notice with the accompanying affidavits and all the papers in the cases—affidavits on the part of plaintiffs in support of their showing for the attachments, and on the part of the defendant in reply. Parties were fully heard by counsel.

If it had been made to appear in the affidavits before me that, as suggested in argument, the defendant was at the commencement of these actions a resident of Florence, in the county of Darlington, the actions could not have been properly brought in this county, and the actions and the attachments would fall together. The defendant certainly knows where his residence is, and he says nothing about it. It is by no means a necessary inference, from the fact that the Sumter store is a "branch store," that the defendant is not a resident of the county. The question as to residence, however, may be made, if necessary, in some other shape in the progress of these cases, if the defendant is advised to do so.

It has also been insisted on in the argument with some earnestness that an attachment against an insolvent debtor is void as preference under our act in reference to assignments by insolvent debtors. It is true that under the late bankrupt acts all attachments issued against an insolvent debtor were ipso facto dissolved by certain proceedings in bankruptcy, voluntary or involuntary, instituted within a limited time after the issuing of the attachments. But Congress has power to pass bankrupt laws and the *State has not. The provision above referred to was incorporated in the bankrupt act, and there is no such provision in our acts in reference to assignments by insolvent debtors.

Where there is a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, certain dealings with the property of the debtor within ninety days of the assignment are void if the debtor "procures or suffers" them to be made "with a view to give a preference" to a creditor who has "reasonable cause to believe" the debtor is insolvent. But to hold that an attachment issued by a creditor on his own motion against an unwilling debtor, and otherwise valid, is void under the provisions of our assignment acts would require a stretch of the power of judicial legislation which fortunately is very rare in the United States.

The questions, however, still remain: Were the facts stated in the affidavits on which these attachments were issued sufficient? and are they true?

Taking the whole line of cases in our own books on the subject of attachments, and the recent case of Ivy v. Caston (21 S. C., 583), I take the rule to be this: The affidavit should state facts within the personal knowledge of the witness, and the facts so stated should be sufficient to show that the property has been, or is about to be, dealt with in the manner prohibited, and that this was accompanied with the fraudulent intent, at least prima facie. If it does not make such a case, the attachment should not issue, and if issued, should be discharged on motion. If the affidavit is sufficient on its face, the defendant may still be allowed to show by counter-affidavits that the statements are untrue, for, otherwise, the business of the country would be at the mercy of the reckless and unprincipled; and, perhaps, he may be allowed to introduce such new facts as may show that the inferences drawn from the affidavits are not the true ones. The plaintiff cannot introduce into the case any new facts or evidence of fraud; he must stand on his original case, and if that fails the attachment fails. This seems to be right in itself, as no man should be allowed to attach the property of another and hold it until he can get the evidence on which he can secure a lien.

In the cases before me I see nothing in a proposition to creditors asking them to accept 25 cents on the dollar, or an assignment, which is improper or threatening. Paying off portions of the stock of goods to creditors who are pressing is certainly no evidence of fraud, even if the defendant had said he would make no preferences. The prices at which the segars and tobacco were sold, as mentioned in the affidavits, are not so extravagantly low as to excite in my mind any suspicion of fraud, unless there is some hidden meaning in the direction given by the defendant to his clerk, Dozier, about taking down empty barrels and putting up others. I see no harm in it. It now appears from all the affidavits that the defendant knew nothing of the alleged low sales of segars and tobacco, and that as to at least a part of the giving up of goods to certain creditors, he and his clerk were both imposed on, and were themselves the victims of a fraud.

I am not at liberty to consider any new facts which are stated on behalf of the plaintiffs to show a fraudulent intent, and, therefore, will not undertake to say how far the statements in reference to them are to be believed.

I therefore conclude that the affidavits on which the attachments were issued were insufficient, and that some of the more important facts therein stated are untrue in the sense that the acts done are the acts of the defendant, the clerk or managing agent being alone responsible for them.

It is therefore ordered, that the attachments in the above stated cases be, and hereby are, set aside and discharged, with ten dollars costs in each case, to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant. It is ordered, that the notices of motion, and all the affidavits used on the hearing before me, be filed with the clerk, and with the other papers in the cases.

From this order plaintiffs appealed.

Messrs. Moises & Lee, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Evans & Evans, and Johnson & Johnson, contra.

February 18, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On December 31, 1884, the plaintiffs in the cases above stated sued out warrants of attachment, under which the stock of goods in a branch store of the defendant at *Sumter was seized by the sheriff. The affidavits upon which these attachments were issued were made on the same day (December 31, 1884) by Simon Kahn as the managing agent of the plaintiff in the first named case, and by Alexander Morris as the managing agent of the plaintiffs in the case second above stated. These affidavits are very much the same in substance, and state, as the grounds for issuing the attachments, that the defendant has removed goods from his place of business and secreted the same for the purpose of defrauding his creditors; that "he has wasted and dissipated his stock of goods in a shocking manner; has sold his goods at any price offered and at less than first cost, to wit, that the defendant sold to Z. E. Walker, on the 30th instant, 2,000 segars for $50, that cost him, without freight, $70; that on or about the 30th instant the defendant sold to one Wheeler several boxes of tobacco at less than first cost, and without adding any charges for freight; that on the 29th instant the defendant wrote from Florence to his managing agent at Sumter to take down all empties and tap all full barrels, and dispose of goods as rapidly as possible; that said managing agent, Dozier, stated that he intended letting goods go at any price, stating further, 'I want to take my pocket book full to Whiteheart tomorrow night;' that defendant had stated to said Simon Kahn, on the 30th instant, that he would not prefer any of his creditors, but that on the morning of the 31st instant the defendant shipped two barrels of whiskey to one of his creditors, Myers, Edel & Co., and that he had also shipped several barrels of whiskey to Robert Hough & Sons, another of his creditors, in violation of his promise not to prefer any creditor; that defendant is giving away whiskey and segars to his friends, and is thereby defrauding his creditors; and that defendant has admitted that he was insolvent and had written a circular letter to his creditors proposing to pay twenty-five cents on the dollar in full of their claims, which, if not accepted, he will be compelled to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors."

The defendant made a motion before Judge Fraser, at chambers, to discharge the attachments based upon his own affidavit and that of J. T. Dozier, his clerk in the Sumter store. These affidavits substantially deny all the allegations of fraud in the affidavits upon which the attachments were issued, explaining that the shipment of whiskey to Myers, Edel & Co. was made through an imposition practised by the agent of that house on the clerk, Dozier, and that the whiskey sent to Robert Hough & Sons had been shipped back to them about two weeks before the attachments were issued, because there was no demand in the Sumter market for that quality of liquors. Defendant in his affidavit admits that he did sell goods "as rapidly and closely as possible, but only in the legitimate course of his business, and with a view of paying up his creditors, many of whom were becoming importunate." He also admits that he wrote to Dozier, his clerk at Sumter, "to take down empties and to put up fresh barrels, as the business was then going on, and he was awaiting the action of his creditors," in response to his circular letter proposing a compromise, which proposition some of them had indicated a willingness to accept. He also says that if such reckless sales, as those described in the affidavits upon which the attachments issued, were made, they were without his authority. Finally, he says that he made an assignment to the said Dozier for the benefit of his creditors on the 2d of January, 1885. Dozier, in his affidavit, denies making the reckless sales attributed to him, and says that the defendant never at any time authorized him to sell any goods for less than their true value, or for the purpose of defrauding his, the defendant's, creditors.

He also denies the statement that he said he intended to let goods go at any price, as he wanted to take a full pocket book to defendant.

The motion to discharge the attachments were heard upon these affidavits, together with all the papers in the cases, as well as affidavits submitted by the plaintiffs, "in support of their showing for the attachments," and affidavits on the part of the defendant in reply. The Circuit Judge held that he was not "at liberty to consider any new facts which are stated on behalf of the plaintiffs to show a fraudulent intent, and, therefore, will not undertake to say how far the statements in reference to them are to be believed. I therefore conclude that the affidavits on which the attachments were issued were insufficient, and that some of the more important facts therein stated are untrue, in the sense that the acts done are the acts of the defendant, the clerk or managing agent being alone responsible for them." He therefore ordered that the attachments be set aside and discharged.

From this order plaintiffs appeal upon the following grounds: Because of error in holding: I. That the affidavits upon which the attachments were obtained in said cases were insufficient. II. That the said defendant was not responsible for the acts of his managing agent. III. That he could not consider the new facts stated in the affidavits on behalf of the plaintiffs against the motion to discharge the attachments.

Upon the first ground, we think that the view taken by the Circuit Judge is fully sustained by the cases in this State. Smith & Melton v. Walker, 6 S. C., 169; Brown v. Morris, 10 Id., 469; Claussen v. Fultz, 13 Id., 478; and Ivy v. Caston, 21 Id., 583. The allegation, that a person has done a certain act with a fraudulent intent, must necessarily be based upon information or belief, and, therefore, in such a case the rule is well settled that the sources of information, or the facts upon which such belief are founded, must be stated. The particular facts stated as to the sales of segars and tobacco at less than cost, do not, in our judgment, warrant the conclusion that the defendant intended to defraud his creditors. We suppose it is not very uncommon for merchants, under certain circumstances, to sell goods for less than cost; and when it is remembered that the defendant was negotiating a compromise with his creditors, which he seems to have had reason to expect would be accepted, he might very well have sold goods at very low prices with the most honest intentions, so as to enable him to get the money to meet promptly his offer of compromise.

We agree with the Circuit Judge, that nothing to the discredit of the defendant could be inferred from his letter to his clerk at Sumter, directing him "to take down the empties and put up the full barrels." This is just what he would probably do if the compromise was effected, as he had reason to expect would be the case. The delivery of the whiskey to Myers, Edel & Co., as well as the previous shipment to Robert Hough & Sons, is fully explained in entire consistency with the defendant's honest intentions. The fact that defendant had written a circular letter to his creditors, proposing to pay twenty-five cents on the dollar in *full of their claims, or to assign all his property for their benefit, certainly constituted no evidence of an intent to defraud his creditors, especially when it was followed by the fact that such an assignment was actually executed within two days—probably as soon as practicable—after the attachments were levied.

We do not think the second ground of appeal is well taken. While it is true that a principal is liable for the acts of his agent within the scope of his agency, yet this is not universally true. Ordinarily a principal is not liable criminally for the acts of his agent, although he may be liable for the fraud of his agent in the disposition of property intrusted to his care, to whom he has committed the custody of such property, as in Reynolds v. Witte, 13 S. C., 5 [36 Am. Rep. 678]. But this case differs materially from that. There certain negotiable coupon bonds were lodged with the plaintiff's agent as collateral security for the payment of borrowed money, and fraudulently disposed of by the agent, and the principal was held responsible upon the ground that he had impliedly agreed to safely keep the collaterals until the maturity of the notes given for the borrowed money, and if he failed to do so, whether through the negligence or fraud of the agent to whom he had intrusted their custody, he was responsible. Here, however, no element of contract enters into the transaction. The plaintiffs are seeking to enforce the payment of their debts by a severe statutory remedy, which can only be made available where the defendant has done certain things prohibited by the statute; and until it is shown that the defendant has himself done or authorized another to do, some one or more of the things prohibited by the statute, he does not render himself liable to so stringent a proceeding. It is not, in our judgment, a case for the application of the doctrines growing out of the relation of principal and agent. There is no testimony whatever tending to show that the reckless sales of goods in the Sumter store, attributed to the clerk, which, however, are denied by him, were authorized by or even known to the defendant, and we do not think he can be held responsible for them, even if the allegations in the original affidavits as to such reckless sales by the clerk be true, about which there is no little conflict in the testimony.

As to the third ground, we agree with the

Circuit Judge, that *he was not at liberty to consider any new facts stated on behalf of the plaintiffs to show a fraudulent intent. The question before the judge was whether the attachments were properly issued in the first instance, and to determine that question he could only consider the grounds upon which the attachments were originally applied for, and not any new facts or new grounds for the first time stated at the hearing of the motion to discharge the attachments. The question to be decided was whether the showing, made at the time the attachments were issued, was sufficient. It is true that the code provides that if the application to discharge an attachment be based upon affidavits on the part of the defendant, but not otherwise, the plaintiff may oppose the same by affidavits or other proofs, but this manifestly means that the plaintiff may, by affidavits, contradict or rebut the statements made in the affidavits submitted by the defendant, and not that he may state new facts—make a new case. This would be manifestly unjust to the defendant, and contrary to the usual course of investigation in a court of justice.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Aiken, October, 1884.

This action was commenced February 27, 1884. The opinion states the case.

*205

*Mr. G. W. Croft, for appellant.
Messrs. Henderson Bros., contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of her deceased husband, Solomon Cook, on a note, as follows: "One day after date I promise to pay C. A. Cook, or bearer, five hundred dollars, for value received. Witness my hand and seal this 4th day of January, 1882. (Signed) J. W. Cook, [L. S.]" It appeared that in September, 1863, the defendant gave a note (growing out of some land transaction) to his brother, Solomon Cook, for $500, payable "at the expiration of the present war." Solomon Cook died intestate in 1865, and his widow, Clara A., managed the affairs of the estate, without legal authority, down to 1884, when she took out letters of administration. After the war, and before she received letters, there were several payments and renewals of the note, the last being January 4, 1882, when the note sued on was given to Clara A. Cook, individually. After receiving letters, she brought this action on the note as administratrix. The defendant refused payment, claimed set off, &c.

Different questions were made, as to whether the action would lie by the plaintiff as administratrix, and whether the original note was given with reference to Confederate money, or had been paid, &c. But the only question which comes to this court is in regard to alleged error on the part of the judge in excluding certain testimony. Evidence was offered to prove that the said Clara A. Cook, after the note sued on was given, and before she became administratrix, agreed with the defendant, J. W. Cook, that if he would erect or repair certain mills on a tract of land owned by the estate of Solomon Cook and his two brothers, John M. and the defendant, J. W. Cook, she would credit on the note the pro rata of the expenses due by the estate of Solomon Cook; and that, relying upon such agreement, the defendant performed the work. The judge excluded the testimony, holding that, in this suit, the estate could not be held bound for its pro rata of expenses incurred in building on the property held in common by a *co-tenant, and that an administrator could not make a contract to charge the estate with a new debt.

The plaintiff had a verdict for $594.64, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "I. That his honor erred in excluding the testimony of defendant, showing that he repaired two mills at the request of the plaintiff after the date of the note of January, 1882, upon the express agreement that he should be credited with the value of such repairs upon said note. II. That his honor charged the jury that they could not credit the note given to the plaintiff by the defendant in January, 1882, with the value of the work done by the defendant in repairing two mills at the request of the plaintiff, although the work may have been done on the express agreement that the defendant should be credited with the value thereof on said note. His honor also charged the jury, that said work on the mills was improvement of real estate by one tenant in common, and that the plaintiff could not legally allow credit for the same on the note. The defendant submits that his honor erred in so charging, for that the plaintiff is now estopped from denying her contract to credit the note with the work. That the only issue raised by the evidence was one of payment and not one of tenant in common receiving compensation for improvements."

As we understand it, the judge did direct credit to be given for all money actually paid to Mrs. Cook before she became administratrix; but as to the alleged agreement to credit on the note the value of the work to be done on the mills, that was not actual payment, but matter of contract, which could only be enforced, if it was a legal and binding contract, upon proper allegations and proof on complaint or statement of counter claim. There was a counter claim put in as to other matters, payment of notes, &c., but none as to the alleged contract to credit the note with the value of work done on the mills.

We do not think that the plaintiff can escape compliance with her contract to credit the value of the work on the note, upon the ground that the contract was made by her individually before she became administratrix. Her subsequent administration had relation back to the death of the intestate, and legalized all her intermediate acts—that is, made them her acts as administratrix.

*May v. May, 2 Hill Eq., 22; Witt v. Elmore, 2 Bail., 597. It was only by the force of this principle that her action as administratrix, on a note payable to herself, could be sustained; and it must apply against her as well as for her. The matter must be considered precisely as if she had been the administratrix when she made the alleged agreement as to a credit on the note.

But, conceding this, the difficulty still remains. It is certainly the general rule, that an administrator has no right to diminish the assets of the estate or to contract in reference to the lands which, upon the death, descended to the heirs at law, even where there is no complication as to the rights of tenants in common to charge for improvements. In the view that the testimony excluded would have proved the allegations made, it may be that the plaintiff failed to keep faith with the defendant, but she insists upon her legal rights, and we are bound to judge of them according to the rules of law. He must seek his redress in some other way. The alleged contract of Mrs. Cook was either purely personal or without consideration, and did not bind the estate. See McBeth v. Smith, 2 Tread. Const. 676; S. C. 3 Brev., 511; Nebbe v. Price, 2 Nott & McC., 328; Harral v. Witherspoon, 3 McCord, 486; Perry v. Brown, 1 Bail., 45; Ross v. Sutton, Ibid., 127 [19 Am. Dec. 660]; [Wilson v. Huggins] 11 Rich., 410.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

24 S. C. 207

SIMONDS v. HAITHCOCK.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Homestead ⇨200.]

The Circuit Judge committed no error in confirming a return of homestead appraisers, to which exceptions, supported by affidavits, were filed, alleging excessive valuation, but not mistake, fraud, or corruption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 374; Dec. Dig. ⇨200.]

[2. Homestead ⇨52.]

The return of homestead appraisers should have the same force and effect as the return of commissioners in dower, as to which latter the principle was declared in Irvine v. Brooks, 19 S. C. 101.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 70-72; Dec. Dig. ⇨52.]

[3. Homestead ⇨183.]

The statute (Gen. Stat., § 1996) regulating the assignment of a homestead to a debtor where his lands exceed $1,000 in value and cannot be divided, is not unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 360; Dec. Dig. ⇨183.]

[This case is also cited in Simonds v. Haithcock, 26 S. C. 596, 2 S. E. 616, as to facts.]

Before Kershaw, J., Richland, July, 1885.

*This was a claim of homestead by the defendant in the case of John W. Simonds against James Haithcock. The claim was made in January, 1884, and such proceedings were thereupon had as are stated in the opinion of this court.

The defendant and claimant supported his exceptions by affidavits of three persons that they were well acquainted with the land assigned, and that it was worth no more than $2 an acre; by affidavits of the claimant and the trial justice who qualified the appraisers, that they had not gone upon the land; and by affidavits of the claimant and a surveyor, that the land could be divided without injury. The respondent submitted no affidavits.

Mr. John Banskett, for appellant.

Messrs. Lyles & Haynsworth, contra.

February 18, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiff levied an execution on lands of the defendant, Haithcock, who claimed homestead. Appraisers were appointed to lay off the homestead, and they returned that the value of all the lands was $987.50. To this return the plaintiff, Simonds, excepted, and Judge Wallace set aside the return and appointed new commissioners, to wit: Abram Huguenin, John T. Taylor, and J. A. Buckheister. Before an appraisal could be had, Huguenin died, and James H. Adams was appointed in his place.

These commissioners, on May 29, 1885, made return, describing the lands of defendant as the Brown tract, 217 acres, part of the Harris tract, 82 acres, and also one-fourth interest in another tract containing 458 acres, and stating "that in our opinion said premises are worth $1,125, and cannot be divided without injury," &c. To this return the defendant, Haithcock, filed exceptions: 1. Because the commissioners failed to lay off homestead in lands. 2. That the commissioners over-estimated the value of the lands, and erred in their conclusion that the lands could not be divided without injury. Affidavits were submitted as to the value of the land and the practicability of dividing it without injury, &c. After hearing the affidavits and argument for and against the *return, Judge Kershaw overruled the exceptions, and confirmed the return of the appraisers.

From this order the appeal comes to this court upon the following exceptions: "I. Because his honor erred in confirming and holding good the report of the commissioners in the matter of the homestead, the report showing that they had failed and refused to set off the homestead in land. II. Because, the commissioners having failed to set off the homestead, his honor held that the commissioners had not erred in their conclusion that said lands could not be divided without injury to the remainder. III. Because his honor held good and confirmed the report of the commissioners, when it is respectfully submitted, that the section of the General Statutes of South Carolina under which they acted, viz., section 1996, chapter LXXI., General Statutes, is unconstitutional and void."

The first and second exceptions complain that the Circuit Judge committed error by concurring in the judgment of the appraisers as to the value of the lands, and that they could not be divided without injury to the remainder. Section 1996 of the General Statutes, in reference to the assignment of homestead, declares that "Whenever, in the assignment of a homestead, as provided in section 1994 of this chapter, the appraisers shall find that the premises exceed the value of one thousand ($1,000) dollars, and that the same cannot be divided without injury to the remainder, they shall make and sign under oath an appraisal thereof, and deliver the same to the sheriff, who shall, within ten days thereafter, deliver a copy thereof to the head of the family claiming the homestead, &c., with a notice attached, that unless the person so claiming the homestead shall pay to the sheriff the surplus of the appraised value over and above one thousand dollars, within sixty days thereafter, such premises shall be sold," &c. The appraisers made their return in exact conformity with this law. There is no allegation of "mistake, fraud, or corruption," but only of an alleged error of judgment on the part of the appraisers. The parties had the right, which they exercised, to resist the confirmation of the return; but when the judge approved it, we cannot say that he committed error in so doing.

The appointment of appraisers to set off homestead is somewhat analogous to the appointment of commissioners to lay off dower, and it would seem that the force and effect given to the return in one case should be given to it in the other. In reference to a return in dower, this court has held in Irvine v. Brooks (19 S. C. 101): "When commissioners are appointed by the court to lay off dower, they become part of the machinery provided by law for that purpose. They are selected and their judgment invoked on account of their supposed fitness. They take a solemn oath to discharge the duty, and when they have exercised their best judgment fairly, honestly, and impartially, and embodied that judgment in a return in proper form, we think that return is something more than a mere estimate of a certain number of persons, which may be overthrown by the opinion of the same number of other persons examined as witnesses. It is a record. The commissioners are, in one sense, the agents of the parties, who are not allowed, as matter of right, to assail the return if it has been fairly made, and is the judgment of the commissioners, unaffected by fraud or error of law or fact. If the law were otherwise, controversies as to value, resting only in opinion, would never end. Buckler v. Farrow, Rich. Eq. Cas., 180; Stewart v. Blease, 5 S. C. 433."

But it is said that the aforesaid provision of the law under which the appraisers acted, authorizing the lands of a debtor to be sold and a sum of money set aside as homestead instead of land, is unconstitutional and void. It is undoubtedly true that the constitution, in its homestead provision, does contemplate a home—a shelter—lands. This appears not only from the use of the word "homestead," but also from the terms of the provision itself: "The general assembly shall enact such laws as will exempt from attachment and sale * * * a homestead in lands, whether held in fee or any lesser estate," &c. It will be observed, however, that the constitution does not undertake to prescribe the details of procedure by which the homestead may be set off; but, on the contrary, simply establishes the right and fixes its limit, and then declares that "it shall be the duty of the general assembly to enforce the provisions of this section by suitable legislation." Art. 2, § 32, as amended.

In the discharge of the duty thus imposed, the general assembly enacted the law in question for the avowed purpose of meeting an exceptional case, where the lands are worth more than a thousand dollars, and cannot be divided without injury to the remainder. Are we obliged to say that this act is not "suitable legislation" to enforce the provision made as to homestead in the most general terms? Can it be truly said to be inconsistent with the constitution? In the exceptional case stated, the debtor has the option to pay "the surplus of the appraised value over and above one thousand dollars," and retain the use and possession of his own land, to the extent allowed. But if he fails or refuses to pay said "surplus," the land is to be sold, and one thousand dollars of the proceeds of sale invested in other lands for his homestead. Substantially, this amounts merely to an exchange of lands, and seems to us to be in the interest of the claimant. No particular land is indicated for homestead, and we cannot say that this provision of the law violates either the letter or spirit of the constitution.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*Before Witherspoon, J., Edgefield, March, 1885.

To the statement of the case made in the opinion of this court, it will be proper to add only, that the testator died on December 21, 1883, and that the words in which he declared his last will were reduced to writing and sworn to by the three witnesses before the probate judge on May 14, 1884, and that they therein set forth the facts essential, under the statute, to the validity of a nuncupative will.

Mr. Arthur S. Tompkins, for appellant.
Messrs. Sheppard Bros., contra.

February 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. J. N. Bouchelle, late of the County of Edgefield in this State, died in December, 1883. He left surviving a widow and several collateral kindred. On the night before his death (as it is alleged), after stating to the petitioner "that he did not believe he would live until next morning, so that he could get his will fixed," he said to the petitioner, to Mrs. Griffith, and Mrs. Graddiek, all of whom were at his bedside: "I want you all to witness that it is my last will and wish on earth that my wife, Addie, shall have all my property of every nature and description after my death, and after my debts are paid. And you, Mr. Turner, to take charge of and manage my business, and see that she gets it all."

After the death of Mr. Bouchelle, the petitioner filed the petition below, stating the above facts, and also that said will of deceased was made in his last illness, in the house in which he resided, and had been reduced to writing within the time and according to the form prescribed by the law, and was attached to the petition as a part thereof. Wherefore he prayed that the same be admitted to probate under the law in such cases, and that he be appointed and authorized to carry out the same. Dr. L. B. Bouchelle, a brother of the deceased, is the only party who seems to have answered the petition. He denied the material allegations in the petition, and prayed that it be dismissed.

He *seems, also, to have demurred on the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The probate judge, after testimony, admitted the will to probate as a nuncupative will.

From this judgment Dr. Bouchelle appealed to the Circuit Court. The case then came to trial before his honor, Judge Witherspoon, when by consent of parties the issue of fact, "will or no will," was submitted to a jury. His honor was requested to charge: "1st. That all wills and testaments of real and personal property shall be in writing, and signed by the party so devising the same, or by some other person in his presence, and by his express directions, and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of the said devisor and of each other by three or more credible witnesses, or else they shall be utterly void and of none effect (Gen. Stat., § 1854); except in case of soldiers and mariners in active service, and that they may dispose of their movables, wages, and personal estate as he or they might have done at common law. Gen. Stat., § 1880. 2d. That the will proposed to be established cannot be established unless the same had been in writing and signed by the testator or some one by him authorized so to do, and attested by three witnesses." His honor declined to charge these requests. To the charge made there was no exception. The jury found for the will. His honor approved the finding, and affirmed the judgment of the Probate Court.

Dr. Bouchelle has appealed to this court, raising three questions: I. That the Circuit Judge erred in holding that a nuncupative will of the kind here was a good and valid will under the laws of this State. II. That he erred in affirming the judgment of the jury; and that the evidence was sufficient to establish the same. And, III. That he erred in holding that W. T. Turner and F. P. Griffith were competent witnesses.

Under the first exception, the appellant submits that there is no such thing in this State as a nuncupative will. It will be conceded that at common law, in early times in England, a will of chattels was good without writing. Such wills were allowed then, in part because of the inability of the people to write, or make wills in any other way but verbally. As, however, letters *and learning became more generally cultivated, and reading and writing more widely diffused, unwritten or nuncupative wills were confined to extreme cases, to wit, in cases of necessity. And at length, on account of the great frauds and abuses to which they were subject, and especially because of frightful perjury in a noted case, the statute of frauds (29 Charles II.) was enacted, regulating such wills, and declaring the mode and circumstances which would legalize them. 4 Kent, 517.

In 1712 the provisions of this act as to nuncupative wills were, in substance and almost in the precise words, enacted and made of force here. 2 Stat., 528. In 1789, by act of assembly, it was enacted that no nuncupative will should be good, where the estate bequeathed shall exceed the value of ten pounds sterling, that is not proved by the oaths of three witnesses at least. 5 Stat., 107. These acts recognized the existence of nuncupative wills at common law, and to prevent frauds and perjuries simply prescribed the conditions upon which they could be made, and the mode of having them put in form and established. Thus the law stood in this State until 1824, when it was enacted, "That from and after the first day of May (then ensuing), all wills or testaments of personal property shall be executed in writing and signed, * * or else they shall be utterly void and of no effect." 6 Stat., 238. What effect this act had on the acts of 1712 and 1789, it is not necessary now to determine, because we find the act of 1789 incorporated in the General Statutes, both of 1872 and 1882. See, in last General Statutes, §§ 1876, 77, 78, and 79. The act of 1824, supra, is also incorporated. See § 1854.

These sections, when read separately, seem to conflict, but they are found in the same general act, which, upon this subject, must be construed as a whole. They should be made to harmonize if possible. We think this can be done by construing section 1876 et seq. as an exception or proviso to section 1854, to wit: That all wills of personal property shall be executed in writing * * (§ 1854), except that nuncupative wills of a certain character and under certain conditions may be made, as prescribed in section 1876. This view determines the question first raised.

The second raises a question of fact as to the force and effect of the testimony. We see no error here, even if this case could be regarded as a case in chancery, and, therefore, bringing the facts under our cognizance. There was certainly testimony direct and positive upon the point submitted to the jury, sufficient to sustain the verdict, and to support its confirmation by the Circuit Judge.

As to the competency of Turner and F. P. Griffith as witnesses. While it does appear that they were objected to before the Probate Court, yet in the appeal from that court to the Circuit Court there is no error assigned in this respect to the ruling of the probate judge. Nor was there any motion made before the Circuit Court to strike this testimony out. In fact, it does not seem that the Circuit Judge made any ruling thereon. Such being the fact, no error can properly be assigned to him on account of its admission.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Stark v. Hopson, 30 S. C. 375, 9 S. E. 345, without specific application.]

Before Fraser and Wallace, JJ., Richland, July, 1883, and November, 1884.

Mrs. Eliza Stark filed her petition in the Court of Probate for Richland County, claiming dower in certain lands called Reedy Point place, held by the defendant, Dennis Watson, which she alleged her husband had been seized and possessed of during their *coverture, to wit, about the year 1835; and that her husband had died in the year 1882. The petition was filed February 27, 1883. The defendant put in a general denial.

After the testimony for petitioner was closed, the probate judge dismissed her petition, and the petitioner appealed to the Circuit Court. Judge Fraser heard the appeal, and filed the following decree:

This case came before me on appeal from the judgment of the Probate Court dismissing the petition, and was heard at July term, 1883, on the pleadings, judgment, and evidence in that court and exceptions thereto. I will consider the several exceptions of the petitioner, though in the view I take of the case it may not be necessary to refer to some of them.

Exceptions 2, 3, and 4. At the time of the alleged declarations (which were ruled out) made by Theo. Stark and H. P. Green to the witness, James Davis, he held the Reedy Point place as a joint tenant with Greek Avery and C. J. Houston, under a deed from Frazee, sheriff, and was engaged in running the lines, and besides being seized per my et per tout, "and having entire possession as well of every part as of the whole," the witness Davis seems to have been acting for the others, his testimony being in these words, "after we bought, we looked into the titles." It seems to me that any statement made to Davis at this time by Theo. Stark or H. P. Green, or, indeed, any other person, and his reply or his conduct in reference to such communications, is admissible as evidence, for what it may be worth, as to the possession of Theo. Stark, or the extent of his claim under it, in any proceeding in which either of the joint tenants or their privies is interested.

Exception 5. The fact that Mrs. Stark "never heard of any one's objecting to her husband's possession" is a mere negative statement and of no value, and it matters very little whether ruled out or not.

Exceptions 7, 8, and 9. I cannot assent to the proposition of law asserted in these exceptions, that because certain testimony has been ruled out as incompetent (and it is alleged erroneously), the defendant is estopped to deny the fact it was offered to prove. *If the ruling on the testimony was wrong, it can be corrected in the proper way, and no estoppel follows its rejection.

Exception 10. This exception is so general that I am not able to apply it to any particular testimony "offered and ruled out," the only way to raise a question of the admissibility of evidence for the judgment of an appellate court.

Exception 6. The petitioner relies (1) on the possession of Theo. Stark, her husband, during the coverture; (2) on a title in the defendant derived from her husband.

(1) As to the possession of Stark at the time of the marriage. Theo. Stark was living with his sisters, and, as I construe petitioner's testimony, this state of things continued only a few months, when he became the head of the family, and she went to housekeeping, and got provisions generally and butter and eggs from Reedy Point, and nursed and made clothes for the negroes she recognized as working there. Paul Pickens testifies that Theo. Stark bought his father Noble and himself as slaves; that Noble was a driver at Reedy Point, and a Mr. May the overseer; this was during the coverture. It is true that when one relies on possession, it should be a possessionem pedis, or then with color of title. In general, the "land should be cultivated," or, perhaps, it would be sufficient if it should be used for pasture. Porter v. Kennedy, 1 McMull., 357. The character of the provisions used is just such as to show that the land was cultivated and used for pasture also, and, as was the habit in those days, the pasture was on unenclosed land. The pecuniary embarrassment of Theo. Stark is sufficient to account for the dispersion of his slaves, without supposing, as we are asked to do, that they always were the property of the Stark family, and only were divided off after his failure. There is not sufficient evidence to support this theory. I think the evidence of possession in Theo. Stark is sufficient prima facie to support the claim of dower.

(2) The only difficulty in the chain of title of Theo. Stark to the defendant, who holds under C. J. Houston, is as to the deeds from B. F. Taylor, executor, to Theo. Stark, Theo. Stark to R. W. Gibbes, and R. W. Gibbes to Lucy P. Green. These deeds, it is alleged, have been lost. The records in Columbia having been burned during the war, the petitioner could not produce copies. The defendant, or those under whom he claims, had or ought to have had, the originals, and in their possession they have been lost. This loss occurred while these deeds were in the possession of James Davis, one of the joint tenants under whom the defendant claims. James Davis, however, cannot read writing, and only knows of the existence and contents of these deeds by their being read over to him; he recognized the reading as correct, and acted on the information conveyed to his mind. While the mere reading over of the deeds to any other witness might not have been sufficient to enable him to speak of its contents, I am inclined to the opinion that the reading of the deeds to James Davis and his recognition of them, as he certainly did, as parts of his chain of title, makes his testimony on that subject competent. The statement of this witness as to these deeds is more than mere hearsay, and was admitted without objection at the hearing below.

I think that the judge of probate should have required the defendant to have offered testimony in defence, if he had any, and not have made any ruling dismissing the petition at the close of petitioner's case and this exception is therefore sustained.

It is not proper for me to prescribe any course of proceeding to be hereafter taken in the Probate Court, and I shall not undertake to do so. The judgment of the Probate Court, dismissing the petition at the close of the petitioner's testimony, is therefore reversed, and the case remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be proper in the case, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

Defendant excepted at the time to this decree, but did not then appeal.

The probate judge, on the second trial, on the evidence already taken for the petitioner, and testimony on behalf of the defendant, found "as a matter of fact that the petitioner is not entitled to dower in the lands of defendant." And he ordered that the petition be dismissed with costs.

On petitioner's appeal from this order, Judge Wallace passed the following decree:

This is an appeal from the Probate Court. Mrs. Stark had filed her petition in that court, claiming dower in certain land, *now held by Dennis Watson, as the widow of Theodore Stark. Upon the hearing in that court, the petition was dismissed at the close of petitioner's testimony, upon the ground that she had not shown seizin in the husband of the land in question during the time she was his wife. From this decree an appeal was taken to this court, which was heard by Judge Fraser. He made a decree reversing the judgment of the Probate Court, upon the ground that the petitioner had shown the possession to have been in the husband of petitioner under a claim of right during the existence of the marital relation between herself and her husband, and that this showing was prima facie sufficient to entitle the demandant to dower. The case was therefore remanded to the Probate Court for further proceedings.

Upon the second hearing before the Probate Court, it was agreed that the testimony taken at the first hearing there should be considered as part of the case. The defendant then offered testimony intended to show that Mrs. Stark had renounced dower in the land. This testimony was to the effect that after Stark's possession, during the existence of the marriage relation between himself and the demandant, the land had been several times sold and purchased, and deeds made and accepted by grantors and grantees, and in every case the titles had been examined by careful and competent lawyers. I do not think this testimony sufficient to establish the existence, loss, and contents of an instrument of renunciation of dower. Testimony was also introduced, intended to show that the land now held by Dennis Watson was not part of the land which had been in the possession of Theo. Stark. I think, upon this point, the preponderance of the evidence is in favor of demandant, and shows that the land in which dower is claimed is part of the tract once in possession of demandant's husband.

The case made by demandant at the first hearing before the Court of Probate, stands unaffected by the evidence of the defendant at the second hearing, and this case has been held by Judge Fraser sufficient, in the absence of countervailing testimony, to entitle the demandant to dower. In this view I concur.

1. It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that petitioner is entitled to dower in the land described in the petition as held by

*220

*Dennis Watson, and to an account and decree for the rents and profits, and to her costs and disbursements. 2. It is further ordered, that the cause be remanded to the Probate Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary and proper to carry out this decree.

The exceptions taken by defendant to this decree are set forth in the opinion.

Mr. Allen J. Green, for appellant.

Messrs. Bacon & Moore, contra.

February 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The respondent filed the petition below, claiming dower in certain lands situate in Richland County, of which she alleged her husband, the late Theodore Stark, had been seized during coverture. The petition was heard by the Probate Court for said county, and upon the close of petitioner's testimony, the defendant moved to dismiss the petition on the ground that petitioner had not shown seizin in Theodore Stark, and, even if she had, that she had proved herself out of court. This motion was granted with costs. The petitioner appealed to the Circuit Court. The appeal was heard by his honor, Judge Fraser, who reversed the judgment of the Probate Court, and remanded the case for such further proceedings as might be proper. To this decree defendant excepted.

The case was then heard a second time before the Probate Court upon the testimony of the former case by the plaintiff and additional testimony introduced by the defendant. The probate judge again dismissed the petition, finding, "as matter of fact, that the petitioner is not entitled to dower in the land of Dennis Watson, the defendant." From this judgment an appeal was again taken by the petitioner to the Circuit Court, which was heard at the October term of the court by his honor, Judge Wallace, who sustained the claim of the petitioner for dower, and for rents and profits, remanding the case for such further proceedings as might be necessary.

Now the cause comes to this court upon exceptions by defendant from both decrees.

*The exceptions to the decree of Judge Fraser assign error: I. Because his honor held certain declarations of Theo. Stark and H. P. Green to James Davis and his reply, as to Stark's possession, &c., admissible. II. Because his honor held that the evidence of possession in Theodore Stark was sufficient prima facie to support petitioner's claim. III. Because he held that deeds from Taylor, executor, to Theodore Stark, from Theodore Stark to R. W. Gibbes, and from Gibbes to Lucy P. Green, had been in existence and had been lost, or alleged to have been lost. And IV. Because that he admitted the testimony of Davis as to the contents of these deeds, said testimony having been admitted below without objection, as stated by his honor.

The decree of Judge Wallace is excepted to on the following grounds: I. Because his honor held that Judge Fraser had reversed the judgment of the Probate Court on the ground that the petitioner had made out a prima facie case, whereas it is submitted that he reversed it because the probate judge should have required the defendant to go on with his testimony, at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, instead of dismissing the case at that stage. II. Because his honor erred in holding that the existence, loss, and contents of a renunciation of dower had not been proved. III. Because his honor erred in holding that the preponderance of testimony showed that the land in which the dower was claimed was a part of a tract once in the possession of demandant's husband. IV. Because his honor held that the case, as made by the defendant in the first trial before the Probate Court, stood unaffected by defendant's evidence in the second trial, and that Judge Fraser had held the evidence sufficient, in the absence of countervailing evidence, to entitle the demandant to dower. And V. Because his honor held that demandant was entitled to dower, &c., and that he reversed the decree of the Probate Court on a question of fact involving the credibility of witnesses.

The first exception to the decree of Judge Fraser raises a question of fact, to wit, whether the evidence of petitioner had shown such possession in her husband as to entitle her prima facie to dower. It is hardly necessary to refer to authority for the position, that a demandant in dower is not required to make out a complete chain of title in her husband, and that all that she is *expected or required to do is to show possession by her husband during the coverture, which will be sufficient unless it is overthrown by disproving title by the defendant. In other words, proof by the demandant of possession in her husband during coverture makes out her case in the first instance, and at the end, too, unless the defendant has shown the absence of title in such husband. This is elementary law. Judge Fraser said that he thought the evidence of possession was sufficient to make out a prima facie case. We concur in this opinion. Next exception relates to the declarations of Theodore Stark and H. P. Green to James Davis, &c. This is admitted in appellant's argument to be an abstract question, as the testimony objected to was never offered at the hearing (we suppose the second hearing). It, therefore, need not be considered.

3d, 4th. As to the testimony of James Davis in reference to the existence, loss, and contents of certain deeds mentioned in this exception. It is sufficient to say, in reference to this exception, that the testimony in question was offered and received without objection by the defendant. This is stated by the judge, and we find no objection noted in the "Case." Such being the fact, the exception is not properly before us.

Next in order is the consideration of the exceptions to the decree of Judge Wallace. The first seems to us to be inconsistent with exception 1 herein to the decree of Judge Fraser. That exception assigned error to Judge Fraser, because he held that the evidence of possession in Theodore Stark was sufficient to support the claim of dower. And now Judge Wallace's decree is excepted to because he construed the decree of Judge Fraser in the same way. Judge Fraser evidently thought that the evidence of the petitioner was prima facie sufficient, and on that account he ruled that the probate judge was in error in dismissing the case without hearing from the defendant, and he, therefore, remanded it, to give the defendant an opportunity to make his defence. That defence has since been made, and, in the opinion of Judge Wallace, the case made by the demandant in the first hearing stands unaffected by the evidence of the defence. He, therefore, decreed, in accordance with the opinion of Judge Fraser as to the prima facie case made at the first hearing, that the *demandant was entitled to dower. Whether the demandant's prima facie case had been affected by the subsequent defence, was a question of fact, and we cannot say that the manifest weight of the evidence is against the finding of the Circuit Judge on that subject.

The questions raised in several of the other exceptions to this last decree seem to be questions of fact, such as, that his honor erred in holding that defendant's testimony was insufficient to establish the existence, loss, and contents of a renunciation of dower, and that the preponderance of the testimony was in favor of demandant, showing that the land in which dower is claimed was a part of the tract once in possession of demandant's husband. We cannot disturb these findings under the settled rule in such cases. The remaining exceptions are too general, failing, as they do, to raise any specific question.

In the argument of appellant, a distinction is pointed out and contended for between the powers of the Circuit Court on appeals from the Probate Court, and the powers of this court on appeals to it. Even admitting the distinction contended for, yet the rule laid down in Black v. White (13

S. C., 38) precludes the idea of the findings of the Probate Court being absolutely conclusive upon the Circuit Court upon appeal. The court said in that case: "The Circuit Court ought not to disturb the findings of the Probate Court on questions of fact of that nature [that is, where the witness had been before that court, &c.], unless clear ground is afforded for that purpose." Here the court below thought that clear ground had been afforded, and we are of the same opinion. The petitioner was not required to make out a complete chain of titles in her husband. As we said at the outset, she was only required to show possession during the coverture. This being done, her claim was perfect until the defendant disproved title. The probate judge, notwithstanding the evidence of possession, decreed against her, although no sufficient evidence had been offered by the defendant disproving title.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed. Let this judgment be certified to the Probate Court for Richland County.

*STATE v. BROWN.

[Indictment and Information ⚭87.]

An indictment that fails to state any specific day on which the alleged offence was committed is fatally defective.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, June, 1885. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Lee & Bowen, for appellant.

February 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The only question raised by this appeal is as to the sufficiency of the indictment under which the defendant was convicted. The indictment was for burglary, and charged, "That Andrew Brown, on the day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, at the hour of , in the night of the same day, with force and arms," &c.; and the precise question is whether the omission to state any specific day on which the offence was alleged to have been committed is fatal.

In Archbold's Criminal Pleadings, page 11 of the 1st edition, it is said: "Time and place must be added to every material fact in an indictment; that is, every material fact stated in an indictment must be alleged to have been done on a particular day, and at a particular place." And again, at page 12, this writer says: "The time laid should be the day of the month and year upon which the act is supposed to have been committed. A day certain must be stated; and this at present is always the day of the month, although naming it as a feast day, or 'the octave of the Holy Trinity,' or the like, seems to be sufficient." So in 1 Chitty, Criminal Law, at page 217, it is said: "It is, in general, requisite to state that the defendant committed the offence for which he was indicted on a specific year and day." And in 1 Bishop, Criminal Procedure, section 239 of 1st edition, it is said: "Every indictment must allege a day and year on which the offence was committed."

In view of the doctrine thus explicitly laid down by these standard authorities on criminal pleading, we do not see how we can avoid the conclusion that the indictment under consideration is fatally defective in failing to state any specific day on which the offence charged was alleged to have been committed; especially when we find that this doctrine has been so recently recognized in this State in the case of State v. Coleman (8 S. C., at page 243), where it is said: "Time and place must accompany every material allegation in the indictment, though it is not necessary in all cases to prove the offence on the day laid if it is before bill found." In that case the indictment charged that the prisoner, on the 13th day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, inflicted the wounds, &c., and then proceeded to allege that the said deceased, "from the said 13th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1873, until the 14th day of the same month of April in the year of our Lord last aforesaid, did languish," &c.; and the court said these latter words just quoted made manifest and put beyond doubt the day when it was alleged that the mortal blow was inflicted. But the court said: "Admitting that the letters cigh make no word significant of time, if there was nothing else in the indictment by which a time was found to be specified by proper expression, the exception should prevail."

The case of State v. Washington (13 S. C., 453), is relied on by the solicitor. But there, too, we find that the omission complained of was supplied by other parts of the indictment. Here, however, the day on which the offence is charged to have been committed is left entirely blank, and there is nothing in the indictment to supply the deficiency. The best that can be said of it is that it was some day in the month of March, 1885, but what particular day is not designated or even indicated in any way whatever.

In view of the authorities above cited and quoted from we cannot hold that this indictment is sufficient, especially when we are told in 1 Chitty Cr. Law, 218, that it has been held that "an indictment for battery, setting forth that the defendant beat so *many of the king's subjects between two specified days, would be insufficient," for here this indictment charges in effect that the burglary was committed between the first and thirty-first of March.

The case of State v. Dent (1 Rich., 469), relied on by the solicitor, is not in point. That was an indictment for gaming, in which the time at which the offence was alleged to have been committed must necessarily have been stated, for the judge who delivered the opinion of the court says, in speaking of the indictment: "It is perfect on its face, and that is enough." Hence no question like the one now under consideration could have arisen in the case. The question there was as to the effect of the special finding of the jury, to wit: That the defendant was guilty, but that the unlawful playing took place more than six months before the commencement of the prosecution; and it was contended that as no day anterior to the six months was designated in the indictment the finding, therefore, was vague and uncertain. It was in reference to this position that the court used the language quoted and relied upon by the solicitor, to wit: "But the exact day of the offence need not be charged in the indictment. And when circumstances render the precise time of consequence, it must be pleaded in order that the solicitor may assign the exact time."

This, of course, means nothing more than that it is not essential that the exact time at which the offence was actually committed should be stated in the indictment, and does not at all affect the rule as laid down in the authorities above cited, that though it is necessary that some particular day must be laid in the indictment it is not necessary that it should be proved that the offence was committed on that particular day. This is not a case in which the wrong day is stated in the indictment, but the objection here is that no specific day is alleged, and hence the suggestion thrown out in Dent's Case that where the nature of the defence is such as to require that the correct time should be stated, in order that the defence may be made available, the solicitor may be required to "assign the exact time" (though exactly how this could be done after the bill has been found by the grand jury, it might be difficult to say), does not apply. We suppose what was really meant by the suggestion was that in such a case the solicitor should be required not to assign the correct day in the indictment, but to elect upon what day he will stand, in analogy to the practice where two separate and distinct assaults are testified to the solicitor is required to elect upon which he will stand; and in this view the suggestion becomes still more inapplicable, for here the question is as to the sufficiency of the indictment, and not as to the proper practice in the conduct of a prosecution.

Again, it is contended that, as Chitty, in the passage above quoted, only says that it is, in general, requisite to state in the indictment that the offence was committed on a specific day, the rule is not universal and should not be applied where the reason for it has ceased. But it will be observed that Mr. Chitty practically explains the use of the words "in general," not in the way contended for, but by going on to show two exceptions to the rule, under neither of which does this case fall.

Finally it is urged that the strictness formerly required in criminal pleading is not in accordance with modern views, and that "the general progress of civilization and enlightenment has worked many relaxations in the hide-bound maxims of the law, and in none more conspicuously than the exact technical phraseology of indictments." Without undertaking to inquire how far this may be true as a general proposition, it is sufficient for us to say that so far as the particular question involved in this case is concerned we have not been cited to any authority, and we are not aware of any, in which the old rule has been relaxed. On the contrary, we find, as shown above, that the rule has been recently recognized in our own State. It may be that many of the strict rules of criminal pleading should pass away with the reasons upon which they were founded (if, indeed, there ever was any good reason for them), but it is not our province to alter but simply to declare the law.

And when we find that the fundamental law of the land (Cons., art. 1, § 13.) explicitly declares that: "No person shall be held to answer for any crime or offence until the same is fully, fairly, plainly, substantially, and formally described to him," and when we know of no forms of indictment established by competent authority except those sanctioned by the wisdom of ages, we do not see how we can justify a departure from those forms. For it will be observed that the constitution not only requires that the offence charged shall be fully, fairly, plainly, and substantially, but formally described; and this must mean either one of two things—that the offence must be charged in the form required at the adoption of the constitution, or in some form prescribed by competent authority (most probably the latter), and therefore until some other form is so prescribed we are bound to adhere to those originally adopted.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary and proper.

24 S. C. 228

WATSON v. WATSON.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Deeds ⇨24.]

An instrument of writing, in form a deed, from a husband to his wife, in words following, to wit: "Know all men by these presents that I, T. W., in consideration of the affection I bear my wife, E. C. W., at and before the sealing of these presents, have granted, bargained, and at my death, by these presents, do grant, bargain, and release unto the said E. C. W., all that tract or parcel of land known as my homestead * * * together with all the kitchen and household furniture and effects, with all and singular the rights, members, * * * to have and to hold, &c. All of the before mentioned property I give to my wife independent of her dower, and no enumeration or deduction is to be made against her in consideration thereof in the final distribution of my estate." Then follows a covenant of general warranty, and the conclusion with date, and last of all these words: "This paper not to be in full force until I desire to act." Held, that this instrument was not intended to operate as a will, but as a deed, and must be sustained as a covenant to stand seized to uses.

[2. Wills ⇨88.]

It may not now be asserted as an inflexible rule that a conveyance of chattels cannot be made to take effect after the termination of a life estate; but the personality included in this deed not being here in contest, the court will not permit the mention of them to control the otherwise clear intention of the grantor, that the paper was not intended to operate in the nature of a will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 208, 217; Dec. Dig. ⇨88.]

[3. Deeds ⇨95.]

*The last sentence is too vague and indefinite to control the clear intention disclosed in other parts of this deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 238, 241-254; Dec. Dig. ⇨95.]

[4. Deeds ⇨95.]

The intention of this deed must be ascertained from the instrument itself, and this was done by the Circuit Judge in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 238, 241-254; Dec. Dig. ⇨95.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Edgefield, March, 1885.

This is an appeal from the following decree:

Plaintiffs contend that as defendant could take no interest in the land under the instrument until after the death of Tillman Watson, Sr., and as said intended disposition was revocable, the instrument must be construed as testamentary in its character. It is contended that as a will the paper is invalid, as it has but two witnesses. The form of an instrument is important only so far as it is evidence of what was intended.

As to the form. The only evidence of a testamentary character furnished by the instrument is that the defendant's enjoyment of the land is postponed to the death of her husband. The force of this circumstance may be overcome, as in Wheeler v. Durant 6 Rich. Eq., 454, by the context and general form of the instrument. The instrument under consideration begins with the usual statutory words of a deed: "Know all men by these presents," and in all other respects has the form and requisites of a valid deed.

As to the intent. It is the duty of the courts, by reasonable construction, to give effect to the intention of the parties not inconsistent with law. The intent is to be ascertained from the whole instrument and the surrounding circumstances; the intention should be regarded as looking rather to the effect than the mode of producing it. See Chancellor v. Windham and Law, 1 Rich., 167 [42 Am. Dec. 411]. In the premises the grant is made in the past and present tense: "Have granted, bargained, and at my death, by these presents, do grant, bargain, and release unto the said Elizabeth C. Watson all that tract," &c. In Wheeler v. Durant 6 Rich. Eq., 454, it is held that "a paper is a deed and not a testament if the instrument is intended to have a present and not a future operation, if it is intended to pass the right in present to be a perfected and executed contract, and not revocable or ambulatory." It was stated in argument and not denied that *defendant, prior to her marriage, lived upon the premises in dispute. Tillman Watson, Sr., had no children to succeed him in the possession of this homestead. It would be both reasonable and natural that he should desire his wife to have this homestead, after his death, in preference to his next of kin, who have shared with his wife in the distribution of the rest of his large and valuable real and personal property.

It is, however, contended that the words in the instrument, just before the signature of Tillman Watson, Sr., "This paper to be in full force until I desire to act," render the grant revocable, and thereby destroy the effect of the instrument as a deed. It is difficult to understand these words. The last of the words quoted is indistinct, being interpreted by plaintiffs to be "act," and by the defendant to be "alt." Interpreted in either view, the words quoted and appearing at the conclusion of the instrument, just before the signature of Tillman Watson, Sr., are repugnant to each and all of the foregoing parts of the paper, and cannot therefore control the operation or effect of the instrument. If these ambiguous concluding words could be held to reserve the power of revocation, there has been no effort on the part of Tillman Watson, Sr., during the six months that he lived after the execution of said instrument, to exercise such power of revocation.

It appears from the testimony that, after signing the instrument, Tillman Watson, Sr., folded the same and handed it to his wife, the defendant, saying something about the uses and purposes therein contained. I conclude, from the testimony, that the execution and delivery of the paper has been established. In delivering the opinion of the court, in the case of Alexander v. Burnet (5 Rich., 195), Judge Evans says: "I have seen no case when the instrument was in form a deed, accompanied by delivery, which has been construed into a will, although a life estate was reserved to the donor."

I must conclude that it was the intention of Tillman Watson, Sr., at the time of the execution and delivery of the instrument on July 13, 1874, to convey, in present, to his wife, the defendant, the land in dispute, reserving to himself the use thereof during his life. There are no express words of reservation *of the use in the instrument under consideration. No such words are necessary when such intent can be discovered from the instrument and the surrounding circumstances. In Chancellor v. Windham and Law, supra, it is held "that a deed, whether in form a feoffment, a bargain and sale, or a lease and release, if the consideration of blood or marriage exists, may, to effect the intention of the parties, be construed to be a 'covenant' to stand seized to uses." The only consideration expressed in this instrument is the affection of a husband for his wife, which is sufficient consideration upon which to found a covenant to stand seized to uses. The case of Chancellor v. Windham and Law, supra, seems to me to be analogous to this case.

As matter of law, I conclude that the defendant, Elizabeth C. Watson, is entitled to the land described in plaintiffs' complaint, by virtue of the deed of Tillman Watson, Sr., executed and delivered July 13, 1874, construed as a covenant to stand seized to uses. It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that plaintiffs' complaint in the above entitled action be dismissed with costs.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed upon several exceptions, which raised the points stated and considered by this court.

Messrs. B. L. Abney and E. A. Glover, for appellants.

Mr. M. C. Butler, contra, who also submitted argument of Mr. B. W. Bettis, deceased, on same side.

February 24, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Tillman Watson, Sr., late of Edgefield County, died intestate February, 1874. He died childless, but he left surviving him his widow, the defendant, and several collateral kindred, among whom are the plaintiffs. The widow administered and all of the real estate admitted to belong to the deceased has been partitioned among the parties entitled. The widow, however, is in the possession of the homestead, containing some four hundred acres, which she claims under a deed *executed by her husband in July, 1870, and which therefore was not embraced in the partition. The plaintiffs deny the validity of this deed as a conveyance of this property, and the action below was brought to recover one undivided half of the same. The defendant, in addition to relying on the deed, plead lapse of time and the statute of limitations. The action below was commenced in January, 1884.

The cause was heard by consent by his honor, Judge Witherspoon, upon testimony taken before the clerk of the court. His honor found as matter of fact that the deed in question had been executed and delivered, and as matter of law that it was a covenant to stand seized to uses. He therefore adjudged that the defendant was entitled to the land, whereupon he ordered the complaint to be dismissed with costs.

The appeal denies the execution and delivery of the deed; also, that it could be construed as a covenant to stand seized; and also, that defendant was entitled to hold the land under said deed. It also assigns error to the Circuit Judge in admitting certain testimony as to the acts, declarations, and intention of Tillman Watson concerning said deed. The following is a copy of the deed in question:

"State of South Carolina—Edgefield County.

"Know all men by these presents that I, Tillman Watson, Sr., of Edgefield County, in the State aforesaid, in consideration of the affection I bear my wife, Elizabeth C. Watson, at and before the sealing of these presents, have granted, bargained, and at my death by these presents do grant, bargain, and release unto the said Elizabeth C. Watson all that tract or parcel of land known as my homestead, containing four hundred acres, more or less, situate, lying, and being in the County of Edgefield and State aforesaid, near Ridge Spring depot, on the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad, being bounded as follows, viz.: On the north, by lands of P. J. Quattlebaum; on the east and south, by lands of Burrell Boatwright; and on the west, by the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad and land of Mrs. T. Watson; together with all the kitchen and household furniture and effects, with all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging or in anywise incident or appertaining. To have and to hold all and singular the premises before mentioned unto the said Elizabeth

C. Watson, her heirs and assigns, forever.

All of the before *mentioned property I give to my wife, Elizabeth C. Watson, independent of her dower, and no enumeration or deduction is to be made against her in consideration thereof in the final distribution of my estate; and I do bind myself, heirs, executors, and administrators to warrant and forever defend all and singular the said premises unto the said Elizabeth C. Watson, her heirs and assigns, against my heirs and all and every other person lawfully claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof.

"Witness my hand and seal this thirteenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and in the ninety-fifth year of American Independence. This paper to be in full force until I desire to act.

"Sworn to before me this 9th day of August, 1873. Jackson Covar. N. P.

"Recorded on the 15th day of December, 1875. Jesse Jones, C. C. C. P."

The questions involved in this appeal were very fully and elaborately discussed before us on both sides, and especially was much light thrown upon the intricate subject of conveyances, both at common law and under the statute of uses, many authorities having been cited and ably commented upon. The case, however, involves an examination of only one of the classes of conveyances discussed, to wit: covenants to stand seized, which originally only created a trust enforceable in equity, but afterwards by the statute of uses conveyed the legal title, and, therefore, since that statute recognized at law. The Circuit Judge held the deed in question here a covenant to stand seized, and whether he erred in thus holding is the main question to be considered. What is a covenant to stand seized, and what are its prominent features and characteristics?

Mr. Kent describes it as well and perhaps better than can be found elsewhere. No apology is therefore necessary for quoting *from him, even at some length. He says: "By this conveyance a person seized of lands covenants that he will stand seized of them to the use of another. On executing the covenant the other party becomes seized of the use of the land, according to the term of the use, and the statute of uses immediately operates and annexes the possession to the use. This conveyance has the same force and effect as a common deed of bargain and sale, but the great distinction between them is that the former can only be made use of among domestic relations, for it must be founded on the consideration of blood or marriage. No use can be founded for any purpose by this conveyance in favor of a person not within the influence of the domestic consideration; and it makes no difference whether the grantee, if he be a stranger to the consideration, is to take on his own account or as a mere trustee for some of the family connections. He is equally incompetent to take. The existence of another consideration in addition to that of blood or marriage will not impede the operation of the deed. Covenants to stand seized are a species of conveyance said no longer to be in use in England, as no use would vest in a stranger to whom the consideration of blood did not extend. They owe their efficacy to the statute of uses. * * * But if the covenant to stand seized be founded on the requisite consideration, it would be good as a grant, for there would be no dispute about the intention, and it is admitted that in a covenant to stand seized any words will do that sufficiently indicate the intention. It is a principle of law that if the form of the conveyance be an inadequate mode of giving effect to the intention, according to the letter of the instrument, it is to be construed under the assumption of another character so as to give it effect. * * * The qualification to this rule is, that the instrument must partake of the essential qualities of the deed assumed; and, therefore, no instrument can operate as a feoffment without livery, * * * nor as a grant, unless the subject lies in grant; nor as a covenant to stand seized without the consideration of blood or marriage; nor as a bargain and sale without a valuable consideration. If there be no lease to make a deed good as a release, and no livery to make it good as a feoffment, it may operate as a bargain and sale; or, if a release cannot operate because it attempts to convey a *freehold in futuro, it will be available as a covenant to stand seized provided there be the requisite consideration." 4 Kent, 493-5.

It appears from this that the principal characteristics of a covenant to stand seized are, first, the intention; secondly, it must be founded upon the consideration of blood or marriage, and it may create a freehold in futuro; and, further, though the form of the deed according to its letter may not be covenant to stand seized, yet if such be the intention it will be so construed provided the consideration be that of blood or marriage. See also our cases of Chancellor v. Windham and Law, 1 Rich., 164 [42 Am. Dec. 411], and Kinsler v. Clark, 1 Rich., 170, especially on the point of creating a freehold in futuro by covenants to stand seized. Now let the deed in question be tested by the principles laid down in the authorities cited. The consideration is of the character required in a covenant to stand seized, and there can be no doubt that Mr. Watson intended to create an estate in fee in his wife to take effect in enjoyment at his death, reserving a life estate to himself, thus creating a freehold as to enjoyment in futuro, one of the leading features of a covenant to stand seized.

The case of Chancellor v. Windham, supra, was very similar to the case here. In that case one John Wilson, by words in present, had given, granted, and released unto his son, his heirs and assigns, the land described in the deed, at his death to have and to hold, &c. It was held to be a covenant to stand seized, though creating a freehold in futuro. And so, too, in the case of Kinsler v. Clark, supra, where a mother, in consideration of natural love and affection, &c., gave and granted to her two sons after the term of her natural life a tract of land, the same holding was had. In the former case Judge Wardlaw said the authorities cited "show that a deed, whether in form a feoffment, a bargain and sale, or a lease and release, if the consideration of blood or marriage exists, may, to effect the intention of the parties, be construed to be a covenant to stand seized; that give and grant are apt words for such covenant, and that it is the duty of courts by reasonable construction to give effect to the intention of parties not inconsistent with law. The deed in question is, therefore, a good covenant to stand seized to uses."

*Here apt words are used, the intention is apparent, and the exact consideration required is present: why, therefore, should we not sustain the Circuit Judge in his holding this paper a covenant to stand seized? It is urged that this should not be done, first, because in this deed personal property is embraced (household and kitchen furniture), which could not be made the subject of a covenant to stand seized; and, second, that the grantor reserved a power of revocation by the last words of the deed, "This paper to be in full force until I desire to act;" and it is contended that these two facts differentiate this case from the cases relied on above. It is true that the statute of uses does not apply to personalty, and it is also true that at common law, while a conveyance of a chattel might be made to commence in futuro at a definite time fixed, yet it could not be made after a life estate, because a life estate was supposed to be of longer duration than any chattel. This ancient common law rule, however, has been much modified since, and it cannot be said now that it has been established as an inflexible rule to be applied in all cases of personalty without regard to the circumstances. Be this as it may, however, we do not understand that the personalty here is really in contest. Whether it has been destroyed or whether it is in the possession of the defendant, does not appear.

The fact, though, that it appears in the deed as a portion of the property attempted to be conveyed, is made use of as an argument to show that the whole paper was ambulatory in its character, certainly so, as is contended, with reference to the personalty, because a future interest could not be created therein except by will, and inferentially so as to the land, because it is embraced in the same paper with the personalty. The land was far the most important and valuable portion of the conveyance. It was the homestead of these two old people, containing some 400 acres. If the small personalty found in the deed had not been embraced, we think there could be but little doubt as to the intention of the husband, and under the authorities cited above it would have been the duty of the court to declare the deed a covenant to stand seized, thereby creating a freehold in futuro in his widow. Such being the fact, is it not much more reasonable to suppose that the small personalty embraced was thrown in, either under the sup*position that it would go with the land, or, perhaps, inadvertently, rather than to show that the deed was ambulatory, in the nature of a will, and was to have no effect except as a will? In these matters it must be observed that the intention must always control, and the intention must depend, not upon the effect of portions of the paper taken up in detached parts, but upon the whole paper, construed as a whole.

But, it is urged that the last line of the deed supra affords evidence that the deed was not regarded or intended by old Mr. Watson to be irrevocable. Without going into the question of powers reserved in such cases, it seems sufficient here to say that the line in question is too indefinite and vague to predicate any construction thereof. In the first place, it is not agreed as to the last word in the line, whether it is "act or "alt." This is the most important word in the line, and in the absence of a distinct understanding of what it is, it cannot be safely interpreted. All of the foregoing portions of the deed are reasonably clear and free from doubt, and directly opposed to the effect contended for from this line. To overthrow the clear portions of the deed by a portion which is not distinctly intelligible, seems unreasonable. Besides, the only intelligible portion of the line shows that Mr. Watson knew that he had made a deed, which was of force at the time, at least, and that it passed a right in present.

The exceptions involving matters of fact are overruled under the authority of many familiar cases in our own reports. The case is a case at law, and the facts belong to the jury.

Next, it is urged "that his honor erred in not excluding all testimony as to Tillman Watson's acts, declarations, or intention concerning said deed, the deed itself being the highest evidence of intention." This is a very general exception, not sufficiently specific according to strict practice and rule, and if we have overlooked any testimony objected to, it is due to this fact. The testimony in the case seems to have been taken before the clerk under the provisions of the statute. During this examination, objections were made and noted, and it is stated by the appellant that these objections were urged at the trial. It does not appear, however, that the Circuit Judge made any ruling upon the subject. Nor does it clearly appear that he considered the testimony in question.

*But in no event is the exception tenable. The principle contended for by the appellant, to be applied in the construction and interpretation of papers, is no doubt sound. They must speak for themselves, and through the words employed. Nothing can be added, taken away, or changed by oral testimony, but the paper as written must govern. Now, wherein did any testimony of Mrs. Quattlebaum or Abram Jones (the witnesses mentioned in appellant's argument) conflict with this rule? Neither testified as to any matter being left out that should be added to the deed, or that it should be altered in any respect. Nor did they disclose any act or declaration of Mr. Watson giving character to the deed, whether intended as a bargain and sale or a covenant to stand seized. These were the real questions in the case, and the Circuit Judge, doubtless, determined these upon the paper itself.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

WESTMORELAND v. MARTIN.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Attorney and Client ⇨133.]
